TO THE RIGHT HONORABLE AND VVORTHY SIR ANTHONY COOKE KNIGHT, PETER MARTIR VERMILIVS OF FLORENCE, PROFESSOR OF DIVINITIE IN THE SCHOLE OF

Hen I oftentimes consider with my selfe (right honourable Sir, whome for godlines and learning I reuerence) all those things which happened all that whole time that I dwelt in England, it driueth into me a great and manifolde griefe. And in es-peciall it is a grief vnto me, that so great an hope of the gospell of Jesus Christe, and of pure doctrine in that Realme, geuen by the most mighty and most mercifull God, and confirmed by the great laboure, industry, and study of godly men, hath now in a maner vtterly pearished. It is a griefe vnto me, to thinke that that most noble wit, most sacred brest, and incredible piety of that famous king Edward the .vi. of that name your most deare pupill, is so sodainely taken from vs. It is a griefe vnto me that so many English men, being of great fame & renoum, as well for theyr piety as for theyr knowledge and nobility, are by voluntary exile for religion sake, disperfed throughout externe and straunge countreys: and they which at home were counted moſte noble, and heroicall, doe now wander abroad as men obscure, abiect, and in a manner vnknowne to all men. But it is well in that this happeneth not vnto them for any wicked actes by them committed, or for filthy life, but only for the name and doctrine of oure Lord Jesus Christ. It is also a griefe vnto me, that so great a multitude of godly brethren are (as doubtles it is to often from euerye where signified vnto vs) moſte cruelly for theyr holy profession put to the sword, fire, and tormentes: whome, for as much as they are our brethren, and haue to theyr head together with vs one and the selfe same Christ, and are members of one and the selfe same body, and finally are euen oure owne bowels, when we heare to be entreated with so great cruelty and tyranny, it is not possible, but that we also should in minde be shaken with horror, and set on fire, euen as they are in body tormented and murthered. These and a greate many moe things being vnto me a great griefe, so that I am nowe in a maner hardened to any newe griefe, yet cease I not to haue an eye hither and thither, to see if I might by any meanes gette some healthfull and profitable remedy bothe for my selfe and for such like as I am: but now I haue long time had experience of, that it is in vaine to hope for mannes helpe, or for ayd at the worlds hand. And therfore

The Epistle dedicatory.

therefore I perswade both my selfe & also others to withdraw their minde from the aides of the flesh, and to implore the heavenly and diuine helpe: which doubtles I see is offered vnto vs two wayes.
One is, that we with prayers turning our selues vnto Christ, shold say: How long Lord shall the wickednes and fury of Idolatry, of superstitions, and of the ignorance of the scriptures range abroad on the earth: How long Lord shall thy holy Gospell be troden vnder foote: we in dede haue sinned, we haue ben rebellious against thee, and haue not harkened vnto thy wordes, for which cause we are iustly, and for our euill deserte, thus daily put to confusion and shame. But thou O Lord our God are most iust in all thy workes.
But on the other side Lord, for as much as it belongeth to thy clemency and constancy, to haue mercye, to spare, and most faithfully to kepe thy covenantes and promises, how long Lord: how long wilt thou be angry vnto the end: Remember not our iniquities of olde. wherefore we beseeche thee, that for as much as in these laste times, thou hast by pouring abroad thy plenteous light, (and that being most mighty,) boughsased to make manifest vnto men which lay in darknes, yea more then palpable darknes, the secretes of thy truth: thou woldest once at the length turne away thy wrath and fury from our ingrate mindes, and from the most greuous sinnes, whereby we haue laid forth thy most holy name, and the pure doctrine which we professe, to euil speakings and to blasphemies. And deliuer thy congregation from the contumelies and oppressions of the wicked, which doubtles light not only vpon vs, but also vpon the maiesty of thy name. Although thou of thyne owne nature be ἀσπαστος & ἄβυσσος, that is, vntouchable, and not able to be hurt. Illuminate O most louing Christ, thy face vpon the Church redeamed with thy blood, which is now in a manner vtterly leste desolate.
Thy name only, and not any other mannes name, we call vpon, not vndoubtedly trusting to any our own righteousness, but to thy goodnes only and mercy, that thou woldest either appoynt an end or measure of those euils, and lenify the vexation wherewith we together with our brethren are afflicted, or that thou woldest at the least boughsase to geue vnto the hearts of thine, such faith and constancy, that they fall not away from the profession of true piety, yea rather that they may so nobly and valiantly behaue them selues, that by their exile, imprisonment, pouertye, ignominy, sword, fire, and how cruell so euer kinde of death it be, the liuely knowledge of thy gospell may more and more shine forth, and be made more manifest to the whole world. This kinde of ayde and remeady, (right honorable sir,) is the first, which I see is to be sought for at Gods hands against our euils, and which the holy fathers, prophets, Apostles, and blessed cofessors of the Christian faith, with great fruit bled in their afflictions. wherefore seing that God heard them praying after this maner, or muche like therevnto, let vs in no wise distrust, but that he will also heare vs when as we haue comon with them, one and the selfe same cause, and one and the selfe same God.
Vndoubtedly if he heard them, he will not despise our prayers: but

forasmuch as he is alwayes like vnto himselfe, if he most louingly and with incredible facilitie receaued theyr prayers, he will also fill vs making supplicatiō vnto him, not with a small but with a most ample consolation. The second helpe which is also brought vs from God, and is euery where offered vnto vs, are the holy scriptures, which we ought alwayes to haue in our hands as a present remedy. For if we be infected wth ignorance, there shal we finde light to shake the same off: if we be disturbed with sundry perturbations, and languishing affectes of the mind, and if also we be vexed with the conscience of most greuous sinnes, in them are offered vnto vs remedies both easy & ready: if we be oppressed and in a maner ouerwhelmed with the troubles and greues of outward thinges, there shal we finde sound and firme consolation: if we be sometymes in a perplexitye, not knowinge in thinges doubtfull whiche way to turne our selues, we can in no other place better then there, finde good and faithfull counsell: if we be tempted, and be in daunger (as it oftentimes happeneth) of our saluation, there we haue a most strong & most sure place of refuge. And doubtles our latter David, drue out from no els where, but out of this scrippe, most small stones of the word of God, wherewith he smote the forehead of Goliath, and selled to the ground Sathan, by whome he was tempted in y<sup>e</sup> desert. Wherfore the first David, not without iust cause wrote that he considered wonderfull things touching the lawe, that is touching the scriptures of God, and that he had hidden in his hart the worde of God, to the ende he might not sinne against him, and this word he confessed to be his consolation in affliction, for that the wordes of GOD quickened him. What should a man seke farther: here out doe flow the fountaines of our Sauour, and we are all invited, freelye to drinke water out of them, whereby our intollerable thirste is quenched and satisfied with a singular desire to obtaine blessednes. Here haue we a storehouse of GOD full stuffed with the plenty of all good things, and set abrod wyde open for vs, therout may euery man prouide for his owne want. Here is layde for vs a table most plentifullye furnished, where the wisdom of God hath mingled for vs most pleasant wyne, wherewith euery man may most penitentlye refresh him. Here is set forth for euery man a garden and paradise more pleasant then the garden of Alcinous & Salomon. Wherfore let vs gather out of it things profitable & not hurtful. Let vs rather imitate y<sup>e</sup> bees then y<sup>e</sup> spiders, in sucking out the most sweete iuyce, and not the deadly payson. We vse commonly with an incredible study to embrace bookees set forth by any industry of man, wherout yet we attayne nothing els, but a meane how either to defend or to recouer health, or a way to encrease thinges domesticall, or rules to gouern a commonwealth, or institutions of husbandry or of other artes, or some entisements to pleasures: how much more is it profitable for vs with our whole hart to apply our selues to the reading of the holy scriptures: forasmuch as in them speaketh not vnto vs humane wisdom, but God himselfe, vnto whome vndoubtedly if we hearken & geue hede

we shall receaue a singular alacrity and chearfulness of mynd; we shall drive away heavy cogitations, we shalbe eased and lightened with a most sweete consolation, and shall put on strength aboue mans reach, we shall now thinke nothing hard or difficill, we shall thinke the yoke of the Lord and his crosse to be thinges most light, and shall offer our selues most redy for his name sake to suffer any thing, yea and being instructed with heavenly eloquence, we shall talke vnto men not with the wordes of men, but with the wordes of God himselve. Doubtles I know that there are many, which beleue not these thinges, and that there are not a few which deride them and thinke that we are out of our wits, but I would gladly desire these men to vouchesafe once to make a profe, & beseech them not to disdayne to reade. I dare sweare, and that vpon my greatesse perill, that they shall at one tyme or other be taken. They shal at the length feele how much these thinges diuine differ from humans thinges. They shall feele I say, if they reade attentiuely & diligently, that at the length thorough the mercy of God these scourges of feare and shame are encreased in their senses: they shall feele them selues to be effectually perswaded, once at the length to dye vnto death, that they may liue to life: they shall feelee also themselves smitten with an horror of their sinnes and pleasures past, when as before in them they thought themselves blessed, & happy. They shal feelee that the whole misery of this carnall life, is heaped vp before their eyes, and they being tormented with the bitter feeling thereof, it will cause to burst forth out of their eyes greatesse showers, and mighty floods of teares, for the oracles and wordes of GOD, when they are earnestly read, and deapely considered, do not slightly nippe the mind, but do most deapely digge into the hart with most sharpe piches, and therout after a sort plucking vp by the rootes vices, & wicked actes, do in their place plant peace of conscience and spirituall ioye: they shal also at the length feele kindled in them the wonderful and most pleasant loue of the sweetenes & goodnes of God. Wherefore they being thus vtterly changed, shalbe compelled to say that which Dauid excellently well recordeth: How sweete are thy wordes made to my iawes, they were sweeter vnto my mouth then hony. But of such an helpe, then which can nothing be found more diuine and more heathfull, are those men depriued, whiche ether will not read Gods booke at all, or els reade them with a certayne disdayne, lothelommes and contempt, so that they haue no feale to the wordes of GOD, but thorough theyr owne proper deuises, their mind is vtterly caried to other matters. Of which impiety and wickednes God in y<sup>e</sup> Prophet Osea the 8. chapter greauously accuseth Israell saying, I haue writtten to them the greatesse things of my lawe, but they were coucted as a strange thing. Doubtles those children are to much degenerated, which count that voyce where-with theyr most louing parent calleth vpon them to liue godly and vertuously, for a strange voyce: and contrariwise do folow as theyr owne and proper voyce that which is in very dede a strang voyce: and so it cometh to passe, that after the maner of beels they reuse sweete sauiors, and go to stinking donghils. Therefore it is not to be meruailed at, if they were rotte in the filthy puddle of worldly pleasures, if they be burnt by wyth unwoorthy and filthy cares, If they dyspayre in aduerities, and if at the laste they perishe in sinnes, and in a lyfe altogether corrupted. In summe as touching the holy scriptures, I may iustly pronounce (although somewhat inuerred) that which Demosthenes affirmed of money, namely, that with the word of God ought al things to be done, and without the same can be done nothing that is good. But what go I about? Do I take vpon me to set forth the commendacions and prayses of y<sup>e</sup> holy scripture? This doubtles is not my purpose, but hauing mencioned a part many thinges, which both engender a encrease my sorow & grieve, I thought good to adde remedies which I saw were geue of God agaynst the same grieve: namely, holy prayers, & reading of y<sup>e</sup> holy scriptueres. These thinges, as they are the weapons of Christians, especially in those troublesome times of theirs, so (right honorable & worthy sir) there was no nede that you should with many wordes be by me admonished of them: when as I am not ignorant, what your piety and learning is, and how redy and well in bre you are in either kind of those actions. Therefore it may seme that I ought rather to haue shewed this, how you thorough these most excellent aydes, haue bene holpen euen to this time hitherto, and that not only thereby you susteyne your selfe, but also become euery day better, wiser, and stronger. Howbeit this feared me away from doing so, for that I thought it not good to molest your eares, for I know that it is much agaynst your will to heare your owne prayses. Neither doubtles is it nedefull to set forth your vertues chiefly of this kind, when as it is well known and vnderstanded of all men, that with out such aydes you had neuer been able to reach to y<sup>e</sup> excellency of Christian vertue, of the knowledge of thinges diuine and humane, of holy conuersation and of notable valiantnes and perseuerance in the confession of the true fayth. To what purpose then haue I written these thinges? To this end vndoubtedly, that writing vnto you touching the, I might instruct, teach, and comfort others which should read them, and therewithall set forth vnto them a man, which continually bring the aydes before set forth, doth both offer vnto God most acceptable sacrifices, and also comforteth and strengthneth himselfe in the Lord, and moreouer geueth a singular example to others for the wel ordering of thinges in the pure and sincere religion of Christ. I for my part doubtles haue euen since the time that I dwelt in England, borne a singular loue, and no smal or bulgar affection to wards you, both for your singular piety and learning, and also for the worthy office, which you faythfully & with great renoume executed in the christia publike wealch, in instructing Edward, that most holy king and most worthy to be beloued, whose wit, goodnes, religion, and other vertues heroical, yea rather Christian, may indede be touched, but can neuer be praysed according to theyr desert. Therefore when in that realme, and in that office I began to loue you (right honoable sit) and affected God by his singular providence which he bleth in the government and administration of things pertaining to his, so wrought, that I saw you againe in Germanie, and knew you to be even the selfe same man you were before, I was so affect-ted where as before I did indeede loue you, yet now I do most feruently loue. wherefore I oftentimes thought with my selfe, how I might once in some thing if it were possible, signifie and testifie, both how much I esteeme your vertues, and how gratefull I am towardses you, for the benefites which you somtymes have bestowed vpon me: but to accomplish this I had for a long ceason no occasion offered vnto me. I happened afterward to come to Tigure, but since my departure from you, that selfe same cogitatio neuer went out of my minde. Yea rather I alwayes thought it my part once at the length to pay vnto your honour, that whiche unwitting vnto you I had in my minde with a good will promised vnto it. wherefore minding now to put abroad my commentaries vpon the Epistle of Paul to the Romanes, I thought it good to set them forth vnder the protection of your name: and fully perswade my selfe that you will take it in good part. Although at the first you can not but wonder, and peraduenture take it ill, for thinges which are not loked for, and which happen besides expectation, do commonly cause admiration. And we see that a light gift, and such a gift which turneth rather to a burthen, then to honour, is many tymes not so wel accepted. wherefore I hartely beseeche your honour to pardon my boldnes, which I cannot tel whether others will call rashnes. And I thinke that that thyng which I haue besides your knowledge thought vpon, came from the spirite of God, which gouerneth our hartes: and receiue this booke dedicated of me vnto you with the same fauour, wherewith that your most worthy and deare pupill Edward king of England not long since receiued my other Commentaries vpon the first epistle to the Corinthians: and conceaue that my minde was by this dedication (how meane soeuer it be) to ioyne you a scholemaster of much renowne, and a scholer of most excellency. Doubtles by the authoritie of the king I taught at Oxford in his last tyme, those thinges which you shall here read, and when it was not onely required, but also begged at my handes to put abroad this worke, I yelded thereto. But considering that it was due to some man of the English nation, I thought you a man most mete, to whom it might be geuen in the stede of the king now dead. wherefore I earnestly desire you to take that which I haue done not in ill part, but in good, neither thinke that I ment to burthen or to charge you, but rather after a sort to couple you together with my king and yours, and in some part to answer vnto your deserts both towards religion, and towards my selfe. I know doubtles that the thinges which are here taught of me, will not make you either much lesse neder, or much better: for you both know them already, and also as much as the state of this flesh will suffer do expresse them in your maners and life. But forasmuch as all are not come so farre, I desire and beseech God the father of our Lord Jesus

The Epistle dedicatory.

Jesus; that the thinges whiche are put abroad vnder your name, may at the least be profitable vnto others; though you your selfe litle nede them, and that they may enioy the fruite hoped for. For my earnest desire is that these my writings may serue to the vse of the Church of Christ: My desire is to confirme, to amplifie and to illustrate the Gospel of the sonne of God: My desire is to establish the weake in fayth, and playnly to instruct the vniuersed. And that I may attayne to these thinges, I most earnestly require of you, by your most faythfull supplications and prayers at Gods hand to obteyne them: but I am aserid lest you or some other, should aske me: what neded you at this time to take such great paynes in the interpreting of this epistle? Did you thinke that we wanted expositors either old or new? Doubtles you were not ignorant of the, wheras you so often in your commentary alledge both Greke and latine fathers: neither can you dissemble that you haue not sene the latter writers for in some places you so follow and treade their steps, that it playnly appeareth that they are after a sort red in your writings. To these thinges first I answered, that I did not at the first take in hand this charge to write an exposition vpon this epistle, for I knew right well that the fathers both Grekes and latines haue with great labour and fruite exercised themselves herein. Neither was I ignorant that there are of the latter writers, which haue done the same. First Phillip Melancthon, a notable man, who elegantly and with an exquisite methode hath more then once explained this epistle. Afterward Martin Bucer, a man not onely endued with singular pietie and incomparable learning, but also so long as he liued coupled with me in most deare frendship, set forth vpon the selfe same epistle a large and learned commentary. And I had red also two other most shining lightes of the church, Bullinger, I say, and Caluine, both most faithfull pastors, the one of the church of Tigure, the other of the church of Genena, ether of which men hath with great trauaile to the great profite of the flocke of Christ set forth most excellent and most learned commentaries vpon all the epistles of the apostle: but it is not my entent in this place to collect and celebrate the prayses and vertues of all these men. And I knew that there haue bene others and that not a few whose learned trauailes vpon this epistle of Paul haue bene set abroad, and therefore there was no cause (as I said) why I shoulde take vpon me the trauaile to frame a new interpretation, when as other men had in this kind of speaking sufficiently and aboundantly trauayled. But thus stode the case, when in England, during the time of the Gospel I was appointed to teach at Oxford: I publicly interpreted the first epistle to the Corinthians, and also this epistle to the Romanes, & as the maner is, I privately collected those interpretations which I daily vled, which afterward, by the earnest sute of others I was compelled to put abroad, and to make common to all men those thinges which I had noted for my selfe alone or a few of my frendes: wherefore that whiche I tooke not in hand to any such purpose rather to the contrary, first God, and then

then & instant desires of men, haue brought to this point: namely, & those things which were at the beginning destined to be familiar and priuate scholles, should be turned into commentaries. Neither do I professe my selfe to haue bene only author, a finder out of all those things which I haue by this epistle written. For I haue ben in many things excellently wel holpe by the old writers in especial, and also no lesse by the new, such as I haue before mencioned, vnto whome yet though I haue not bene enery way and in all thinges agreeable, yet haue I not done that either of a corrupt affect of the mind, or of a desire to gaynesay, or of a lust to reprove any man: but for that I iudged otherwise of some certayne thinges then they did: which I doubt not seing it was done with a good mind, shall also be taken in good part, when as by this meanes is not broken the vnitie of the Church, neither is any part of my good will & reuerence towards the thereby empayred or diminished.
Secondly this I thinke to helpe to the defence of this my edition, for that the fruitfulness of the holy scriptures is so great, that it can not all whole be drawn out of any man, though he be neuer so wise, learned, wittie, and industrious. Wherefore this is earnestly to be wished for, that all men might prophesie, to the end that those vnumerable riches which still lye hidden in the mines of y word God, and in the hidden baines of the holy booke, may with great study be digged out. Which thing as I to my power haue taken vpon me to do, so I besech the sonne of God, that others may succede, which may picke out gold and siluer much more pure then mine, that vpon Christe the only foundation of our fayth may be built most perfect doctrine to the commoditie of the Church. Now should rest for me somewhat to speake of the worthines, commodities, and content of this epistle: but I thinke it good at this time to leue the matter vntouched, partly for that these thinges are in a maner knowen to all men: and partly for that in the preface we haue spoke so much as we thought sufficient touching this matter, and touching a few other thynges pertayning to the same. Wherefore omitting them at this present, this agayne I desire and require at your handes (right honorable and worthy sir) that you would bouchsafe to accept my small gift, as a moste certaine pledge of my loue and affection towarde you, neither take it in ill part, that with my bolde offer, I presume to trouble your honour.

I Fare you well, and God send you as you haue begon long to liue to our Lord Iesu Christ the sonne of God and redemer of mankind. Written in my study at Tigre the Kalēdes of August. 1558.

The Preface, wherein is set forth the dignitie, utilitie, and summe of the Epistle to the Romanes, and consequently of the whole doctrine of Paul.

Pf the dignity of a booke should Depend of the prayle of the writer, then Chrysostome, then a great many others had bestowed a necessary tra- uayle, which haue set forth Paul with wonderfull prayles. But bycause that the holy ghost is the au- thor of this epistle to the Romanes, and Paul is on- ly the writer thereof, therefore I will the more spa- ringly touch his prayles. The Lord called him a vessel, which in the Hebrew phrase is an organ or instrument, elected whereby his name should be spread abroad thoroughout the whole world. And the name of the Lord we know is Iesus Christ. Rather did Paul preach amongst the Gentiles these let- ters only or wordes or soundes, but also those things whiche are by them signified: namely that Iesus Christ is the sauour of mankind, also our wisdom, righteousness, and sanctificati- on, and finally whatsoever good thing we haue. And forasmuch as we come of the stocke of the Gentiles, we right chiefly to hearken vnto him, which aboute others was appoynted the maister and Apostle of the Gentiles, and was thereunto sepe- rated from his mothers wombe. And as valiant souldiers, and couragious hoiles, when they heare theyr trumpet blow, do erect themselves do make redy theyr wea- pons, neyther can theyr force be restrayned: so ought we, when Paul is recited, or whē we rede him by our selues, to erect our minds, and all our motions, endeuors & appetites to the obedience of God, as men which fele our selues stirred vp by our owne trumpet. And to what office this Apostle was appointed, he declared in the Actes of the apostles when he made his oration to Agrippa the king: when he sayd, the lord had said vnto him, For to this end haue I appeared to thee, to appoint thee a mini- ster and a witnes, both of those things which thou hast sene, and of those things in which I will appeare vnto thee, deliuering thee from the people and nations, to whome I now send thee: that thou mayst open theyr eyes, that they may be conuerted from darkenes to light, and fro the power of Sathan to God: that they may receaue forgeuenes of sinnes, and inheritance amongst them which are sanctified by fayth in me. And with how great diligence Paul executed this office, it is manifest, when as towards the end of this epistle he writeth, that from Jerusalem to Illyricum, he had filled all the pla- ces rounde about, with the Gospel. which thing he with so feruent a minde per- formed, that in the 10. chapter of the Actes he in effect spake these wordes to the E- phesians, I haue by the space of three yeares preached the Lord, and that night and day, with many teares, and haue opened vnto you all the counsel of God: I haue not coueted any mans gold or siluer amongst you, these handes haue ministred to my necessities, and to the that were with me. These wordes haue a wonderful emphasis: He sayth that he had preached vnto them not one day or twayn, but whole 3. yerres: not by turnes & times, but night & day: not with a cold affection, but with many teares: not guile- fully or disceitfully, for he opened vnto the all the counsel of God: not in a quiet & peace- able state, when as the Hebrues sought sundry and manifold ways to destroy him: neither had he a regard to his owne thinges, when as he desired nothing that per- tained to any man: neyther finally tooke he small paynes in this office, when as with his owne handes he gotte thinges necessary both for himselfe and his. These thinges can not we without shame heare, which so leue destitute our wiues, chil- dren, family, frendes, kinsfolkes, and cosins, and finally all those with whome we are conuersant, that we neuer at any time preach either Christ or his doctrine vnto the: vnto whō yet we ought most feruently to preach. For we are no lesse Apostles to these, then Paul was appointed for the Gentiles. And whē as he sayth he had ope- ned vnto the all the counsels of God, it is to be wonderd at, how that many will so with tooth and nayle hold fast thinges as necessary to saluation, which we know of what Bishoppes of Rome, and of what counsels, & of what decrees of men they were brought in, and are not prescribed vnto vs of Paul, nor of any part of the holy scripture. Paul for the better executing of his office, contēned wonderful great dan- gers: and where he saw the gate open thither he slackd not to go, although he had many aduersaries which sought to withstand him. He was made all thinges to all men, to the Jewes a Jew, and to those that were without the law, as one that wanted wanted the law: Yea and to the Ethnikes, whē as they had no skill in the prophets neither had any knowledge in the scriptures, he cited verses out of theyr poets, as out of Aratus, Menander, and Epinemides. And the same Paul was not ascerd to go vnto Jerusalem to conferre the Gospel with the chiefe Apostles, not as though he had small confidence in his doctrine, which he had receaued from the Lord out of heauen: for he had an assured persuasion, and as the Greecians say such a πληροφορία, that he pronounced him to be Anathema or accursed, which preached any other Gospel: neither as touching this thing spared he the angels. Neither is it any inuail, for such a certaintie sayth requireth. wherefore we learne, that Counsells are not to this end to be called, as though our sayth ought to depend of theyr determinations: but that there we should make manifest, that those thinges which we beleue exactly agree with the holy scriptures, and playnly to proue the same to our aduersaries. Neither is there any more fruite or comodity therehence to be looked for. The louing mercy also of God provided, that that also turned to good to y Church that Paul had at the beginning so vehemently persecuted it. For they which afterward saw him suddenly conuerted vnto Christ, could not beleue, that this could haue happened with out the mighty power of God. For as a man doth not vpon the so-dayne become most vile, so also is not a man of a wicked man straight way made most holy, vnles the Spirit of God worke the same. Paul was none of the common and meane sort, he was not an obstinate Jewe, which wanted learning and knowledge, but he was most studious in the law: neither had he bent his study to it only, but also applied himselfe to the traditions of the fathers. And thereof it came, that he persecuted the Church of Christ. For if he had geuen himselfe to the law of God only, without adding vnto it the leuen of humane traditions, he should the easelie haue acknowledged Christ. But whosoener haue addicted themselves to humane traditions, they must nedes be persecuters of the Church of Christ. They say that Paul did these thinges of a good pretence, and not of an euill purpose, but of an holy entent (as they vse to speake) For my part as I confesse, that this somewhat diminisheth the greuousnes of the sinne both before God and before man (for I do not make all sinnes a like) so also affirme I that the case is thereby the more dangerous. For they which sinne vnder the shew of holines, and vnder a goodly pretence, and not of an euill purpose, do with the more difficulty retorne agayne into the right way, for that they are farre of to vnderstand that they sinne. wherefore in that case there uereth the wonderfull great mercy and helpe of God. But this is all y I mind at this time to write touching Paul.

Now in what order his epistles were written, Chrysostome as I thinke hath sufficiently shewed. From whome herein only I disagree, that I thinke that the Epistle to the Galathians was written at Rome. For that in it he vehemently reproveth the obseruers of the rites of the old law: touching which matter he spake more gently in those epistles which he had before written, and in those which were the last he wrote when he was at Rome. For that at the beginning he thought it good somewhat a while to beare with their infirmity, whom he thought mought be won vnto Christ, vntill they were better instructed. But when he afterward vnderstode that the deuill abused this gentlenes, so that by his fall apostles he obtunded y obseruation which was then but permitted, as a thing necessary to saluation, as though Christ with out it were not sufficient, he began more vehemently to resist, so that he sayd: If ye be circumcised, Christ is nothing profitable vnto you: & other thinges which were more sharply written to the Galathians the here in this Epistle. The scribe which wrote this epistle as Paul endited it, was named Tertius: and he sent these letters fro the port Cenchries, which is not farre distant from Corinth, & they were caried to Rome by a Christian woman called Phoebe. The occasion that moued him to write this epistle was this: The nation of the Jewes as they had a great pride in themselves, so also they alwayes enuied other nations. wherefore at the beginning many of them would not haue had the grace of the Gospel of Iesus Christ communicated but only to the Jewes. And they thought, although falsly, that the promises were deu only to the seede of Abraham as touching the flesh. Moreover forasmuch as they iudged that the Gospel was to be distributed according to the dignity of the receauers, and they saw that the Gentiles were prophane and wonderfully addicted to idolatry, they thought them to be unworthy one whom should be bestowed so great a benefit. Yea and the Apostles stayed long, before they went to the Gentiles: although they had heard that Christ gave them in charge to go to all nations, and to preach the Gospel to euery creature. Neither as I suppose wanted there some which went about to auoyde these commandemēt, thinking that the Apostles should go to diuers nations, to the end to preach Christ to the Jewes which

which were dispersed thorough out the whole world, and not to the Ethiopes and that which was spoken to all creatures they contracted to the Jewes: for that al the earth is sometimes called that part only which pertayned to Jewes. But the Apostles being illustrated with the holy ghost were neuer infected with this error. Howbeit they differed the going to the gentiles, for that they knew that the gospel should first be preached in Jewry, and they knew not how long they should abide there. Wherefore they waited to haue geuen vnto them from God an assured signe when they should goe: which the expectation was satisfied. For the lord by a vision shewed vnto Peter that the nations were sanctified when he sayd vnto him: Say not thou that that is common, which God hath sanctified: and he impelled him to goe to Cornelius the Centurion: vnto whome, when he had heard the word of the Gospel, God by a visible signe communicated the holy ghost. These were manifest tokens, that the calling of the Gentiles should no longer be differed. Of this, which I haue spoken, the Acts of the Apostles beare witness: in which also we read, that the Apostles & the disciples, that were at Jerusalem, wondered, that the Gentiles had receaued the holy ghost. And Peter was accused by reason of Cornelius the Centurion, for that he hadde gone to the Gentiles. But he defended himselfe both in declaring vnto them the vision whereby he was admonished, and also shewing vnto them, that the holy ghost had visibly fallen vpon those Ethiopes. We read also that after the death of Stephen many of the beleuers went to Antioch, and to Cyprus, and to other places of the Gentiles, but yet taught not Christ but only to the Jewes. But when they now by Peters oration manifestly vnderstoode that they should no longer stay from admitting the Gentiles, they thought that though they were put downe from the first steppes yet they would stay in the second, namely, to lay vpon the neck of the Gentiles conuerred, the yoke of the law. There were doubles Jewes dispersed thorough out the whole world, to whome the pharisees and priests sent letters not to admitte the doctrine of Christ. But they which were now Christians, but yet not thoroughly instructed, wrote, that Christ indeede is to be receaued, but yet together with him it behoued them to receaue the ceremonies of the law of Moses. Hereof sprang no smal trouble, and the state of the Church was at that time very vnquiet: this was the cause why Paul reprimanded Peter. And the same Paul consented, to circumcisse Timothee, to polle his hed in Leenchies, and to offer in the temple at Jerusalem a gift, as though he had made a vow. This therefore was the occasion that moued the Apostle to write this epistle to the Romaines: which were sicke of the same disease, that the Galathians were afterward infected with. Howbeit the condition and state of ech of these nations was not alike. For the Galathians were first well instructed of Paul, whome afterward the false Apostles and lieng preachers corrupted. But contrariwise the Romaines were not at the beginning well taught: and as it should seme, they receaued together with Christ much of the leuen of Moses: but when they knew the falsshode, they repented: wherefore they sayth is much commended. But by whome they were first brought to the sayth, many put great doubt. That Peter went thither and was there sayne for Christis sake, I will not deny, when as in a manner all the fathers and the ecclesiasticall histories testifie the same. Howbeit it is not very likely that the Romaines were by him first brought to the sayth. But peradventure they by this meanes came to the sayth, for that now a great multitude of the Hebrewes were come to Rome, partly being brought thither by Pompey, and partly by reason Jewry was now in subiect to the Romaines and was brought into the forme of a prouince. And amongst others many of the saythfull remoued thither. Touching Priscilla and Aquila it is very manifest by the last chapter of this epistle. By these and such other like of the saythfull, the Gospel mought there haue had beginning, but not without contesuer touching the ceremonies of the law. Some haue by reason of these things take occasion to withholden men from studieng of this epistle: and haue said, that from the first chapter to the end it is worthy to be read, for that there is set forth an excellent instruction touching manners. But vnto that chapter, so far as as (say they) there is nothing entered of, but only strifes and contentions concerning the ceremonies of the law, it serueth litle to our vse to knowe them, for that they conduce not to our times, wherein are utterly remoued away the ceremonies of the Jewes. But these men are farre deceaued themselves, and like also to deceaue others. For the whole epistle doubtles is a golden epistle, and most worthy to be read: It containeth places touching naturall knowledge, and civil duties, touching the law of Moses, and touching the Gospel: it expoundeth instruction and original sinne: it setteth forth grace, it entreateth of election, predestina-tion, the execution of the Jewes, and of the restoring of them agayne. From the twelfth chapter it containeth what kind of sacrifice we ought to offer, and en-createth touching the magistrate, and touching bearing with the weake, and removing away offence. And who seeth not that these are great matters and most profitable to be knowne? But whereas they object vnto vs, that as touching the first part is entreated of ceremonies I graunt indeede, that by the meanes of them the question began first, which Paul seeking to dissolve reduced it to the genus of generall word. And to declare that we can not be iustified by the ceremonies of the law, he proueth generally that iustification can not come of any our workes. And so when he had taken away the genus, the species of parts could by no meanes consist. For it followeth. we are iustified by no workes, therefore, neyther by ceremoniall workes, nor by morall workes, nor by iudiciall workes. And that the reasons of Paul extend so farre I will proue by these arguments following. First he teacheth that we are iustified by faith, and by the mercy of God, that the promise might be firme. But that promise is not firme if it depend eyther of the execution of ceremonies, or of the obseruation of the ten commaundments: for that we are as touching each part a like weake. Moreover he sayth, that we are iustified freely, which word, freely, is of no effect vnles we exclude morall workes. For he which worketh, vnto him reward is rendered according to debt and not according to grace. Afterward he entreateth of the obseruation of that law, by which we haue the knowledge of sinne, which thing belongeth rather to morall precepts, then to ceremonies. This is the law which worketh anger: neyther doubt we, but that God is more prouoked to anger, if we transgresse the ten commaundments, then if we offend in certayne rites and ceremonies. And moreover Paul putteth our iustification to consist of the grace and mercy of God, to the end our boasting should be excluded. But if thou remove away ceremonies only, and say that we are iustified by morall workes, boasting is not taken away: for we may at the least boast of them. Farther it is certayne, that the ceremonies of Moses pertayned to the first table where the worshipping of God is commaunded. Neyther were the elders any lesse bound to these ceremonies, then we are at this daye bounde to receaue baptisme and the Eucharist. And if Paul proue that we are not iustified by those thinges which pertayn to the first table: much more then is it proued that we can not attayne vnto righteousness by the workes of the latter table. Paul, when he had declared that we are now by the benefit of Christ free from the law, objecteth vnto himselfe, Let vs sinne more freely, and abide in sinne, that grace may the more abound. If the question had bene moued touching ceremonies only, he mought haue answered: ye are not deliuered but only from ceremonies, ye are still bound to the morall law. But he maketh no such answer, but sayth, that we ought to sinne no more for that we are now dead vnto sin, and grafted into Christ, and buried together with him. And the same Paul when he wrote, that by the fauor of Christ we are deliuered and absolved from those thinges, which in our flesh resist the law of God, expressedly declared of what law he entreated. For he made mention of that commaundment, Thou shalt not lust. Lastly in the epistle to the Galatians, where he entreateth of the selfesame matter, he pronounceth him accursed which abideth not in all the thinges which are written in the booke of the law. when he saith, all, doubtles he excludeth not morall workes. wherefore this disputation of the Apostle is not superfluous. Yea rather vnles he had taken it in hand, the liberty of the Church had bene put in great danger, which the deuill sought to bring vnder the law, as though Christ of himselfe were not sufficient to iustifie men. And the reasons which are particularly brought in touching ceremonies are not superfluous. For by the selfesame reasons we may proue that mens traditions, and the rites which men haue appoynted vnto vs, are not such worship-pinges of God, as can not be changed, nor omitted, if they shall seme not to conduce to saluation. For these thinges much les pertayne to the obteyning of righteousness, then do the ceremonies instituted by God himselfe. wherefore if these auayle not to righteousness then can not those of necessity be required vnto it. Thou wilt demanda peraduenture, whether bicause of these reasons of the Apostle, we ought to thinke our selues losed from all manner of law. Not so vndoubtedly, neyther doth this follow of his sayinges: vnles thou vnderstand that we are free and losed from the law in respect that we can not be iustified by it. Otherwise we ought to obey it, and to the vttermost of our power to labour to execute it, but yet not with this purpose to seke thereby to be iustified. And as touching the ceremonies of the old law, two extreme errors are to be take heed of, the one is of the Ebionites and others, which Jewishly sought to toyne of necessity the ceremonies of Moses to Christ. Contrariwise the other extreme error is of the Marcionites, which affirmed that the old law was not given of a good God, but of an evil governor, the maker of this world. We saile in the midst betwene these extremities, and affirme, that now after Christ, the ceremonies of the law are not still to be kept, when as they time is now expired. Howbeit we commend them, as thinges which in the time of the fathers before Christ came, were good: and we beleue that they were instituted by the selfe same God, which is the father of our lord Jesus Christ. But to make the discourse of the first part more playne, and vniuersally the vtility of the whole epistle, we will briefly touch the summe thereof, that it being in that maner layd before our eyes, the whole epistle may haue the more light.

The Preface.

Two errors to be taken heed of, as touching the olde law.

Brief content of the whole Epistle.

In the first chapter is set forth vnto vs, how that neyther naturall knowledge nor ciuill offices could by any meanes iustifie men: for that it is evidently shewed that men endewed with them, liued drowned in most horrible sinnes: whiche thing shoulde not haue happened, if by these thinges they had bene iustified.

The first chapter.

In the second chapter the Jewes are made equall with the Gentiles, whose life accused as most corrupt: for that they preached that a man should not steale, and yet stole, that a man should not commit adultery, and yet committed adultery, that a man should not commit sacrilege, and yet committed it himselfe. By which it is manifest, that the law which they had receaued brought them not to iustification.

In the third chapter lest he might seme to deface the law, he confesseth that it was an excellent gift of God: but yet not of that kind, that it could iustifie. He attributeth vnto it other offices, namely, to bring forth the knowledge of sinne. And so he reduceth both the Jewes and the Gentiles to one Christ, as to the fountayne and authoꝝ of all righteousness. And yet notwithstanding he doth not by this meanes he sayeth violate or ouerthrowe the law, but most of all establishe it.

In the fourth chapter, he proueth the selfe same thing which he had before put forth, by the example of Abraham, who before woꝝkes, and before he had receaued circumcision, was for this cause pronounced iust, for that he beleued the promise of God. This doubtes was imputed to him to righteousness. And to confirm the same he bringeth a testimony of Dauid who saith, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven and whose sinnes are couered. Blessed is the man to whome the Lord hath not imputed sinne. Which chapter if he diligently peysed, we shall find, that in it the Apostle in a maner ten times useth this word of Imputation. Wherfore it ought not to seme so strange, if we also vse it, when we affirme that concupiscence left in vs after baptisme is sinne, although it be not imputed vnto sinne: and although we are not able to get vnto our selues that righteousness, which is the true righteousness before God, yet if we beleue in him, the righteousness of Christ is imputed vnto vs.

In the fifth chapter, after that this righteousness of Christ is apprehended by faith, many thinges are declared touching it: that is, that it is firme, and enbraceth Christ, who died for the weak, for enemies, wicked men, and sinners. And in it is set forth a comparison of Christ with Adam. For euen as by him all our kind was vitiated and corrupted, so by Christ are all the elect renewed: yea rather Christ is sayd to ouerpasse Adam. For he by one sinne infected all men: but infinite sins were not able to resist Christ, but that he performed that redemption which his will was to performe. Yea he so vled this euill, that he gaue the plentifulter grace, where the greater plenty of sinnes raigned.

The fifth chapter.

In the sixth chapter he ouerthroweth the importunate obiection of diuers which hereof inferred that we should sinne freely, and liue loosely, if, as the Apostle had sayd, greater grace should there be rendred, where were found more sinnes. The Apostle answereth, that they collection was not good, soasmuch as we are dead vnto sinne and grafted into Christ, we ought vndoubtedly to liue vnto him and not to iniquity.

The sixth chapter.

In the seventh chapter he declareth the maner how we are exempted from the law. And that is, that soasmuch as in vs whilest we liue here is not a full perfect regeneration, and corrupt affections do continually resist the lawes of God, by the grace of Christ is brought to passe, that we are deliuered from sin, although it perpetually inhabite in our members, and in our flesh.

The seventh chapter.

Whereof he concludeth in the eighth chapter, that there is no condemnation

The eighth chapter.

to those which are in Christ Jesus, neyther walke they according to the flesh. For they haue the spirite of Christ, whereby they both liue and also are made partakers of the resurrection to come: they mortifye the deedes of the flesh, and in themselves they haue witnes of the selfe same spirite, that they are the children of God, and by the selfe same spirite they are confirmed in aduersities, to suffer them with a constat and valiant mind: and they haue this spirite making intercession for them, & which draweth them to expresse the similitude of the image of the sonne of God: and at the last bringeth to passe that they can neyther be acculed nor condemned before God.

The ninth chapter.

In the ninth chapter he answereth vnto the Jewes, which contended that these promises were bestowed vpon theyr nation only, and were not powred vpon the Gentiles. Vnto whome he sayth that touching this inatter all thinges are done by the election of God, whereby he hath mercy on whome he will, and whome he will he hardneth. And he compareth God to a potter, who of one and the selfe same clay maketh some vessels to honour, and some to contumely.

The tenth chapter.

In the tenth chapter he entreateth of the effectes of thys election, namely, that some embrace sayth: and other some reiect it. And he also declareth that Christ is the end of the law, and that the law requirerth this, that we should beleue in Christ. And hereby he proueth that the Jewes attayned not to righteousness, for that they went about to obtayne it by their owne merites, and by their owne workes: but the Gentiles attayned vnto it, for that they claue vnto sayth: And all those thinges he confirmeth by the oracles of God, that the Jewes (I say) were made blynde, and that the Gentiles were receaued.

In the eleventh chapter he mitigateth that hard reprobation of the Jewes which he had set forth, and declareth, that not all utterly were reiectred, but putteth them in good hope, that for asmuch as their roote is holy, many also of that nation shalbe holy: howbeit they are in the meane tyme excluded as touching vs, which were wilde Oliue trees, that we might be grafted into the good Oliue tree. And after that this is accomplished, they shall agayne be receaued. And so he knitteth vp this discourse, that God hath shunt by all vnder sinne: and he is compelled at the length to cry out. O the depth of the wisdom of the riches. &c.

Thys controuersy being thus taken vp, he beginneth hys twelfth chapter wth an obsecration, wherein he requirerth vs to offer our bodies a sacrifice most acceptable to God, and to approue the wyll of God, and to haue a care that we agree on with an other, forasmuch as we are one body, and one an others members. He commendeth also vnto vs the loue of our enemyes.

The thirteenth chapter.

In the thirteenth chapter he willet vs to be subiect vnto the Magistrates, to loue our neighbours, to liue iustly, and to put on Christ.

The fourteenth chapter.

In the fourteenth chapter he commendeth vnto vs those that are weake in sayth that we should louingly beare wth them: and that we should as much as is possible see that concord be kept euen towards those which haue but small knowledge, that we should beare wth them, and to take hede, that through our default they be not offended. And on the other syde he commaundeth the weake ones not rashly to iudge the stronger sort.

The fiftene chapter.

In the fiftene chapter he exhorteth to this selfe same thing by an example of Christ who bare vpon hym our contumelies and punishments, and communicated hymselfe not only to the Jewes but also to the Gentiles. He wishteth vnto the Romanes the holyghost, and rendreth vnto them a reason, why he wrote those letters vnto the, he promisseth vnto them hys commyng, & desireth them to pray for hym that he myght be deliuered from the vubelcuers amongst the Jewes which sought hys destruction.

In the sixtene chapter being also the last, he commendeth vnto the Romanes Phebe an holy woman, by whome he had sent vnto them these letters. He most courteously saluteth a great many, and admonisherth them to beware of those which vse doctrine for the comodity of their belly, and for filthy gayne sake. This is a brieft and manifest summe of this whole epistle, which being set forth vnto vs, we shall the more redely interpret eury thing particularly. But still there are many which therfore abhorre from the reading of Pauls epistles, for that he seemeth to speake so rudely and barbarously, that he filleth the readers with tediousnes, neither can men easely come to the sence of them. Vnto these men we answer that Pauls phrase of speech, if we beleue Augustine in hys fourth booke de doctrina Christiana is not vterly wythout iust order of speaking. For that he sought after eloquence, but for that eloquence followed his wisdom. For he is iudged to speake aply, which taketh vpon hym to entreat of thynges most excellent, and speaketh all those thinges which are necessary, neither entreateth of them otherwise then behoueth. Chrysostome

The readers ought not to be offended with Pauls manner of speaking. Augustine in his booke de doctrina Christiana, attributeth vnto Paul a certayne eloquence.

The Preface.

Some in hys fourth booke de Sacerdotio is of the same myde with Augustine: where he maketh a distinction of eloquence, that one is deceitfull, whereat men are amased, when they see that thinges of no force are extolled, and thinges high are plucked downe. This eloquence vseth coloures and deceit. This eloquence finde we not in Paul. There is an other eloquence which is of much force to establish doctrine, and most constantly to defend the truth: and with this chiefly was the Apostle endewed. Wherefore let vs not in him require the pleasant spech of Isocrates, the high stile of Demostenes, the excellent dignity of Plato, or the reuered maiesty of Theucidides, but a bare and simple oration, which cōtaineth the knowledge of thinges most chiefe, and most strongly confirmeth that which it taketh in hand. They which are slouthful and sluggish, pretend at theyr pleasure the vnskilfullnes of Paul: namely, lest doctrine should be required at theyr hands, whē as Paul, as they thinke without it gouerned the Church. But let these men take hede and consider how they deny that Paul was endewed with sharpnes of wit and vehemency of speach, when as in the Actes of the Apostles the 9. chapter it is written, that in the Synagoges he confounded the Jewes, and vtterly vanquished them in his disputacions. And in the 17. chapter it is written, that he so taught, that he continued his preaching euen beyond midnight, as when Eutichus a young man being overcome with slepe fel out of a window into a parter. How was it possible, that he should so long time cōtaine his auditoꝝ, if he spake so barbarously or vnaptly as these men imagine he did? It is manifest by the selfe same chapter, that he delt at Athenes with the Stoykes and Epicures: & there is none which is in his right wittes which will not wonder at his preaching which is described that he had there. He was also of the men of Licaonia taken for Mercury, by reason of his eloquence of speach. And if thou say, these thinges indeede are true, for that such giftes were byrthed into him by the holy ghost: let it be so as thou sayst: therefore his phrase of speach is not to be reprobued, as a thing euery way vnapt and barbarous. And yet doth it not thereof follow, that therto he added no endeuor at al to speake aptly. He was very diligēt in reding and writing: which is hereby proued for that being at Rome and being there a prisoner, he desired Timothe to cause to be sent vnto him a sackell with bookes and parchment. For although he were a captiue, yet he would not want the benefite of studieng. And the same Paul writeth to Timothe, to geue himselfe to reading: Which thing if thou doo (sayth he) thou shalt saue thy selfe, and those also which heare thee. Doubtes he would not haue exhorted his scholler to those thinges which he himselfe would not do. By all these thinges it is manifest that Paul wrote not without diligence and vigilant studie. Yea he not without greate fraite attained vnto thre principal poynts pertainyng to eloquence: namely, to deliuer good and holy doctrine, and so confirme the same honestly and holily: to engender delectacion by a cleane and pure kind of speach: and lastly to bow the hartes of the hearers which way he will.

Agaynst these thinges Origen continually complayneth, that Paul hath often darke and vnoꝝderly speeches, and imperfect and mained sentences and other such like kindes of defects. Ierome is diuers, for somtimes he taketh away from him the strength and art of Rethorike and sometime he attributeth it vnto him and especially vpon the sixth chapter to the Galatians, he writeth that Paul indeede in his owne tounge was very skillful, but in a strange tounge he was not able to bring forth depe senses. Which sentence of Ierome I wish to be mitigated. For I thinke that the holy ghost so gouerned the tonges and also the penne of the Apostles, that they most aptly and expessedly haue set forth those thinges which are necessary to saluation. And if at any time they seme to stagger in speaking, that came of the greatnes and deapth of the thinges which they entreated of: which thinges to expresse are very hardly found amongst men mere words and apt phrases. Farther forasmuch as they spake to men as yet very carnall & weake, and of the common sort, they framed themselves to theyr capacite. Touching eche part of this difficulty Origen semeth to bring an apt similitude: That Paul dealt like hym that leadeth a stranger to se the house of some great noble prince. He goeth thorough many parlors, many turninges, many haules, and in a maner infinite chambers: many precious thinges are shewed hym, some at hand and some a farre off: some thinges are hidden, or are shewed only as they passe by: and whilest the stranger is so often brought in at one doze, and led forth at an other doze, he with great admiration beholdeth thinges present only, and is ignorant which way he came thither, or which way to go out. Ierome attributeth vnto the same Paul not the pure Greke tounge, but that tounge of the Cilicians, and that which hath mixed with it the properties of the Hebrew tongue. Yea and the Apostle himselfe seemeth to finde fault with his unskilfulness of speache, although he claime vnto himself, knowledge of thinges. And Peter the Apostle in his latter Epistle, confesseth that Paul hath in his Epistles, many thinges hard to be vnderstanded, which men not very well learned, nor thoroughly strong, wold peruert to theyr destruction. These thinges seeme to be repugnant to that which Augustine and Chrysostome haue written: but they are easily dissolued. For whereas Origen complaineth of the darke, vnoorderly, & imperfect sentēces, it may by this be excused, for that the Apostle went to worke coldly, but wrote with so feruent a mind, that sometimes he may seeme to be rauished beyond himself, and he leauing all other study and care, only hereto endeouored himself, to drawe the hearers vnto Christe, being not very carefull for the fine ioyning together of wordes, but vying most mighty engines to stirre vp, and thoroughly to moue our hearts. And as streames when they swell and rage, cary with them what so euer thinges are in theyr way, not obseruing the disposition of thinges: So in this Apostle the spirit of the Lorde sometimes stirred vp the force of writing and of speaking: in whom these thinges which seeme to be faults in writing and in speaking, were most singular vertues. Touching that which leuane bringeth, I haue already declared my iudgement. But if thou wilt still continue to proue that the Apostle was not able in a straunge tongue to expresse depe sentēces, for that his writings, as Peter said, sometime haue in the great obscuritie: to this we say, that the diuine thinges wherof he entreateth, can not out be hard to our senses. But this ought not to driue vs away from reading of him. For this difficulty as Chrysostome teacheth in those thinges which he wryteth in his Preface before the Epistle to the Romanes, is lenified by daily studyng, and continuall reading: and is so lenified, that he was not afraid to say, that we by our selues without a master, shall be able to vnderstande the thinges which are there entreated of, so that we occupy our selues in these Epistles day and night. For we do not, (sayth he) by the sharpnes of vnderstanding, perse vnto all those thinges which we vnderstand. For euen they also which are of more dull wits, doe by continuall study, attaine to hard thinges. And he bringeth a very apt similitude: The cogitations and senses of a man are most hard to be knowne: yet notwithstanding our friends whome we feruently loue, and with whome we are continually conuersant, doe oftentimes euen by a becke, open vnto vs the cogitations and senses of their minde, without any token of words and speache, by them spoken. So (sayth he,) shall it come to passe in these Epistles, so that a man loue them, and be continually conuersant in them. He which asketh, receiueth, he which seeketh, findeth: vnto him that knocketh, it shall be opened. This spake he to the people, exhorting them to the study of the holy scriptures, which scriptures yet our men at this day like as much as lieth in them to pluck out of the hands of the common people: pretending that there are now many heresies, and therefore it is not very safe nor good for the people to read the holy scriptures. As though Chrysostomes time wanted heresies, and those in dede most pestilent heresies: in whose time the Arrians, the Maniches, the Novatians, the Digenistes and innumerable suche like kinde of pestilences troubled the Church. And the same father in the selfe same place addeth. That of the ignorance of the scriptures spring all maner of euils: and especially he maketh mention of heresies, dissolute life, and vniuersall labours. Wherefore we must not thinke that this diligence to attayne to vnderstand the scriptures, is in the people vaine curiositie, but a profitable study. For the prose wherof, he bringeth an other similitude. Euen as if a man walke without this visible light, he must needs stumble in the dark, and so oftentimes fall, so he which turneth not the eyes of his minde to the light of the scriptures must needs of force sinne. By these thinges maist thou gather, that the difficulty in the writings of Paul ought not to feare away Christians from reading of him.

Touchyng the Licians tongue, which is sometimes objected agaynst the Apostle, thus we may answer. That the holyghost decreed to write those thinges both for the learned and vnllearned. Wherefore it was requisite to vse the common and vulgare speach. For it oftentimes happeneth, that the vnllearned are through too much exquisitnes and fines of speach so hindered, that they are not able to vnderstand the sense or meaning. For remedy agaynst the same, it behoueth that there should be vsed a playne and accustomed kynd of speach. And as touching the learned for it oftentimes happeneth, that they more esteeme thynges beside the purpose and not necessary, neglecting in the meane tyme those thynges which are the principall: and they are so sometymes rauished wth the admiration of that art, that they litle geue heed to the matter and wisdom, which is set forth vnder the ornaments of Rhetorickes. Moreover this is to be added, that Paul was the Apostle of hym that was crucified, and preached Christ crucified, vnto whom were not meat the ornaments and goodly shewes of wordes, least the power of the crosse should be abolished. For this

thys was to be taken hede of, that it should not be ascribed to humane wisdom, that men were drawen vnto Christ. Neyther wil I casely graunt that Paul had no care at all in the placing of hys words and sentences, when as hys words are euer where sharpe, neyther can there lightly be found more vehement wordes: so that Ierome, who sometymes accuseth the negligent speech of the Apostle confesseth that when he readeth hym, he heareth not wordes but thunders: and Paul had without doubt vled thys way greater diligence, if he had knowen that the same should more haue conduced to saluation. And whereas it was objected, that the Apostle so spake Greke, that a man might casely know that he was an Hebrew, it is not to be wondered at: for as much as the Church at that tyme consisted both of the Hebrewes and of the Ethnikes: which church for that it dayly vled the scriptures turned into the Greke tonge, it had learned so to speake of thynges diuine, that it did not much disagree from the Hebrew maner and phrascs of speech. wherefore Paul is not to be reprobued for vling towards the Church of Christ such a kynd of speech, which was both Greke, and also sauored somewhat of the naturall tonge, wherein the oracles of God were set forth. The Apostle (say they) findeth fault wyth hys vnskilfulnes of speech, he semeth indeed to do so, but if a man more diligently weigh the thyng, he shall see that Paul when he sayd, Although vnskilfull in speech, yet not vnskilfull in knowledge, spake thus by way of graunting: not that he acknowledged great faults in the speech breathed into hym by the holy ghost, but he defenderh hymselfe from false Apostles which sayd, that hys epistles were of great wayght and strong, but hys phrase of speech when he was present was but weake. Amitte (sayth he) that I am but of small force as touching my phrase of speech, wyl they also take away fro me the knowledge of thynges? Doubtles although he seemed to those which were strangers fro Christ to speake foolishlynes: yet notwithstanding they which belonged to Christ, iudged those thynges which he spake to be most high wisdom, as they were in very dede. And when we affirme that the writings of Paul want not eloquence, which yet he sought not after, but it folowed hym in speaking, yet meane we in no wyse to feare away men from y study of good artes. Yea rather we geue the counsell, y they most diligently apply theselues vnto them, that afterward when they come to teach Christ earnestly, they may help them euen when they thinke not of them. For thys is not to be suffered in a preacher of the Gospel, that when he writeth or speaketh, he should addice hys mynde to the preceptes of these artes: but if he be instructed wyth them, it shall be free for the holyghost to vse them when he shall thinke good. This only ought to be the worke of the preacher, to set forth Christ and hys word. And if he be well learned, the force of good artes wyl follow hym whether he wyl or no. But if preachers shall cyther in wytyng or speaking labour for finesse & ornaments of Rhetorike, they shall waxe colde as touchyng matter. For the mynde of man is not able at one tyme with a singular sharpenes to applye it selfe to two thynges. Therefore we sometymes see preachers well learned in artes deale very coldly: & contrary wyse such as are not so well learned handle theyr matters wyth greater vehemency. But if that measure be kept which I haue set forth, an vntruth though it be garnished and fensed wyth good artes shall take no place, and the truth though it be vnarmed and weake and without any ornament shalbe made manifest. These artes are placed in the midst, & therefore we may make them to do Christ seruice and to loose them from the bondage of the deuill: so that as Origen sayd: The heathen woman haue her nailes payred, her heare cutte, and her garment chaunged. By all those thynges we gather, that the phrase of speech of Paul is not of that nature, that it ought to feare vs away from the reading of these epistles. But let vs on the other side consider what pricketh vs forward wyth singular diligence to read thys epistle to the Romaynes. In it is set forth the controuersy of iustification, a matter of great wayght, and such as not only at that tyme very much vexed the Church of Christ, but also in our tyme vexeth it, and doubtles it is of that sort, that there is nothyng more mete whereby to impell men vnto Christ. And besides that, the thynges which are here written are dedicated to the people of Rome, whose empire extended farre euen throughout the whole world, wherefore it much inaide to the saluation of the whole world, what kind of religion they should receaue. For the nations vnder them commonly wyth great endeuer imitated the orders, rules, maners, and religion of their princes. wherefore when he taught the Romanes, he in a maner instructed the whole world: of which thyng the deuill was not ignorant. For he left no stone vnturned, to infect that citie with corrupt doctrine. To the accomplishing of this he instigated false Apostles and wicked preachers, which with the preposterous ceremonies of Moses obscured the glory of Christ. Neyther is it of small force to the setting forth of the worthines of thys epistle, that Paul himselfe both was, and was borne a citizen of Rome, wherefore he was bound and that by no small bond of loue to fauor these men best next to the Hebrewes. Now let vs come nerer to the matter. It is certayne that all men desire the extreme and chiefe good thing: but they are deceaued, for that they sometimes place it in the riches, pleasures and good things of this world. But agaynst these me there nedeth no long disputacion, for they are sufficiently confuted euen of y philosophers and of them that are but meanely learned. But others thought, that they might attayne to perfect righteousness and felicitie, if they gaue them selues to ciuill offices, to mortall vertues, and to the contemplation of things most excellent. But others when they saw that euen the most excellent men also fell oftentimes into horrible vices, thought that by religious expiations sea rather by superstitions and worshippinges, of them selues inuented, they might make God fauorable vnto them of whom afterward they might be able to obtayne all good things. This in a manner was the opinion of the common people: whiche iudgement was after a sorte not so ill as the iudgement of the philosophers. For they were so puffed vp with the pride of vertues, and of ciuill offices, and by reason of theyr knowledge in things naturall, that they thought that these things were sufficient for them to attayne felicitie. But the common people were not ignorant both of the filthines of theyr sins and of theyr dayly offending of God: wherefore they thought it requisite to flye vnto religion. And forasmuch as they had no pure nor chaste religion they fell into idolatry. The people of the Hebrewes were as a meane betwene these and embased either part. By reason of the decalogue or ten commandments they boasted that they had the summe of all vertues: and if they should chance to transgresse in them, they had ceremonies prepared for them, to make satisfactio for them. Paul striueth against these things, and proueth that it is not possible for vs to obteyne righteousness by mortall or naturall offices. For neyther the Jewes nor the Gentiles do in any wise expresse in life and in manners, so much as they acknowledge the law either of nature or of Moses requireth at theyr handes. Neyther is it to be graunted that we can fully and perfectly obserue the law, for then should we obteyne perfect righteousness by workes, which were utterly absurd: for our iustification herein consisteth, that our sinnes should not be imputed vnto vs, but that the righteousness of Christ should be imputed to them that beleue. There cometh indeede some instantiation, when we being iustified do worke vpright workes, but that is not perfect. Grace also is geuen to the regenerate, but not such a grace which remoueth away all impediments which are a let to the most perfect obseruation of the law of God. Neyther when we speake this do we set forth paradoxes, or ascribe vnto Paul strange things, but we defend those things which most of all agree with the doctrine of the Apostle. And as touching ceremonies and rites, of which on the other side the Jewes boasted, when they are without Christ and without fayth, they are counted detestable before God, as Jeremy, Esay, and other prophets which were interpreters of the law haue most manifestly taught. wherefore it followeth, that although the Hebrewes boasted that they were endued with eche part of righteousness, yet were they not iustified. Howbeit I speake of them, which embased these partes of the lawe wyth out Christe.

Ye haue now the scope of the Apostle. And in this whole disputacion, forasmuch as it is a long discourse, it shalbe very good oftentimes to call to memory this summe of it now set forth.

chapter specially.
The proposition and the confirmation.

But let vs now come to exposition of the first chapter. what is there entreated of I haue already declared: namely that the Gentiles were not able by the strength of nature to be iustified. This he proueth, for that they liued most wickedly, and overwhelmed them selues with most filthy sinnes, when yet notwithstanding they were not ignorant what they ought to haue done. But first is set forth a salutation, which I will expound, and afterward will deuide the rest of the chap. into his partes. The things that are hard I will the more largely explaine: and the things y are easy I will but briefly touch: and in such questions which shall chance by the way I will somewhat the longer tary.

Paul the seruaunt of Iesus Christ, called to the office of an Apostle, put aparte to preach the Gospell of God, which he before had promised by his Prophets in the holy Scriptures, of hys son which was begotten of the seede of Dauid as touching the fleshe, and declared to bee the sonne of God with power, according to the spirite of sanctification, in that Iesus Christ our Lord rose agayne fro the dead, by whō we haue receaued grace, and the office of an Apostle, to be obedyent to fayth amonge all nations in hys name, of the number of whome ye also are, the called of Iesus Christ. To all you which are at Rome the beloued of God called Saintes: grace and peace to you from God the father, and from the Lord Iesus Christ.

As touchynge the salutation, fyrste we muste note, who it is that wyrteth it: secondlye, to whome it is wrytten: lastly, what maner of good thinges hee which saluteth wylleth vnto them. It is Paule which saluteth: the Romanes are they whom he saluteth: and the good thinges which he wylleth the, are grace and peace: indeede, the chiefest thinges which of men can bee attayned vnto. Rhetoricians vse in theyr Prohemies to gette vnto them selues authoritie, diligent hearing, and beneuolence: which thinge the holy Ghoste here fullye performeth. For whylest that Paule doth adorne hym selfe with these titles, he winneth vnto hym selfe authoritie, and he also when he maketh mencion what are the thynges that hee will entreate of, maketh the mindes of the readers attentive. And in wythying vnto them such excellent good thinges, and opening hys great loue towarde them, he obteyneth theyr good will. For by that meanes are they drawen to loue agayne such a man, which so well wylleth vnto them. If any man thinke that this salutation is moze full of wordes then nedeth, they must remember that Paul was greuously accused of false Apostles, that he had fallen from the lawe, and agreed not with the other Disciples of the Lorde: and that hee was not to be counted for an Apostle, which had not bene conuersant with the Lorde in the fleshe, as the other Apostles were. To all these false accusations it was necessary to aunswere even in hys Prohemie, that he might haue the better eare geuen vnto hym. As touching hys name I will nothing speake, for I know that the elders dyd not rashlye geue names. But because the holy Scripture testifieth not, for what cause he was eyther called Saule in hys Jewishe religion, or Paule after hys conuersion, I will omitte coniectures, neither will I stand about this thing. In hys superscription hee setteth forth thre titles wherby he beautifieth hys name: the fyrst is, The seruaunt of Iesus Christ, and that name is common vnto all the faythfull. And the propertie of a seruant is this, not to bee hys owne man, but to doe the busines of hys maister. Wherfore if we be the seruantes of Christ, this is required of vs, that what soeuer we lye, breath, and thinke, be directed vnto Christ. And in these wordes are false Apostles reprobued, which sought their owne thinges, to satisfie the bellye, and to increase their gaine: and they wanne not men to Christ, but rather to Popes,

These things to be considered in this salutation.

Rhetoricians as precepts concerning Prohemies are here observed.

Why he is so long in his salutation.

Paule claimeh vnto himselfe thre titles.

or to them selues. For as much as to be the seruantes of Christ, is (as we haue sayde) a thing comon vnto vs all, let vs diligently consider h Metaphoze, whereby we are so called: namely because we ought so to obey God, as seruantes do their maisters. But we are farre of, fro performing it. For seruantes do spend the least parte of the daye about theyr own busines: and all the rest of the tyme they are occupied about their maisters affayres. But we do farre otherwise. We are a very short space, or an houre of our time, occupied about things pertaining to God, but al the rest of h tyme that is graunted vs, we spend about thinges humaine and earthly. A seruant hath nothyng of hys owne nor proper vnto hym selfe: but we do priuately possesse many thynges, whiche we will neither bestowe for Gods sake, nor for Christs sake. Seruantes when they are beaten, and stricken, do humbly desire pardon and forgiveness of their maisters: but we in aduersities resiste God, murmur agaynst hym, and blaspheme hys name. Seruantes do receaue onely meate and drinke and apparell, and therewith are content: but we neuer come to any ende or measure of heapyng vp of wealth and riches. Seruants when they heare the threatnynges of their maisters, do tremble fro top to toe: but we are nothyng moued with the threatnynges of the Prophetes, Apostles and holy Scriptures. Seruantes wil neither haue talke, nor familiaritee, nor yet shewe any signes of amitye vnto their maisters enemies: but we are continually in fellowship with the deuill, the fleshe, and the world. Wherefore we are farre from that seruice whiche we owe vnto God, whom yet we ought much more both to obey and to serue, then our seruantes ought to obey and serue vs. For God besides that he both feedeth and nourisheth vs, hath also brought vs forth, & hath geue vs euē our being. Farther what soeuer seruants do towarde vs, all that is to our commoditie, and nothyng helpeth them: but we contrarywise, when we serue God, do bring no profite or commoditie vnto hym. For though we lyue iustly, he is thereby made neuer a whit the better or more blessed then he was before. Also we geue litle or nothyng vnto our seruants: but God hath for vs geuen forth his onely sonne, and together with hym hath geuen vs all thinges. We promise vnto our seruantes a very small rewarde: but God hath promised vnto vs the same felicity, whiche Christ him selfe hath the fruition of. Whereby appeareth how much more we are bounde to serue hym, then are our seruantes bounde vnto vs.

But in that we haue sayd, that this vocation is common to all, to be the seruantes of Christ, it seemeth not very well to agree with that whiche is written in the Gospell: Now I will not call you seruantes, but frendes. Paul also seemeth to be against it, whiche sayde: Ye haue not receaued agayne the spirite of seruitude in feare: but the spirite of children, whereby we cry: Abba, Father. And contrarily we can not deny but that we are the seruantes of God. Christ hath payd the price for vs, wherefore being redemed of hym, we are hys seruantes. God hath created vs: and it is the rule of the workes of euery artificer, to serue hym that made them. Wherefore there must be had a distinction, namely of the inward man, and of the outward, of the spirite and of the fleshe. As touchyng the outward man, and workes of the body, we are called seruantes: because we execute offices in seruing God, and our neighbours as much as lieth in vs. Further, as concerning aduersities and the crosse whiche we dayly suffer, we are punished of God, no otherwise then seruantes are stricken and beaten: not in dede alwayes for punishment sake, as they are, but for the most part, to try our faith, and that the fleshe and the lustes therof should be repressed, and that repentance of our faultes and sinnes, whiche continually breake forth should be stirred vp. Also the forme and humble behauiour, whiche the saythfull vse, hath a shew of a certayne seruitude. After whiche maner Christ also to the Philippias is sayd to haue taken vpon hym the shape of a seruant. But our spirite because, it is not moued with the hope of rewarde chiefly, or with the feare of punishment, but frely and of hys owne accord executeth the commaundementes of God,

God, therefore we are sayd to haue the spirite of childezen. Also bycause we are hyndled with loue and not compelled of necessitie, we are frendes, neither are we dishonored with a seruile condition. Paul hath manifestly said: when I was free from all men I was made the seruaunt of all men, and in that maner to serue God is a thing of no smal weight. For in the last chapter of the booke of Iosuah wee reade, that that Captayne preached vnto the people of Israel: Ye are not able to serue God. Of which place Augustine entreatyng in his questions, whiche he made vpon that booke, sayth: If we will serue God accordyng to his dignitie and maiesty, and as the law requireth, it is impossible for vs. Wherefore that people should haue answered the Prophet, we will go about and en-deuour our selues to performe that: and when we sayle, we will desire pardon, and by prayers we will obteyne strength, dayly to behaue our selues better. But they with great stoutnes and much pride answered: we will serue our God, and will do all those thynges, whiche thou hast spoken. What could be more arrogantly spoken then this? Yet experience taught that the Prophet spake the truth.
 And for as much as it is a thing so hard vnto our fleshe, hereof it cometh, that commonly we finde that men are sayd so to serue God, as Nabucadnezar in the 45. chap. of Jeremy, is called the seruaunt of the Lord: namely bycause he fulfilled his will in ouerthrowyng of Ierusalem, although he ment farre otherwise. So many in dede do the will of God, but not with that minde to serue hym: but the godly onely haue a regard to that, wherefore they may truly be called the seruauntes of God. And Dauid to amplifie that sayde: Because I am thy seruaunte and the sonne of thy handmayden. For hee whiche is bozne of a handmayden is not onely a seruaunt: but also is bozne a seruaunt, for the child foloweth the condition of the mother. But to serue is sometymes all on with that whiche otherwise we say to worship, & seruitude is a worshippynge of Religion whiche is geuen vnto God. The Hebrewes call it Abad and Aboda, neither displeaseth it me so to vnderstand Paul, as if he had said: I was once a persecutor, but now I am a worshipper of Iesus Christ. And in this phrase of speache is to be sene the Hebrew phrase, wherby Abraham, Moses, Dauid and Job, and many other are commended, for that chiefly, bycause they were the seruauntes of God. But that in other tongues is not counted an honor or praise, but the Hebrewes do after such maner commend the most excellēt men. Wherefore in Esay the 49. chap. it is sayd vnto the people of Israel, that it is not a thyng of small wayght, to be the ser-uaunt of the Lord. And vndoubtedly to acknowledge the true God and to worship hym, is the head and chief poynt of wisdom. In that that he sayth he is the seruaunt of Iesus Christ, that is, of our saluation, of our kyng and Priest, it foloweth, that they to whom he writeth, should gladly and willyngly receaue & heare hym. He claymeth also vnto hym selfe an other title, namely that he was called to be an Apostle. For there are many kyndes of seruices: for some are Prophetes, some Apostles some Euangelistes, &c. He declareth now presently by what kynde of seruice he pertained vnto Christ: namely bycause he was his Apostle: whiche degree is the chiefest in the Church, and he doth not arrogantly clayme the same vnto hym selfe, as though he hym selfe vsurped it. For he affirmeth that he was called: wherby he sheweth the great power and strength of the word of God, by which God most mightely byngeth to passe what soeuer plea-seth hym. Neither, to call is any thyng els as touchyng God, then to bring to passe or els to appoint any thyng. Wherefore by creation it is sayd that he called those thynges, whiche were not, as if they had bene. And the Prophetes write, that he sometymes called pestilence, famine, and the sword, that is he brought to passe that they should bee, and raunge abroad among men. They amonge vs are sayd to be of excedyng great power, whiche byng to passe great thyngs onely by their commaundement. Therefore we attribute the same thyng vnto God, bycause by his worde and callyng he maketh to consist what thynges so euer he will. Apostles, in the Greke are called, sent, pea and Christ also in the Epistle to the Hebrewes is called an Apostle, that is, sent of the father: and this his dignitie he hath communicated vnto his Disciples, for he sayd: As my father hath sent me so send I you. And in that Paul sayth that he was called he sheweth that he was called when he thought nothing of it, but was occupied otherwise, for he was persecuting the Church, and was taken in the very crime it selfe, and as the Grecians say, ἐν ἀπορώσει, that is, in a very acte. By which place they whiche defend workes of preparation may see, that Paul had none such: vnles a man will say that to persecute the Church was a good worke. They are wont to object that God had a regard to his zeale, purpose, and his good entent: and therefore had mercy vpon him. For it is written vnto Tim: that he obtained mercy, because he did it ignorantly and of infidelitie. But Paul acknowledgeth no merite to be the cause of his calling, when he sayth vnto the Galathians: When it pleased him, whiche is in Greke ὡς ἔβλητο. And to Timothe: and I haue obtained mercy that God should in me first shew his long suffering, & that I should be an example of those whiche should beleue. So he utterly ascribeth his calling vnto the mercy of God and not to his merites. But where they alledge, because I did it ignorantly and of infidelitie that is therefore sayd, to declare that there needed mercy, where so perillously reigned ignorance and infidelity: not that infidelity and ignorance whiche are sinnes, should deserue pardon. And by this prerogative, that he is an Apostle by calling, he stoppeth the mouth of his aduersaries, which sayd he was not an Apostle, because he was not conuersant with Christ: he answereth them that notwithstanding yet was he called of him. And against those whiche sayd, that he had fallen from the Jewishe Religion, he excuseth him selfe, because he obeyed God whiche called him. But althoughe it here appeare not by whom he was called, yet vnto the Galathians it is expressed. For there it is written, not of men, neither by men. For that whiche the Grecians call, Apostles, the Hebrewes call Scheluths, Hierome interpreteth that some are sent of God and not by men, as Moses, Esay, and Paul: other are sent of God, but yet by men as Elizeus by Elias, Dauid by Samuel, and as there were also many other: other are sent by men onely & not by God, as they which are set ouer Churches not by iust election, but by affection of the flesh, or by fauour or giftes. And these can not be deposed, for as much as they haue the ordinary maner of institution although they can not be counted chosen of God: lastly there be other whiche thrust in them selues, neither are they sent of God nor yet of men: as at this day do many Anabaptistes, whiche being moued onely of their owne will, breake into the ministry. This was the office of Paul, & of the other Apostles to execute this function in Christs Rede, which thing in Paul goddyd illustrate by many miracles, to the end there should be no doubt thereof, for as much as it was not known vnto men, for they had not sene him conuersant with Christ. There is also added an other title, whereby Paul adorneth his name: namely that he was put apart for the Gospels sake, to declare that his vocation, whiche hee hath now made mention of, had his beginning euen of the predestination and election of God. And in the Epistle whiche hee writeth to the Galathians he manifestly openeth the nature of such a putting a part when he sayth, that hee was segregated from his mothers wombe, that is elected, not rashly, but with great wisdom and obseruation. Hereby we learne that that is false which some men thinke, namely that some men are borne good, and other some euill: Undoubtedly we are all borne the children of wrath, neyther is there any inequality, as touching birth, but it is the predestination and election of God, whereby we are vnited and grafted into the members of Christ: although some of the fathers sometymes sayd, that therefore some are predestinate of God, or separated from other, because he foresawe that they would by rightly vse both grace and also free will: howbeit they speake not that out of the wordes of God. Neyther did Paule at any tyme vse this reason, yea rather he sayd of Jacob and Esau: before they were borne, or before they had done any good good or euill. &c. Which reason, had slenderly commended the grace of election, which then chiefly hee intended to doe, if it should be vnderstand accordyng to these mens interpretation. For a man myght haue sayd: although these being little ones had as yet done nothing in ade and in very deebe, yet as touching the prouidence and sight of God, vnto whom all thynges are present, they had done both good and euill: accordyng vnto the which they were eyther predestinate or reprobate. And by thys obiection, the argument of Paule should haue bene very much weakened. Farther, to reder this cause of election of God, it was not so hard a thing, y the Apostle should haue needed to stoppe the mouth of man, complayning of the iustice of God. Which thyng yet hee doth, when hee sayth: But who art thou O man which answerest vnto God? Hath not the potter power ouer the claye, of one and the selfe same lump, to make one vessel to honour, and an other to contumely? And he cryeth out, Oh the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God: how vnsearchable are his iudgements, how inuestigable are his wayes? which thyng vndoubtedly neded not to haue bene spoken, if the question might so easily haue bene dissolued. Adde thys also which he saith in an other place. It is not of him which willet, nor of hym which runneth, but of God which hath compassion. And agayne, he hath mercy vpon whom he wil, and hardeneth who he wil. Whereby is manifest, that we are chosen to saluation, not by our workes foreseene, but of meare goodnes. But the knowledge of election and predestination hath a double vtilitie: fyrst that we shoulde not dispayre in aduersitie, but rather remembryng that we were deare vnto God, before the foundations of the worlde were layde, and that he hath not onely elected vs, but also called vs and iustified vs, we shoulde not doubt, but that he hath a care ouer vs, so that he euen now also will not forsake vs. It is of force also to represser our pryde, that we shoulde not bee puffed by for our workes or holynes of our life, knowing that we haue these thynges onely of the election of God. And hereby also it manifestly appeareth that God chooseth vs not for our good workes which hee foreseeth: for as much as they are comprehended in predestination. For whom God hath predestinated to saluation, vnto those same also hath he appointed to geue both grace and meanes, whereby they should come vnto saluation. These are the two principall vtilities which the knowledge of predestination byngeth vnto the elect. Wherefore they which haue such cogitations of it, that they are drinen to desperation, as though they coulde finde no remedye whereby to auoyde reprobation: or els doe put so much confidence therein to liue loosely and at pleasure, saying that it maketh no matter, for that, seing they are predestinate they can not be condemned: what doe they els, but most wickedly abuse a good thing? Euery thing ought to be taken by that part whereby it may be holden. For a sword is not drawe by the edge or by the blade, but by the haffe: neyther is a vessel taken by the middest of the bellye, but by the handle or eare. So predestination ought to be referred to the commodities now declared, and not to those thynges which may engender destruction. These notes and these titles hath Paule affixed vnto his name, that we shoulde not thinke hym to be a wandryng man, which rashly sowd contentions concernyng religion, and that we shoulde vnderstand that there is a great difference betwene Apostles and other common ministers: although there be some which dare teach, that we must no lesse beleue the Bishop of Rome, then Paule y Apostle. I graunt in deebe that eyther of them do both thunder and lighten, but yet after a farre diuers and sundrye manner. The Pope thundreth and lighteneth with bulles, belles, gunnes, and weapons of warre: but Paule hath by the worde of God, by admonitions, rebukinges, wholesome doctrine, & by miracles thundred and lightened in the Church. But let vs see by what reason these men defend theyr opinion. They say: the byshops succeeded the Apostles, wherefore both haue one and the selfe same authoritie, and so both ought we to obey a lyke. But we answered them thus. It is true that the Apostles departing out of this world, left Bishops to be gouernours ouer Churches: but we utterly deny that Bishops succeeding the Apostles, are endued with the selfe same or lyke authoritie: and that thing we proue after this sorte: First, because we see that the Apostles were to this end chosen, to constitute the religion and dignitie of the Gospell, and to publishe vnto the beleuers, the thynges which they had heard of Christ. But bishops are to this ende instituted, to defend those thynges which are conteyned in the Gospell, and in the holy Scriptures: which they must so take in hand to defend, that they adde no newe thynges vnto them, nor sayne any new traditions at theyr owne will and pleasure. Farther, the holy fathers which were Bishops, when they gaue them selues to wryting, do confesse, that they are onely intreaters or interpreters of the holy Scriptures, and will not that those thinges which they wryte, should be had in so great authoritie as we attribute vnto the Canonickall Scriptures: yea rather they forbidde that any credite should be geuen vnto them, if they speake any thing agaynst the holy Scriptures. Chyrdly to the Apostolicall doctrine were adioyned many miracles, wherby theyr authoritie is confirmed: which thing we see is not done in these traditions of the elders. Farther, we are sure that the Apostles wrote by the inspiration of the holy ghost: which thing vndoubtedly we dare not as firme of our Bishops. Wherefore we conclude, that the Apostles could not erre in those thynges which they wrote. But we see that the Bishoppes very often tymes made vngodly decrees as touchyng rules of religiō, as it appeareth in the Counsell of Ariminum, and also in the seconde Synode of Ephesus, and also in many other, yea and they also erred very much in their actes. At Chalcedon and Constantinople were Synodes gathered together, in which Chrysostome was condemned and deposed: which thing also was done in the name of those Bishoppes which were of a ryght and perfect sayth. And there myght be alleaged many examples of the lyke sorte. Paule also wryting vnto Timothe, prayeth hym to saue that which is geuen hym to keepe, declaring, that he ought neither to adde nor to diminishe any thing of the doctrine of the Gospell receaued: that is, to keepe iustly the thing committed vnto hym. Let this also be added, that the Apostles be so vnto the Bishops and Ordinarie pastours, as in the olde time were the Prophetes vnto the high priestes and priestes. For they myght wryte bookes, and adioyne them vnto the Canonickall Scripture. For Samuell added his bookes vnto the Scripture. Esaie, Ieremie, and the other Prophetes, added theyr Monuments vnto the Scripture: which thing the Scribes, Priestes, and high Priestes could not doe. The Apostles called the Gentiles, and abrogated the ceremonies of the lawe: which thing was aboute the power of the high priestes and priestes. The Apostle doth therefore set forth hym selfe by these titles, that when we read hym, or heare hym, we should thinke that we heare not the wordes of a man, but oracles from heauen. Here is also put in the prayle of the Gospell, which must bee read by a parentesis, and the same extendeth euen vnto this place, where he sayth:

The knowledge of predestination is profitable.

To all which are at Rome. &c.] The Gospell to speake briesfly, is the preaching of Christ offered vnto vs to saluation, accor dyng to the promises made in the olde tyme. This commendation is taken of the matter, which is entreated of in the Gospell: because euery science and facultie hath his dignitie of the thing, that it intreateth of. Afterward is geuen an other definition, and that is taken of the strength of working, namely that the Gospell is the power of God vnto saluation: that is, the instrument wherby Christ would haue vs saued. Definitions take of these causes ought to be ioyned together, to the end to haue the more full knowledge of the Gospell. In that it is sayd:

VVhich he had before promysed. &c.] It is a preuenting, whereby hee declineth the enuious name of newnes. For the Gospell was counted a new doctrine, For they which heard Paule, thus reasoned with them selues.

selues: The olde Patriarches and the Prophets had saluation, and a Church, and yet they wanted your Gospell: therefore thys doctrine is not necessary, yea rather moze then needeth. Here Paule confesseth that the elders were saued, but not without the Gospell. For in as much as God had before promised it, by the sayth of thys promise they were all made safe. But now it appeareth new doctrine vnto you, because ye haue ouerwhelmed thys promise with humane traditions, and haue made it obscure with your owne inuentions. Thys selfe same argument may we at this day make against our aduersaries, which cry out that we bzing in new doctrine. Undoubtedly we go about no new thyng: but they haue vtterly brought in straunge and new thynges, of which there is no mention at all made in the holy Scriptures: yea we know that very many thinges which they defend, were receaued long after the Apostles tyme, out of the decrees or Synodes of Bishops. And if there be any, whose originall is not certainly knowen, yet doe not the holy Scriptures make any mention of them. But here the Apostle doth for thys cause commend hys Gospell, because it was before promised by the Prophets in the holy Scriptures. All these thynges haue a wonderful emphasys. For that which was so long tyme before promised of God, can not be but excellent and wonderfull. And thys promise beganne fro that, which Adam, inspyred with the holy ghost spake: Thys is nowe bone of my bones, and fleshe of my fleshe: which the Apostle to the Ephesians, taketh to be spoken of Christ and of the Church: and from that also, which was sayd vnto Eue: Thy seele shall breake hys head in peeces. Afterward it was extended with continuall oracles by the Patriarches, & holy Prophets, euen vnto the end. Prophets are here taken for excellent men, namely interpreters of the worde of God: and by thys worde are signified all the wryters of the Canonickall Scripture, of what degree soeuer they were of. And that which is added: in the holy Scriptures, pertayneth to this end, to shew that they are not vayne oracles which he citeth, for as much as they are extant in the holy Scriptures. For they are sealed with publicke writings, and ratified and firme by an instrument. And in speakyng of these thynges, he commendeth hym self, which was the minister of so great a Gospell. And by the selfe same meanes he calleth them backe, both from ceremonies, and also from Philosophie: vnto which thynges they were wonderfully bent. It followeth:

V Which was made of the seele of Dauid. The incarnation of the Sonne of God is here touched: and in consideration of the person, he is sayd to haue bene made, although thys agreeth not with hym, but as touching hys humanity. But it is sayd: of the seele of Dauid, because vnto Dauid was made a notable promise, so that Messias was commonly called the sonne of Dauid: as we read in the Gospell, that the Scribes & the Phariseis testified, vnto whom Christ obiecteth, How doth Dauid call hym hys Lorde? By thys place are the wicked heretickes ouerthrowen, which affirme that Christ had a body not of the nature and substance of the Virgin, but brought from heauen. They saue vnto them selues this argument. Because our fleshe is subiecte vnto damnation & the curse, therefore it is not very likely (say they) that the sonne of God would take it vpon hym. Which argument may easily be confuted. For curse and damnation are accidents: wherefore God was able easlye remoue them, and yet keepe whole the nature and substance of man. Wherefore he could no lesse geue vnto Christ a holy and cleane body of the Virgin, then he could out of the vyle clay bring forth a noble and most cleane body vnto Adam. And in that we heare that the sonne of God so abased hym selfe, to take vpon hym humane fleshe, it ought to be vnto vs no small spurre, that nothing be offered vnto vs so hard which for Christes sake we will not suffer. Many demaunde why Christ the sonne of God tooke vpon hym humane fleshe. And although many reasons might be brought, yet will I bzing that which Ambrose hath rendred vpon this place: namely that punishment myght be taken in that fleshe which sinned, euen as men that are malefactours are there accustomed to suffer punishmentes, where they haue committed VWhich was declared to be the Sonne of God.] Here I can not tell howe the Latine translation had: Qui predestinatus est: that is, which was predestinate.] By meanes whereof the interpreters had much adoe to declare it aptlye. They myght in deede saye, that Christ was to thys end predestinate, to be the Mediator and redemer of mankinde. But the thynges which followe agree not therewith: for the cause of thys predestination, could not be eyther the resurrection from the dead, or effusion of the holy ghost. Therefore we must read it as the Greke bookes haue it, ἐπισθηνος, which signifieth, as Chrysostome interpreteth it, ἀποδεδειγμένος, ἀποφασθηνος, ἐπισθηνος, that is, shewed, declared, and iudged. The Apostle first entreateth of the veritie of the humane nature: which is hereby shewed, because he was made & bozne of the seede of Dauid. Now he setteth forth the deuine nature. For he sayth, that Christ was by sure argumentes published, declared, and shewed, to bee the sonne of God. And although here is no mention of predestination, yet is not y<sup>e</sup> Latine translatiō new. For Origene maketh mention of it: who yet followeth it not. For he interpreteth it as it is in the Greke ἐπισθηνος. But how he shoulde cite the Latine translation, there are sondre opinions. Some attribute thys to hys diligent and painfull studie, which had a care to search out all translations. Pether is it to be thought that he was ignorant of the Latine tongue, for as much as he was called to Rome by Mamma the mother of Alexander the Emperour. Some thinke that these thynges were not written by the author, but put in by the interpreter. And there are some which thinke that that booke is none of Origenes: among whom is Erasmus. Hierome expounding the first chap. to the Ephesians, playnly sheweth that we shoulde here reade ἐπισθηνος, neyther addeth he the preposition πρὸς. And undoubtedly thys worde is bled, when Magistrates elected, are published and declared. Therefore thys is the sense: Christ which was man in very deede, and of the seede of Dauid, was declared, appoynted, and published to be y<sup>e</sup> sonne of God, by the reasons following.

In power, according to the spirite of sanctification, & resurrection of the dead.] Thys kinde of speache being very darcke, hath sondre expositions. Some thus expounde it, as though it were one onely argument to proue the diuinitie of Christ, namely hys resurrection, which they say was done by power and by the holy ghost. And to proue thys argument to be of great force, they alleage that Christ gaue no other signe, but the signe of Ionas the Prophete, & that also which hee sayd: Lose thys Temple, and on the thyrde daye I will rayse it vppe agayne. And it seemeth that some of the Apostles dyd therfore dispayre of the diuine nature, because they saw the resurrection to be differred, as Cleophas sayd vnto the stranger vpo y<sup>e</sup> way: We had well hoped that he should haue rayse agayne the third day. An other opinion is, which thinketh that it is one onely argument taken of the sendyng of the holy ghost. For none but onely God can geue the holy ghost: for by it we are made companions of the diuine nature, and partakers of the minde of God. And thus they frame the wordes: that Christ was declared to be the sonne of God in power, that is to say, to be thereby mighty, because he sent vpon hys, the spirite of sanctification, and that from the resurrection of the dead, that is, after he was raysed vp from the helles. For although before also he had geuen the spirit vnto such as beleued, yet because it was not done so largely and so aboundantly, therefore (as Iohn also testifieth) the spirit was not yet geue. And so this argument is taken of the effusion of the holy ghost: which effusion, although as touching miracles it be not at this day extant, yet it so indureth, that without it the Church can not consist. For regeneration hath no place without the holy ghost. I leue to speake of this, that some take y<sup>e</sup> resurrectiō of the dead, as touching those which were raysed vp at the death & resurrectiō of Christ; whē the graues were opened: because this agreeth not well with those thynges which afterward shalbe spoken. But me thinketh that here are touched three princi-

all argumentes, whereby Christ is proued to be the sonne of God: One is of the miracles, and that is signified by this particule, in uirtute, that is, in power. For in uirtute with Paule signifieth the working of miracles. An other argument is of the resurrection, whereby he was rayled from the dead, and lieth for euer, and whereby we also shall ryle agayne with hym. The third argument is of the sending of the holy ghost, and these three thinges were done, according to the order and course of tyme. For Christ whilest he liued wrought very many miracles: after his death he was rayled agayne from the dead, and after his resurrection sent the holy ghost.

Three arguments of the deity of Christ.

By whom we haue receaued grace and Apostleship.] He had before sayd that he was called: but he added not by whom. Here he expessedly sayth, he receaued this of Christ. Grace signifieth in the holy scripture cheifely that beneuolence & fauor, wherewith God loueth vs. Wherefore we are wont to call those gracious which are loued of many, & are also acceptable vnto many. But this is the difference: they whom we call gracious, haue some thing in them whereby they allure men to loue them: whether the same be beauty or vertue or any such like thing. For men are not moued to loue a man, who hath not in him some thing that is woorthy to be loued. But we can not so say of God: because he befoze all thinges loueth vs, and whē he hath loued he geneth vnto vs his gyftes, whereby he maketh vs both acceptable, and woorthy of loue. And if we should affirm otherwise, God should not be counted the authoꝝ of all thinges. For by that meanes we should put some thing to be in vs befoze we were loued of him, which should allure him to loue vs, and so of a creature we should make a creator, in affirming that we haue something, which depēdeth not of God. Wherefoze grace signifieth the liberall fauour and good will of God, which he frely beareth vnto vs for Christs sake. And this may be taken eyther generally so that it is afterward contracted by adding thys, namely the office of an Apostle: or els it signifieth in this place a gift and faculty frely geue vnto Paule: which faculty is straytway expessed, when he addeth.

Paule called by Christ vnto the Apostleship, what grace is.

What is the difference betwene the loue of God and the loue of me.

The definition of grace.

And Apostleship to the obedience of sayth.] He addeth the ende whereunto the faculty of the Apostleship pertaineth, namely to obey sayth. And this may be done two maner of wayes: either in receauing faith, for it, soasmuch as it is a firme assent which is geuen vnto the wordes of god, may be called obedience: as Paule wrote vnto the Corinthians: that he had spirituall armors, wherewith he would make captiue all vnderstanding vnto the obedience of god. Or els it may be vnderstand of a good life, and holynes of maners, which follow sayth, whyles we expresse the might of our sayth by honest actions.

Obedience of sayth.

For his name.] We execute not the office of an Apostle for our owne gayne or glozy, but for the name, that is, for the glozy and prayse of Christ Iesu. in all nacions. And in that he addeth in all nacions, he sheweth that the office of the Apostles was not contra to certayne limites, but that they should throughout the whole world preach the word committed vnto them, and found Churches and bringe disciples vnto Christ.

In which ye also are the called of Iesus Christ.] Although ye be Lordes ouer all, yet neuertheles ye are in the number of other nacions. He calleth them the called of Christ: because without calling they had not come vnto him. Neyther vsed he the participle which hath the signification of tyme, and that to the ende he would wish them constançe, and stability in the purpose which they had taken in hand, as though they had not a tempoꝝall calling, but a firme & constane. And in that he so often bleth the name of calling he sufficiently declareth, what maner of thing our conuersation is when we embrace Christ. It is vndoubtedly voluntary, and not compelled nor violent. We are perswaded, when we are with efficacy called by the inward word of God. Here is the ende of the parenthesis, which began at these wordes, which he had before promised by his prophetes.

Called is not here a participle but a noun.

Now cometh the second part of the salutation of the epistle, wherein are are expressed the men whom he saluteth, when he sayth.

To all which are at Rome, the beloued of God, Sainctes by calling, He saluteth all the Romaines, because at Rome the church consisted not only of towne bozne men: but also of an innumerable company of straungers which were partlye Jewes, and partlye Grecians. Therfore Paul maketh the salutation common vnto the all, so y they beleue in Christ. To the beloued of God, he sayth, which worde ought to admonish y beleuers, to loue one an other: for how can I not loue him, whome I beleue is loued of God? He rightly calleth them the beloued of God, & not those which loue God, because it is he which loueth vs first. And therfore he geweth vs charity and other most noble vertues. He addeth, Called Sainctes. by which worde he admonisheth them of their state past. If they be called to holynes, for as much as there can be no motiō, but where limites are apointed, therfore they mought well conclude, that they were called from vncleanes and vnpietenes to holynes. Neither say thou: All they which were at Rome, ought not to be called holy, for that there were many there which were not absolute, and not yet perfecte: for these thynges let not. For Paul first had a regarde vnto the better sort, and in theyr name and prayse beautified the whole church. For certayne prerogatiues of singular members do redounde vnto the other members. Further the Apostle had a consideracion, wherevnto they were called, namely, to be made holy. He saue, that they were called to the communion of Sainctes: whereof they also tooke theyr name. And Augustine in his 6. booke against Iulianus, admonisheth vs not to thinke that this word holynes, signifieth perfection. And he citeth a place of Paul in the first epistle to the Cor. where he sayeth: The Temple of God is holy, which Temple ye be: And no man is ignorant but that the Corinthians were infected with many vices. And if we wil serche out the strenght of the significacion of the worde Sancti, that is Sainctes or holy, as the same Augustine teacheth in his booke, de Symbolo & fide, it cometh of this worde Sanctio, that is, to constitute. For that is called holy, which is constant and firme, and appoynted to abyde: but nothing moze letteth vs, to abyde for ever then doth sinne: for it is sayd, that the reward of sinne is death. Therfore it cometh to passe, that holynes consisteth chiefly in the forgiveness & remission of sinnes. Fro which sentence that disagreeeth not which Paul hath in the first to the Cor. when he sayeth, after he had rehearsed a cathaloge of enomious sinnes: And these thinges were yee sometymes, but now ye are washed, yee are sanctified. But the forgiveness of sinnes is had by the holy ghost. If that we shal call any thyng holy by reason of preparatiō, they mought truly be called holy, which haue beleued in Christ, because that by the grace and spirite of Christe, they are prepared to glory, and highe purenes of lyfe to come. Ambrose semeth to serche out, who are they which are called, the beloued of God and called Sainctes. And he aunswereth, that these are they, which thinke well of Christ. If thou wilt agayne demaund, what those are, he aunswereth: That those thinke well of Christ, which thinke that we ought to put our confidence in hym only, and that in hym is perfect saluation. And of it may be concluded as of contraries, that they thynke not well of Christ, which trust in theyr owne strengthes or workes: which thinge such as doo, are not to be nombred amonge the called Sainctes, and beloued of God, as Ambrose now speaketh of them. The called, he nameth Sainctes, because men of theyr owne nature are not able to attayne vnto holynes, vntles they be led by the celestiaall might of the holy Ghost. And this is not to be left vnspoke of, that men are not therfore called of god, because they are holy, but that they are therfore holy because they are called. Paul doth not rashely vse this kind of speech, because y Jewes, for that they had theyr original fro the holy Patriarches & Prophetes, boasted that all holynes consisted in theyr stocke only: as though other nations were so wicked, that it shoulde be counted an vnlawfull thing to communicate with them this proprietie of holynes. But now yt is manifest, that through the grace of Christ it is brought to passe passe, that as well the Gentiles as the Jewes haue obtained the prerogative of holynes in an equall balance, so that they haue the sayth of Christ. Here we see also, that Paule in placing of these two wordes, obserued a iust order. For fyrst he setteth, to the beloued of God, befoze, called Saintes: because that holynes breaketh forth of no other thing, then of that charity and loue wherewith God loueth vs. And he might haue set forth the Romanes with other most ample titles: namely that they had the dominion ouer the whole world, & ruled ouer all. But passing ouer these things, he speaketh only of þe things that are of moze value, & chiefly, because it was not expedient to flatter þe Gentiles moze then þe Jewes: and especially because there was risen no finale discorde betwene both nations: Wherefoze he ouerskipperth those titles, which were proper vnto þe Romanes, & he toucheth the comon prayles of all such as beleue, that they which were of the Gentiles, and they which were of þe circumcisiō might in that church be the better vnited together betwene them selues. But we may not therfoze be afraid, both to salute, and also to call Princes by their proper titles. For in so doing, we both admonishe our selues what we owe vnto the, and also we put the in minde of theyr duety. For Paule also when in the actes of the Apostles he made an oration to Agryppa, was not afraid to call him by the title of a king. Hether to we haue expounded the second parte of the salutation, that is, what they were whom Paule saluteth. Now let vs see what good thinges he wisheth vnto them.

At this placing of wordes.

It is law-full to call Princes by their titles.

Grace saith he to you and peace. &c.] By þe name of peace, he vnderstandeth after the maner of the Hebrues, the increase of all good thinges. For as the Greekes say χαιρε, that is, grace, & saluten, that is, health: so the Hebrues say. Schalom, that is, peace. And in the olde testament this salutiō is ofte vsed. Dea and Christ also comming vnto the Apostles sayd: Peace be with you. And he commaunded the Apostles that into what house soeuer they entred, they should say: Peace be vnto this house. To this salutation commonly vsed among the Hebrues, Paule addeth this word grace, which word is not often found in the olde testament added vnto salutations. But Paule herein nothing offendeth: For it aunswereth vnto his vocation, for he was a preacher of grace, and in the meane tyme admonissheth them to whom he writeth, that peace is not to be looked for, that is, the heape of all good thinges, from our owne strengthe and merites, but from the grace of God. He sheweth the roote, and putteth it fyrst, from whence other good thinges are powzed vpon vs, that we may haue the childe together with the mother. Yet let vs not perswade our selues, that whilst we lyue here, we can haue absolute and perfect peace: howbeit it shalbe encreased dayly, and Paule wisheth that they might now haue it begon, and when tyme shal come, to haue it at full. And yet neuer theles we obtaine it perfectly by Christ if we haue God pacified towarde vs. For afterward it is written: Now therefore being iustified by sayth we haue peace towarde God: out of whiche floweth tranquillity of conscience, and so much of the spirite and deuine comfort, that what soeuer happeneth, we take it in good parte. Wherefoze in the midst of tribulations & tormentes, this tyme peace was not taken away fro holy men. For they gaue thanks vnto God, and they iudged that all thinges in these their afflictions were done for the best. And this is that peace, which passeth all sense and humane reason. When he sayth:

For they come not of our owne strengthe and workes, but of the mercy of God. And hereby we are encouraged to desire and to hope for these good thinges, which Paule wisheth for. For seeing that God, of whome these thinges are desired, is both good and also our father, he will without all doubt geue vs them. And Christ for asmuch as he is our mediator and redemer, will not vndoubtedly deny vs them. He is called Lord, which name is very agreable vnto him. Tertullian

uation, therfore he is iustly called Lord which name we may suppose that he hereby obtayned, because the Hebrines neuer pronounce the holy name Tetragrammaton, whiche is Iehouah, but pronounce it by other wordes, that is by Elohim, or Adonay, which signify might and dominion. Whereby it semeth it came to passe that the 70. interpreters, whē they red this name Tetragrammaton, turned it by this word κύριος, which is Lord, as it appeareth in many places, of the which we will bring one: The Lord sayd vnto my Lord. Where in the fyrst place is written Iehouah, which they turned, Lord. Wherefore when Christ is called Lord, it is as much as if he had bene called God. Although Tertullian agaynst Praxeas sayth, that Christ is called Lord when he is ioyned with the father. For then the father is called God. If the sonne being ioyned wyth him should also be called God, the Ethnikes might thinke we put more Gods then one. Wherefore to withstand their supersticio, we make this word Lord an Epitheton of the sonne. But if we name Iesus Christ by himselfe and alone he is playnely called God, as it appeareth in many places of the scriptures. And he sheweth a certayne similitude: as a beame of the sunne when we make mencion of it by it selfe, we call it the sun, and we say that the sun entrech in at our windowes. But when it happneth that the sunne is also to be named together with the beame, we do not call the beame by the name of the sun, but we say it is the beame of the sun. But the fyrst reason is more fyne: and by that that Paul declareth, that peace is to be looked for of vs as wel fro the son as from the father, is shewed the equality of eyther of them betweene themselves. And the salutation which Paul euery where putteth before his epistles, is of no small force. For if the blessings of the fathers were of much force, that is, the blessings of Noe, Isaac, Iacob, Moses, and of other, vndoubtedly the prayers of Paul also are not to be counted vnprofitable. And for as much as we see that both nature and the holy ghost abhorred not from this kinde of office to salute one an other, the same maner and vsage is still to be retayned. But we must onely take hede that we salute not any man dissemblingly, and thinking an other thing in the hart, do it onely in outward voyce or writinge. Otherwise saluting is an instrument not a little apte to admonish vs of loue towards our neighbours, and that our neighbour may vnderstande what loue we beare vnto him. And thus much touchinge the salutation. Now let vs come to the Exordium, that is, the beginning: wherein Paul very much laboureth to winne vnto him the Romanes, and chiefly for that, that he exceedingly reioyceth that they are come to Christ.

First, verely I geue thanks vnto God, through Iesus Christ, for you al, because your faith is published, through out al the world. For God is my witnesse, whom I worship wyth my spirite, in the Gospell of his sonne, that without ceasing, I make mencion of you alwayes in my prayers: beseechynge that at one tyme or other, a prosperous iorney might happen vnto me by the wyll of God, that I may come vnto you. For I am desyrous to see you, that I might bestow among you, some spirituall gift, to strengthen you withall: that is, that I might haue consolation together with you, through the mutuall fayth, whiche both ye and I haue. And I woulde not that ye should be ignorant brethren, how that I haue oftentimes, purposed to come vnto you (but haue bene let hether to) to haue some frute among you, as I haue among other of the nations. For I am debter both to the Greekes, and also to the Barbarous, vnto the learned, and also vnto the vnlearned: so that as muche as in me is, I am redy to preach the Gospell, to you of Rome also.

All

All wittinges in the beginning are wont to tend to this ende, to get the god will of the hearers, as much as is possible: which thinge Paule here doth, and first in that he sheweth them how he geueth thanks vnto God for them. He declareth the cause thereof, namely, for that their sayth was now published throughout the whole world. And he affirmeth, that he continually maketh pray-ers for them, that they might goe forward as they had begonne. Farther he sheweth that he is exceeding desirous to see them present. And thereof he sheweth causes, namely, both to comfort them, and also to confirme both himselfe and them. And he addeth this also, that he desireth to do these things euen of duety. For by reason of his Apostleship which he executed, he acknowledged himselfe debytour vnto all nacions. And he thereunto addeth, that for that cause he is not ashamed of the Gospell. And so concludeth he his Exordium. Here let vs first marke, that it is the duety of a Christian mind, to geue thanks vnto God, as well for the good thinges of other men, as for his owne: which thinge is cleane contrary vnto enuy, whose nature, when it is of great force, is to be soze for an other mans welfare: or when it is not of great force but somewhat remisse, yet at the least it little regardeth, or reioyceth in the prosperity of others. He sayth that he geueth thanks vnto his God. It is not to be doubted but that God of his owne nature is common to all, and yet the Saindes do make him proper vnto themselves, not to this entent to exclude their fellows and partners, but they are prouoked thereunto by a certayne priuate feeling of the goodnes of God, which stirreth them vp to vse this kind of speech. Besides this they perceiue that certayne thinges are singularly graunted vnto them, which vnto other are not geuen. In which consideration we reade that God named himselfe the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: when as yet he was the God of all men. Paule geueth thanks for the sayth of the Romanes: for which thing contrarily other men were angry and offended. Wherefore we see that in the Christians and in the vngodly there is a farre sundry mynde.

Through Iesus Christ.] He geueth thanks throughe him: because by the selfe same all good thinges are derpued vnto vs. And it is meete, that by this selfe same mean, they return vnto the authoꝝ again. For we with our infirmity and weakenes wherewith we are infected, do pollute the good and free giftes of God, when they are bestowed vpon vs. Wherefore if they should be referred vnto God, as we haue them in vs, they should easely ware vile: but thorough Christ they are purged, and being throughe him offered vnto God, they are made a sweete sauour. Paule is in a manner in all his epistles stirred vp, to geue thanks vnto God for theyꝝ giftes vnto whom he witteth: because he desired nothing moze, then that the name of God shoulde be sanctified and his kingdome enlarged, which thinge when he saw to haue successe, straight way he brake forth into geuing of thanks.

Your sayth (sayth he) is published throughout the whole world.] As though he should haue sayd: I do not in bayne geue thanks vnto God, neyther do I alone perceane the benefite of God towarde you: but the whole world doth now vnderstand, how deare you are vnto God. Wherefore it must nedes be that the sayth of the Romanes was feruent and lively, and which wrought by charity: otherwise it coulde not so easily be published throughout the whole world. Neyther was this a smale worke of God, that the Gospell was spred abroad so quickly, that in Pauls tyme (as he here testifieth vnto the Romanes, and also vnto the Colossians) it was amply solwed throughout the whole world. But by this word VVhole we must vnderstand the principall and chiefe partes of the world, and without doubt it was wonderful merueilous, how the Romanes being ouerwhelmed with supersticions (for when they had overcome the world, they called vnto themselves deuillish Gods out of all partes of the world) at the length should repent, and geue their mindes to the true religion. Further in that Paule sayth, he geueth thanks & prayeth for them, he admoni-

teeth them what they should do, namely that they also should geue thanks and pray for him. Let vs in this place behold, that it is the nature of the children of God, to synd in euery creature occasion to geue thanks vnto God, for this is their endeouour, continually to seeke God, but he is euery where. Wherefore forasmuch as they perceane him to be euery where, they geue him thanks for all thinges: for that there is nothing so discommodious but that some way it turneth them, to good. On the contrary part we may see, that the vngodly and the children of the deuill are neuer at rest, neyther haue they any thing so com- modious or quiet, which troubleth them not. And whilest they alwayes fixe their eyes vpon molestious and greuous thinges, they neuer from their hart geue thanks vnto God, yea they alwayes both blasphemie him, & are vnquiet. He commendeth vnto them the sayth which they had receaued to the ende they should not lightly regard or esteeme it. And the alteracions of the Church of Rome are much to be lamented, which being here so highly praysed for the re- ligious which it receaued, hath afterward so degenerated, that it is now made the seate of Antichrist, whereby we are admonished that the Church abideth not alwayes in one and the selfe same state and place. It dayly chaungeth his abiding places, and wandzeth from nation to nation. There were not long agoe in the East, most noble Churches, namely, at Hierusalem, Antioche, A- lexandria, and Constantinople, where at this day reigneth the filthines of Ma- homet, and those Christians which liue there, are addiaced vnto infinite super- stitions, and do by litle and litle degenerate into a straunge religion. Where- fore the sentence of our sauioz is most true, wherein he pronounced, that the last should be first, and the first last.

Neither is thys to be leste vnspoken of, that the Apostle myndyng to com- mend the Romanes, which had receaued the Religio of Christ, calleth the same Religio sayth: to the end we should vnderstand, that therof depēdeth our holines. Thou shalt find the same kinde of praise ascribed vnto the Thessalonians in the for- mer Epistle the. i. Chap, where Paul writeth that they were a paterne & an ex- ample to all them whiche belened, both in Macedonia, and also in Achaia: so that their sayth was now euery where published. But of the Romanes the admira- tion is the greater, as Chrysostome testifieth: for as much as they had most large dominions, abounded in riches, and overflowed on euery side with pleasures: all which thinges make men to shyinke from sound religion. Farther it was merueilous, that they gaue credite vnto the Jewes, men otherwise hated of all nations, being also fischer men and vnlearned, and as touching the world men most abiection: & especially whē they had heard preached vnto the a man that was crucified, conuersante in Jewrye, whome they had neuer scene, and were taughte to hope, that all good thinges shoulde come vnto the from him, which had bene so cruelly put to death: neither was there any felicity promised the in this life: but the crosse, persecutions, and all aduersities: moreouer they were commaunded to leade a strait lye, to put away pleasures, to dispise the world, and to mortify wicked affections. All which thinges do rather withdraw men from any religion, then allure them vnto it.

For God is my vvitness.] After that he hath shewed how he gaue thanks vnto God for them, he addeth the perpetuall memozy that he maketh of them in his dayly prayers. And all these thinges tend to this ende, that they should perceane that Paul loued them. For these thinges neither are found, nor can be found without benendolence and a singular charity. Neither affirmeth he these thinges simply, but ioyneth vnto them an othe. For his chiefe care was that they should geue credite vnto him.

whem I serue in my sprite.] By sprite he vnderstandeth a mynde inspired with the holy ghost. And Ambrose when he interpreteyth this place, sayth, that the spirit is the minde, wherewith we ought chiefly to worship God. For he is a sprite: and therefore it is meete that he be serued in sprite. The false Apocles

fles accused Paule as a forsaker of the law, & an Apostata from Moses. Wherefore the crime of impiety was layd to his charge, which should exceedingly haue alienated the mindes of the Romanes from him, if they coulde haue bene so perswaded. Therefore he purgeth himselfe, that althoughe he worshipped not God with the ceremonies of Moses and rites of the law, yet neuertheles he ser-ued him in spirite. Which thing he testified also vnto Timothe, when he wrote that he had from his progenitors worshipped God with a pure conscience. By which words we must not thinke, that he excuseth his sinne and persecution agaynst the Saintes: but only sheweth this, that it was not agaynst his conscience, as some, which by reason of weakenes suffer not those things to take place, which by a sound iudgement of the conscience they know to be vpriight. Paule fell of ignoraunce, which without doubt was sinne: but not of that kinde, that it should be sayd, that he did agaynst that which he thought in his mynde. But that which he sayth here, that he serued God in spirite, Christ exprested, when he spake vnto the woman of Samarita, sayinge of the true worshippers, that they should worship in spirite and in truth. And that was spoken to this ende, to expres that one day it should come to passe, that the describing of any certayne places wherein God should be worshipped, should be taken awaye, and the ceremonies of the Jewes should be abolished: so that, to worship in spirite, may be referred vnto the place and ceremonies of the lawe: and that which is added, and in truth, declareth the thinge it selfe, excluding shadowes whiche were set forth in the olde Testament. These did in deede helpe the fathers in theyr tyme, because they had the worde of God toynded with them, which might be com-prehended in them by sayth. Wherefore God blessed them: so that (if sayth were present) they were in their tyme very profitable: but when Christ came they ought to geue place. But as touching rites inuented by men, we can not in like maner say that they much profited, because they had not the worde of God.
 Therefore they are woorthely to be extingueshed and put away: excepte some of them, as touching outward pollicy, may be iudged profitable. We serue in spi-rite, when no part of our flesh is any moze circumcised, but the mynde and vices: beastes are not slayne, but we crucify our owne flesh with the lustes thereof. Which selfe same worshipping in spirite Paul in an other place exprested, when he sayde: I desyre you throughe the mercye of God that ye geue your bodies a lyncely sacryfice holy and acceptable vnto God, and that your wooshyppynge be reasonable. He vseth this verbe λατρεία, from whence they saye is deriued this word λατρεία, which signifieth that worshipping which is due vnto God only, whereby we utterly addice our selues vnto him: neither can it (as Augustine testifieth in his 5. booke De ciuitate Dei the first chapter:) be exprested, by one word of the Latins. For pietas, that is, piety or godlines, is not only to-wardes God, but also towards our parents and country. Also Religio, that is religion, is not drawen onely to holpe thinges, but also belongeth to that due-ty which we owe vnto kinsefolkes, and humane affinityes. But in the meane while he iudgeth that, by the Greke wordes, diuers thinges are in this thyng distinguished: so that this worde λατρεία, signifieth the worshipping which is geuen vnto God, and δουλεία, the worship whiche is geuen vnto Princes and magistrates. As touchinge the thing we easely graunt, that there is a difference. For we worship God after one sorte, and we honour Princes after an other manner. Chrysostome in hys 33. homelye vpon John sayth: that it longeth vnto the creature to worshippinge, and vnto the creator to be worshipped. And he obiecteth vnto him selfe, why do we worshipping Christe a man, when as he hath in verye deede a body created. He answereth: So man when he would reuerence a king sayth vnto hym, Put of thy purple garments, and laye away the crowne and other ornaments: for I wil worship thee naked, he dareth not speake these words but honoureth hym beinge both clothed with purple, & adozned with a crowne.

uine nature, but worship it together with it: But the reason whereon adoration dependeth is bys deuinity. But as touching the Greeke wordes, λατρεία is al one with δουλεία. For as Suidas testifieth λατρεύειν is δουλεύειν. But afterward it was vsed to signifie σεβομαι, & is, godly to worship. And he addeth, λατρεία είναι δουλείαν ἐπὶ μισθῷ: that is, a hired bondage. And this signification is manifestly had in xenophon in his 3. booke of the education of Cyrus: where the husband speaketh thus: Εγὼ μὲν ὡς Κόρη καὶ τῆς ψυχῆς πριάμην ὥστε μὴ ποτε λατρεύσαι ταύτην: that is, Undoubtedly I will spende euen my life, rather then she should be brought to bondage. Then the wife answered, ἑαυτὴ ψυχῆς ἀντὶ πριάιτο ὥς τε μὴ δουλεύειν. Pea and we reade in the holy scriptures that in Leuiticus it is sayd: you shall not do any seruile worke, ἔργον λατρευτῶν. And λατρίς in Iob is called an handmayden. And Augustine also himselfe in his booke Locutionum Deut: acknowledgeth that λατρεύω is not alwayes referred vnto thinges deuine. For where as it is sayde in Deut. the 28. chapter. Thou shalt serue thine enemyes, in Greeke it is sayd λατρεύσας. And Paul likewise when he affirmeth himselfe to be a worshipper of Iesus Christ writeth δούλω, wherefore thou seest that this difference of wordes is not obserued among the Grecians. Howbeit they haue a worde whiche is proper vnto the worshipping of God called θεοσιβεία. but whether it be a word vbled among good and olde authors, I know not. Augustine in the place already alledged De ciuitate Dei, maketh mention of an other word called εγκρατεία. But that properly belongeth vnto rites and misteries. For it is sayd that Orpheus first taught the Thracians misteryes. Wherefore that word was deriued of the Thracians, turning this letter α. into ι. But to returne to λατρεία. It is deriued of λα, which particule signifieth behemency, and τρέμω, which is to tremble. For seruantes do exceedingly tremble at the commaundementes of theyr Lordes. The same ambiguitie is there in this hebreue worde Schaah, which signifieth to prostrate himselfe and to bowe downe. Wherefore we reade oftentimes Hiskaim, that is, they worshipped, and Histauh, that is, a bowing downe: and in the plurall number it is sayd Histauidoth, that is, prostrations. And that honour of prostrating the body, and bowing the knees is not done before God onely, but also before kinges and Angells. For it is a simbole or token whereby we represent our submission and lowlynes. The elders vbled other signes also in worshipping. Wherefore Chrysostome, in an homely which he hath when he expoundeth these wordes of Iohn, the true worshippers shall worship in spirite and in truth, sayth: When thou shewest thy handes, openest thy harte, listest by thy face vnto heauen, and openest thyne eyes, what other thing els doost thou, then shew the whole man vnto God. Augustine De ciuitate Dei, in the place now alledged, sayth that this λατρεία is a religious and humble submission: which I vnderstand so to be obserued, that when we prostrate our selues before God we signify that we wholly submit our selues vnto him, and that as touching al thinges without any exception. But if we sal down before an Emperour or king, we signify that we submitte our selues vnto him, as it pertaineth to his gouernment: but yet not wholly, because we wil euermore haue god and his word excepted. And in these outward signes which are to be geuen vnto Princes, a Christian must obserue the maners of the countrey, making a difference in his mynde betweene ether subiection: and let hym chiesely beware that herein he do nothing contereately: farther let him not geue these signes, but vnto them whome he by the precept of God is commaunded to reuerence: that is, vnto all those which are put in any high authoritie, whether the same be spirituall or temporall. But let him not in any case prostrate himselfe before images: forasmuch as that is expessedly prohibited. Pea he must not also shew any such hono- of bowing the knees, or invocation, vnto the saintes that are dead. For there is no word of God concerning that thyng: neyther can we when we do this, leane vnto sayth: neyther know we whether they beare vs, or vnderstand what what thinges are done among vs. And we must take heed, that when we honour Princes and fall downe before them, we desire not any thing of them through flattery, which lieth not in their power to geue vs: as is to aske eternall life, spirituall giftes, conseruation of life and such like. But of a king let vs desire the helpe belonging to a king: of learned and wise men, to communicate theyr doctryne to rich men, to deale somewhat of their goods. These are the circumstances which we must vse. And to speake briefly, this worshipping of god, which is to serue in spirite, is reduced vnto fouer principall points: which are adoration, trust, inuocation, and geuinge of thankes. Adoration is an humble and religious submission, whereby we utterly submitte our selues vnto God, and that in al thinges: Trust is, whereby we rest in him, considering the power, wisdom and high goodnes, wherewith he is adorned: For whiche thinges we cleaue vnto him, neither do we thinke, that he will forsake, or frustrate vs. Inuocation is: whereby we flye vnto God, in al perils, and aduersitytes: as which know that he is euery where at hande, and that, accordinge to his promises, he both can and will succor vs with his defence. Geuing of thankes is, whereby we referre all good thinges vnto him, as vnto the firste author. These fouer thinges, are due vnto God onely, neyther can they, as we haue defined them, be ascribed to other creatures. The Devil hath with much deceit, diligently traueled to obscure this kynd of worshipping, when he perswaded the worlde, that men might in dede principally, worship one chief God, and in the meane time, adioyne vnto him a number of lesser Gods. Whereby came to passe, that that was deuoted, which God would haue most of all vniited and ioyned together, & so the Ethnikes were deceaued. Farther in our times, such certayne distributions and proper offices, are so distributed vnto those which are numbred among the saintes, that very oftentimes, inuocation is made vnto them: This mozeouer is to be considered, that that which Paule sayth: To serue in spirite comprehendeth a fatherly reuerence, that is, of the childe, toward the father, and not a seruile feare: wherewith the Ethnikes being perswaded, hated the iudgement of God, and would haue no God to be at al. Wherefore they haue alwayes applied theyr cogitations vnto fained religions, and they performed certayne outward woorkes, whereby they thought themselves, full of all pietie: and yet in the meane time they absteyned not fro wicked actes. But godly men, so far as much as they serue him in spirite, are careful that they saue not vnto themselves a God, after theyr owne fashy: but do embrace him, euery as it hath pleased him to declare himselfe, in the woorde of the scriptures. And when they see that he is set forth vnto vs in the holy scriptures, as a Lord and father, they worship him, obey him, and study to aduance his honour, as much as they are able. And agayne, when they see hym declared as a iudge, they let his iudgement leate before theyr eyes in all theyr actions, lest they shoulde transgresse in any thinge, and incurre the anger of theyr mighty iudge. But they doe not so feare hym, that they hate hym, or that they woulde flye from hym: yea and thoughte there were graunted them a place to flye vnto, they woulde chuse rather to embrace him punishing and chasteringe them. And amonge these thinges which oughte to haue the principall place, as touching this spirituall worshipping, is obedience: wherof we rede, that it is better then sacrifices. Neyther had God a regard in a manner to any other thinge in the whole lawe, and rites of ceremonies, than to haue men truly subiect and obedient vnto him. But we so far as much as we haue contracted a corrupte and viciate nature by the sinne of Adam, are in nothyng moze diligent and exquisite, then to obtrude our own inuencions, and fained rites, for the worshipping of God: and greater seueritye is vnto the transgressors of the Commandementes of men, then there is agaynst those which publikely violate the Commandementes of God. A man shall euery where see blasphemers, whozemongers, adulterers, and perjured persons laughed at by the magistrates, so farre are they of, from punishinge them them. But agaynst hym whiche will vse the sacramentes of the Eucharist in both kinds they rage euen vnto the fyre. And to be brief, men are condemned to death for neglecting of humayne traditions: but for violatinge of the lawe of God, they are not so muche as once accused. Wherefore God did not without a cause in Deut. commaund Moyses: Onely the thynges whiche I haue commaunded shalte thou keepe: neyther shalte thou adde nor dimynyshe any thyng. And we haue no p̄ceter remedy agaynst this pestilence, then dayly to be occupied in the holy scriptures, and to gather out of them, by what meanes God would declare him selfe vnto vs, and to picke out such wayes whereby he hath chieflye commaunded vs to woꝛshyp him: & in thus doyng we may wout any great difficultie serue god in spirite. And contrary to this spiritual woꝛshyping is, to serue god in flesh, that is, onely wyth fayned rytes, and outward ceremonies, laying away faith and inward piety. This Antithesis or contrarie posicion Paul touched, when he sayd vnto the Galathians. See which began in the spirite, beware ye end not in the flesh. Those Galathians were rightly instructed: but by the deceates of false Apostles, they declined vnto the Jewishe ceremonies, and outward rites: which thyng was to spynish in the flesh, that whych was with holynes and byright begonne. Vnto the Philippians also he sayth: We are the circumcision, whiche serue God in sprite, hauing confidence in God, and not in the flesh. When he manifestly declareth what it is to trust in the flesh, saying: Although I, if any other, may put confidence in flesh: as whych am of the kindred of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, an Hebrew borne of the Hebrewes and of the secte of the Pharisees, by feruentnes persecutinge the church of Christe, and as touchinge iustificacions of the lawe I was conuersant without blame. &c. Thou seest nowe that carnall woꝛshippinge consisteth of all these thynges. But spirituall woꝛshippinge consisteth alsogether of faith and charity. Paule addeth:

In the gospell of his sonne:] By which wordes he declareth, that this spirituall woꝛshipping, if it be expessed in outward workes, consisteth principally in this, & we should preach Christ, & that we should allure vnto him, as much as lyeth in vs, as many of our neyghbours as we can. He hath alredey declared what God he called to witnes: now he goeth to the thyng which he would haue signified vnto the Romanes. And that is, that he continually made men-cion of them in his prayers. Neyther can it hereby be gathered, that Paule did alwayes so praye, that he neglected other dueties. He preached, he toyned, he laboured with hys handes: and spynallye he executed all such thinges as pertained vnto hys office. Wherefore we must not expound those thynges, which are here spoken, accordyng to the word, but accordyng to the sence: and we must vnderstand them no otherwise the that, as often as the Apostle prayed, he made mention of them. And the prayers of the Sainas are deuided into two kyndes.
For there are certayn which are appoynted, as whē they are had in a publike congregation at appoynted and prescribed dayes, the Lordes day (I say) and if there be any other oppoynted by the Church for publike prayers. Farther it is & duety of a Christian man, to haue euery day also appoynted houres, wher-in to pray vnto God, and that three times in a day or fyue tymes or seven times as hys busines wyll suffer him. There is an other kynd of those prayers, which are called vncertayne, for we vse them so often as any present daunger bygeth vs. But Paule sayth now, that he alwayes maketh mention of these men in his prayers: and in some bookes is added this aduerbe πᾶσιν, which signifyeth euery where: althoughe some exemplars haue put it out. There were heretikes which were called Melchianites: and of them Tripartita Historia maketh mention.
They attributed all things vnto prayers, and that so much, that they utterly derogated both the word of God, and also the sacraments: affirming that all these things do nothing p̄ofyte: but what commodity soener we haue, the same commeth by prayers: and they could not abyde to labour wyth theyr handes, or to do any other thing. If a man had byged them to worke they would haue said that

that that nothing profyted, soz as much as we oughte to do nothinge but pray: when as yet the Apostle expessedly admonisheth, that he whiche labourerh not, ought not also to eate. He also wyrteth, that a man must not neglecte to haue a care ouer his owne, especially his household: which fault if any man commit, he should be counted euen as an infidell. But omitting this superstition, we ought to attribute much vnto prayers, soz as much as this is the nature of the children of God to geue themselves oftentimes to prayers: for that is to acknowledge the prouidence of God. For whylest we beleue, that a man can ob-tayne nothyng, whych is not geuen him of God, we are oftentimes prouoked to employe hys ayde for such necessities as happen. And whylest we pray, we doo no lesse submitte our selues vnto God, then is the clay subiecte vnto the potter: for this thing we chiefly desire, that whatsoeuer we require, we maye haue the same throughe his wyll. And soz as much as when we pray, the mynd is led away from cares, and worldly prouisions, and is wholye carped by vnto God, there ought nothing to be moze pleasaunte vnto vs, then to occupie our selues wth this kinde of study. And it is much to be lamented, that the manner of praying is so woone out of vze at this day amonge Christians, that it is a thyng very rarely vled: and especially in so great a light of the Gospell and scriptures: wherfoze it is no meruaile though all thyngs ware so cold. Undoubtedlye heate there encreaseth, where the light cannot easely go throughe, but is beaten backe againe, and as they say reflected backwarde. Wherfoze this lower part of the ayre, which compasseth the earth, is most hot, because the beames of the sonne which strike vpon the earth, soz as much as they cannot pearse it being so thicke, are reflected, & in a manner doubled: wherby is stirred by heat. In like manner ought it to be in our harts, when the light of gods woozde shyneth vpon them. For when we haue receaued it, we oughte to reflect it vnto God, in makynge prayers vnto hym, to perfoyme those thynges in vs which he hath commaunded, and which he hath vouchsafed to reuele vnto vs. For when we reade the scriptures, God speaketh vnto vs. But when we pray, we speake vnto God. And we ought to vse this dialogue very often, that when we heare in the holy scriptures that God eyther reuealeth himselfe, or commaundeth any thynges, we agayne may desire of hym, that those thynges be not spoken in vayne vnto vs, but maye be executed wth profyte and fruite. Paul teacheth vs here so to order our prayers, that we pray not onely for our selues, but also for our neighbours. Farther, when he prayeth that he myght haue a prosperous iorney vnto the Romanes, he signifyeth that our woorkes should beginne wth prayers, if we wyll haue them to haue good successe. But some are feared away from calling vpon God because they say he heareth them not. Howbeit they ought hereby to be strengthened, for that they heare that Paul was oftentimes letted from goyng vnto Rome, and yet contynued he still in the same desire, and vled to repeat the selfe same prayers. Yea and in the latter epistle to the Corinthyans he wyrteth, that he desired as good as thre tymes, to be deliuered from the pricke of the fleshy, vnto whom yet at the last aunswere was made, that it sufficed that he had the fructioun of the grace of God. Wherfoze eyther God heareth vs at the length, or if he geueth not vs that which we desire, yet geueth he somewhat in steede thereof, which is farre better and moze profitable vnto our saluation. And God oftentimes differreth our requestes, to the ende that (as Augustine sayth in a certayne homely) we should learne to desire great thynges wth much seruentnes. Others are called away from prayers, because they thus determine wth themselves: although I desire not these thynges, yet God wyll do that which shall seeme good vnto hym: neyther shall hys wyll be altered by my prayers. But these men vnderstand not that God, before he graunteth any good thyng vnto hys elect, is wont exceedingly to kindle their mynde wth a desire to obtayne those thynges. Farther when he will do any thyng, he stirreth by those that are hys to desire the same wherby he myght for honours nours sake attribute that vnto they: prayers, which otherwisse he would haue done. Thys is an other cause also, for that benefytes are then the moze acceptable, when they are required and desired. Farther when we pray, our myndes are the moze ioynd wth God. Pea these bolwes and holy desires serme to be nothyng els, then ladders and degrees, whereby we ascend by vnto God. But let vs retorne vnto Paule, and see for what he now prayed.

ner of pro-

That I may haue (sayth he) a prosperous iorney, to come vnto you, by the vvill of God. He desired to come vnto the Romanes: wherefore hys prayer was that impedimentes myght be remoued, whiche were partly obicaded by Sathan, and partly had they: begynnynge of sondry necessities of Churches, which impedimentes, as they dayly hapened a fresh, so they with held Paule, that he could not go whether he would. A prosperous iorney he calleth not only as touchyng commoditye of the lyfe, but also a fruitfull iorney, that hys labour might not be spent in vayne. He remembred also, that he was by the oraele of God prohibyted some tymes to speake, or to go, whether he had appoynted. As we may see in the Actes the. 16. chapter: where he was forbidden to speake in Asia: and when he would haue gone into Myssia, and Bythynia, he was letted, and by night admonished in a dreame, to get him vnto Macedonia. For there stode before him a man of Macedonia, which sayd: Come and succour vs. This thyng therefore he desired as touchyng the Romanes: namely, that he might not haue any such impediment. And though we heare, that he desired a prosperous iorney yet we must not perswade our selues, that he referred these thynges to his owne commoditye or to gayne. The prosperous iorneyes which God graunted him to Macedonia, serued to the increase of the Gospell. For otherwise he was both beaten there, and also cast into prison. And when at the last he shoulde go, vnto Rome, God, which heard hys prayers, brought to passe, that he was compelled to appeale vnto Cesar. And when he was in a shippe wracke, he had hym to be of god chere, for that he should be, a witnes of Christ at Rome also, as he had bene at Jerusalem, whereby appeareth what prosperity or successe is to be looked for in the workes of the elect. Andoubtedly that kynde of prosperity is to be looked for, not wherein the fleshe may rest, but whereby may come abundant fruite of the Gospell. And whereas the Apostle sayth, by the will of God, it is not so to be vnderstand, as though he thought that any thing could be done besides the will of God: but he desireth such a will, which should fauor and prosper hys enterpryse that his labour myght not be in vayne. And he addeth:

For I desire to see you.] Thys myght sufficiently haue bene vnderstand by hys prayers. And yet is it not superfluously added. For he woulde not haue them thinke that hys prayers were slyght and common prayers, but such as proceeded from a perfect and iust desire. For we must not coldely desire those thynges whiche we imploze of God in our prayers. This was Pauls care towards the churches. Eytter he went thether hymselfe, when neede required: or when he could not goo, he wrote, or sent some that were very deare and nigh vnto hym. Hys charity did alwayes burst forth into acts, which myght profite hys neighbours. He sawe that the saluation of the Romanes was now at hand: therefore he would aduaunce it also by his labour. And in that he prayeth in his prayers for a prosperous iorney, it is nothyng els, but to desire to be sent, euen as Esay offered hymselfe, saying: Behold Lord I am redy, send me. And the same Paule sayd: He which desireth a bishoppricke desireth a good worke. Furthermore it is a perpetuall affection of good men to desire to be ioynd together, forasmuch as they haue hym to be their God, which is euery where in the holy scriptures called the God of vnicity & peace. Whereouer their meetings together are not without profyte. For alwayes there is some increase of the spirite and grace of God and it seemeth that God geueth strength vnto the members of Christ, then chiefly, when they are ioynd together. Which sentence some abuse, when they cry, that we must geue credite vnto Synodes and counsels, as though god can not not permitte so holy fathers which haue assembled together, to be deceaned. That holy assembly (say they) of holy men coulde not be had without fruite: but they (as Paul sayth) ought to haue bene such, as had serued God in spirite, had geuen them selues to aduance the gospel of God, had powzed out pray-ers wth most seruent sayth, and attempted nothyng of the fleshy, or of humane affection, but suffered all thynges to be done by the will of God. But that they perfozmed not these thynges, the euent sufficiently declareth. For they haue brought in many superstitions, and sometymes haue most senerly decreed things that are apertly against the word of God. I wyl not deny but that those which assemble rightly and orderly, namely, after that maner that I haue now expzessed, may bring forth farre greater frutes, then when they deale seperatly and apart. Of thys thyng Chrysostome bringeth a very apt similitude. Burning firebrandes (sayth he) when they are seperated a sonder, do conceale and re-tayne within them some heate and light: but yet not very much. But if they be put all into one place, eyther into a chimney or into a forname, they wyl stirre by both a very greate, and also a most seruent flambe. In lyke maner must we thinke of holy men, being eyther assembled together, or seperated a sonder.

To bestow among you some spiritual gifte. He declareth, why he so much desired, to come vnto them: namely, to make them partakers of the giftes of God. The Apostle was a vessel filled with deuyne gyfts: Wherefore, whether soener he went, he bestowed and distributed them vnto the belcuers. But soasmuche as God is, both the autho<sup>r</sup>, and geuer of all spirituall giftes, why doth Paul here seme to challenge, or clayme them vnto hym selfe? Forsooth, because he was a minister of the Church: and God hath so much hono<sup>red</sup> the minister, that he also comunicateth euen his owne proper worke vnto the ministers. For as touchyng theyr functions, they are not seperated from God, whych is the autho<sup>r</sup> of them, but rather are so to be ioyned with him, as though one, & the selfe same worke proceeded from them both. And after thys manner are ministers sayd to forgeue or to retayne synnes, to beget men vnto Christe, and to saue them. But if thou looke vpon God, and the minister a parte eche by hym selfe, then heare what Paul sayth: I haue planted, Apollo hath watred, but God hath geuen the increase. Also, who is hee, whyche planteth? And who is he, whyche watreth? And in an other place he sayth, that the holye Ghost distributeth his giftes vnto every man, as it pleaseth him, and according to his will. But as we haue sayd the ministers must not be seperated from God: who by this dignity which he geuerh vnto them, prouideth chiefly for thys, that the saythfull should more strepghly be bound together in the church. For euen as a cite is counted one because men helpe one an other, when as some are able to geue counsell, other excell in strength, and other in handycrafts and industry: so would God haue it to be in the church, namely, that some should teach, and other som be taught, some helpe theyr brethren through prayers, some dispense the sacraments, and other some receaue them: to the ende that by these mutuall offices, Christians shoulde bee so bounde together, that the spirite and grace of God shoulde spreade from one member to an other, by ioyntes and cloyures together, as it is wyrtten vnto the Collossians and vnto the Ephesians. All these wordes are here set as much conducinge to wyne the hartes of the Romanes: that they should looke for hym chearefullye, and wth greate loue receaue hym when he should come, as though therewythall they should receaue some excellent gyfts of the spirite accordynge to hys promise. These thynges serue also to stirre by theyr mindes to reade hys Epyll. For vndoubtedlye he wrote it for no other cause, but that that whych by presence of hys body he coulde not perfozme, he myght yet at the least expzesse by hys Epyll. Whych self thyng is a cause also, why we ought in lyke maner wth exquisite diligence to reade and heare that whych is here wyrtten. Neyther must we harken vnto those blasphemers, whiche beyng enemies vnto pietie, and vnto the true doctrine of iustification and predestination, are not ashamed to crye out and say: I would to God Paul had neuer writte this epistle. Which saying though they go about to mitigate, affirming that they spake it because of these dangerous tymes, yet bring they not any sufficient excuse. For what is this els, but to reprehende the counsels of God, and of the holy ghost: Further let vs marke that it is not conuenient, that assemblies together of Christians should be vnprofitable and idle, as prophake assemblies are: but they ought to haue in them some spirituall commodity. And this Creak word usefulle, containeth in it a vehement signification. For thereby the Apostle declareth, that he will geue nothing vnto them, but that which he had first receaued of God. For he sayth he will make them partakers of those giftes which he himselfe had now obtained. And in such sort we ought to visite our neighbours, namely, to haue alwayes some spirituall giftes ready to communicate vnto them. And on the other side, we ought to be prompt, easely to receaue, if any spirituall profite or commodity be offred vnto vs by their comynge vnto vs. But now a dayes they vse peregrinations or pilgrimages to images and to worshippe reliques of the dead: and not to succor the liuely temples of Christ. The bishop of Rome writeth sometymes, but yet only pardons, bulles, and curses. He sendeth men to compound and dispence for sondry kinds of sinnes, and to release bowes. But none of these doth he freely: but they are altogether instituted for gayne, and to scrape mony together.

To strengthen you.] Here is added the cause, why he so much desired to come vnto the Romanes: namely, to strengthen them. This is it which Christ commanded Peter: And thou at the length when thou art conuerted confirme thy brethren. By these wordes is signified, that the Romanes were not constant: for they seemed now ready to receaue the religion of the Jewes. And yet because he would not offend their mindes, that which he had before spoken of their confirmation, he straight way leneth, and mitigateth wpth these wordes which follow:

That I may receaue exhortation together with you.] Here he knitteth himselfe also with their infirmity, as though he also had neede of instruction. And assuredly there is none in the Church placed so high, that he can not receaue some confirmation and edification of the weaker. Nayther doth God vse to geue all thynges vnto all men, but that the weake ones haue oftentymes some singular and priuate gifte of God, whereby to helpe the stronger. Wherefore if Paul, which was a pillar of the Church, stronger then any yron, harder then the diamond, confesseth that he myght profite himselfe through these mens exhortacion, why should we then doubt of our selues? But if the sayth of the Romanes were so great, that it was now every where published, what needed they of any confirmation? We answere, that sayth is in deede of hys owne nature sure and constant, and if it be such which iustifieth, it ought vnto differ from opinion, that we doubt not of the verity of the other part, but forasmuch as we are weake, and do on every side slippe, being assaulted of our fleshe, the deuill and the world, we haue neede continually of the increase of faith. Peter beleued truly in Christ, when he sayd: Save me: otherwise I perish. But the Lord sayd vnto him, O thou of little faith, why doubtest thou. By which wordes Peter was taught, that the danger hong not ouer him, eyther by reason of the waters, or of the tempest: but through the want of faith. Wherefore these thinges do nothing disagree betwene themselves, that the sayth of the Romanes was to be magnified, and that yet neuertheles they had neede of confirmation. We might reade that which we haue here interpreted concerning exhortacion, as if there had bene mention made of consolacion, as though Paul should haue sayde: therefore I will come vnto you, not only to strengthen you, but also to stirre vp a mutuall consolacion, and that through the sayth which is found as well in me as in you. For they which mete together when they perceaue themselves not to be of a sandy opinion, but of one and the selfe same opinion, vse exceedinglye to reioyce. Wherefore Chrysostome and the Greke annotations do admonishe vs, that consolacion in this place may be taken for ioy. Neyther ought we to doubt whether this consolacion should be betwene the Romanes themselves, or betwene them and Paule: Because the wordes which follow, seeme to dispatch that doubt, in that it is sayd.

Through the mutuall fayth, which both ye, and I haue.] Neyther did he rashely make mencion of fayth. Forasmuch as the property thereof is, to powze it selfe into an other euen lyke leuen: which when it hath leuened one part of the dow, goeth forward into the next part. But they are to be counted as colde beleuers, which to theyr power labour not to make other of the same mynde, that they are now of, which thynge if it myght be brought to passe, vndoubtedly so many should be amended as are drawen by theyr admonishment. For what soeuer sinne we committe, the same commeth of the imbecillity of fayth. And by these wordes, Paul bringeth to an equality those thinges which he hath spoken: affirming that there should come a common gayne both vnto himselfe and vnto the Romanes by their mutuall meetyng together. And fayth is required on ether party: as touching Paule, that he might be able to obtaine the gifts which he wished vnto the Romanes: agayne as touching them, that they might receaue those thinges, which were to be ministred vnto them by Paule.

I would not that ye should be ignorant brethern.] Ambrose readeth this text otherwise: after this maner: I know ye are not ignorant brethern, & he expoundeth it, that the Romanes were certified of the minde of Paule by such as beleued in Christ, which continually went to Rome, as by Aquila, Priscilla, and others, who knew right well Pauls purpose and determination. But we will follow the common reading, according vnto which the Apostle seemeth to preuent them, as though they should haue sayd: why then hast thou differred thy coming vnto vs, seeing thou so much desirest it? Paule answereth, that he oftentimes assayed to come vnto them: but it would not be, because he was alwayes letted. To the Thessalonians he sayth that Sathan was the let that he could not come to Thessalonica. And in the latter to the Corinthians, he maketh mencion of a greuous persecution which he suffered in Asia, and that he was tempted aboue his strength, so that he almost dyspayred of his life: and therefore his coming to Corinth was prolonged longer then he had appoynted. But here he expreth not of whom he was letted. But there might be three kindes of lettes. First God, which by manifest oracles sometimes called hym backe from his appoynted enterprises: as it appeareth in the 16. chapter of the Actes: an other kinde is the necessity of Churches, which euery day increased new and new: lastly aduersities and persecutions, whiche were stirred vp by Sathan. Chrysostome hath noted, that because Paule hath not exprest the cause why so great a city which ruled then ouer all, should be lesse esteemed then many other obscurer cities and prouinces, humane sence and reason myght therefore be offended. But he repretheth this inquisition as curious, and which becommeth not godly myndes. It is sufficient (sayth he) that we know that all thynges are done by the prouidence of God. Neyther ought we to thynke, that any mortall man can better prouide for his creatures, then God himselfe can. Neyther let vs thinke that the Romanes were therefore the worse esteemed and prouided for, because Paule came so late vnto them. And he may be an example vnto vs, not to be much curious in enquiring after such thinges. He hath left the cause vnspoken of, and peradventure he enquired not for it. As sone as he sawe that he was letted, straght way he obeyed, without enquiring the causes: for as much as it is not for seruautes to search out the counsels of theyr Lord. And when I consider these thynges, I thinke I may thereby gather that Chrysostome was not fully perswaded that the Romanes were first by Peter the Apostle conuerted vnto Christ, before Paule came thither. For then answer might easily haue bene made. The city of Rome was not utterly forsaken Lettes which might hinder Paul from going to Rome. The Romanes seeme to be lesse esteemed of Paule then the other nations. It is not for clerics vnto enquire out the counsels of his master. Chrysostome was not of this opinion that the Romanes were first conuerted vnto Christ by Peter.

forsoaken of God, whilst Paul was occupied otherwhere: for Peter preached the Gospel there. This is further to be noted, that God oftentimes bleth to accomplish those thynges which are already appointed, and desired of the sayntes to be done, but yet at a farre other tyme, and after an other maner and way, then they decreed wyth themselves to do it. Jacob when he heard that Joseph his sonne should be worshipped of his brethren and also euen of his parents, began to thinke that to be a thyng odious, and which coulde not be brought to passe without exceeding great troubles. And therefore he did not gladly geue eare vnto it. And yet did God performe the same: but yet by a far other meanes then he thought. So that Paul should go to Rome, it was both decreed by the prouidence of God, and also he exceedingly desired it: but it came to passe farre otherwise, then euer Paul thought. For he when he came to Jerusalem, and was so euill handled there, that he was in danger of his lyfe, was compelled to appeale vnto Cesar: and God bled that occasion to sende hym to Rome, which he afterward shewed vnto hym by a vision, when he suffered shipwacke. For he sayd vnto hym: Euen as thou hast borne witness vnto me at Ierusalem, so also shalt thou doo at Rome. Wherefore we ought alwayes to be mindefull of that place in Jeremy, the 10. chapter: a mans way is not in his owne hand, neyther is it in man, to walke, and to direct his steppes. It is God which boweth vs, whether soeuer he will. And though he sendeth not forth his angels, which should expessedly teach vs what he will haue vs to do, yet he is wont to vge vs by a certayne necessity, and to bring in occasions, whereby to vge vs to do that which he hath already before decreed and appoynted wyth hymselfe. And yet of the cause of this delay there semeth somewhat to be written in the last chapter saue one of this epistle. For he signifyeth that necessities of other Churches letted hym, and occasions of preaching the Gospel, which were more commo- dious and more necessary, which were offered him in other places. For there when he had written, that he had now filled all places with the Gospel, tho- roughout all those regions, & was very desirous to see them, neyther had any more to do in those regions, he promised shortly to take his iorney toward the.

To haue some fruite among you also.] Origene complayneth here of the darke construction, or confused readinge, which he very obscurely goeth about to restore. But in my iudgement it is playne and easy inough if all this. (And I was letted euen to this day) be written by interposition or a parenthesis. For then shall the sentence be, that he was oftentimes redy to come, to haue some fruite among them, as he had among other nations. He sayth not arrogantly that he will bring them fruite: but rather that he will receaue and take fruite of them. Which fruite was, to be strengthened and stablished in Christ. And this is a certayne token of saythfull scholemasters, if they count the prosypte of theyr disciples, their fruite and aduantage. Although there are some enterpre- ters, which expound this sentence of the reward which should be geuen vnto Paul for preaching the Gospel among the Romanes. But the first interpre- tation is more playne, and more agreeable vnto the wordes of Christ, wherein he sayth: Ye haue not chosen me, but I haue chosen you that ye should go forth and bring fruite. But Paul semeth by his desire to preuent the will of God: which thing profitable seruantes ought not to do. For they must wayte for the commaundement of their Lord, neyther must they resist when he commaun- deth any thing. For God was almost angry wyth Moses, for that he refused to go vnto Pharao: and so was he with Jonas the Prophet, because he detracted to go vnto Niniue. Betweene these two daungers the meane ought to be ob- serued. Paul whatsoeuer he saw that he thought would aduance the glozy of God, the same did he straight way exceedingly desire: which is also the nature of other holy men. In the meane tyme God suffereth them to be deceaved: howe best he forsaiketh them not. For straight way he boweth theyr willes, whe- ther it pleaseth hym, that is, to those thinges, which do in very deede illustrate his hys name. And godly men must beware, that they put not lettes agaynst the calling of God. They must bow themselves befoze God like drawing beastes to be gouerned with the byrdell of hys will. Neyther is this to be omitted, that thys desire of the Apostle was besides his determinacion. For he had determi- ned (as it is wrytten in the 15. chapter of this epistle) not to build vpon an other mans foundacion: but there rather to preach Christ, where his name had not befoze bene heard of.

We must not put impediments agaynst the vocation of God. The Apostles desire to go to Rome: was besides hys determination.

For I am debtter both to the Greekes, and to the Barbarous, to the learned and to the vnllearned.] Now he addeth an other cause of his will. The first was to bestow vpon them some spirituall gift, to strengthen them, and to take some fruit of the. But now he sheweth, that necessity vrged him hereunto, least he might haue seemed to haue bene a busy fellow. This necessity is taken of the vocation of God: which vocation was of so great force that he wrote in his first epistle vnto the Corint: Woe vnto me, if I preach not the Gospel. For now was that office committed vnto him. And by this saying he reproveth the Jewes, which cauelled that he did not well, in communicating the preaching of the Gospell vnto the Gentils. But that ought not to be counted as a fault in him, forasmuch as he was compelled thereunto, by the office committed to his charge. And God had geuen him excellent giftes: and among other, to preach vnto all men. He spake all maner of tonges. These thinges ought they to weigh, which haue receaued any giftes at Gods hand. For by them they are made debtters to helpe others. For God will haue them to pay that which he hath decreed to geue. And they are to be meruayled at, which will be counted the successors of Peter and Paule, as the bishoppes of Rome and other bishoppes, how they see not, that they are debtters to preach Christ. For euen from Gregory the great, no man hath in a manner euer seene that a bishoppe of Rome did preach. In Spayne, in Italy, and in France they are altogether dumme. Here in England bishoppes do in deede preach sometime, but yet not so often as they ought. But let vs returne vnto Paule. In that he sayth, that he is debtour, he meaneth not that he will bring any thing of his owne: but will bestow those thinges which God had committed vnto him to participate vnto others. And it is as if he should haue sayd. What maner of men soeuer ye be, whether ye be wise men, princes, mighty men, or men obscure, base or vnllearned, God hath made me debtour vnto you. And although I seeme able, or vntwoorthy so great a vocation, yet that which I will bring vnto you is not vntwoorthy to be receaued of you. By these woordes he reproveth the Jewes, which thought, that the preaching of the Gospell was due to their nacion only. But Paule sheweth here that same is due also vnto other nations.

Why God geueth gifts vnto men.

Domme bishopps.

To the Greekes and Barbarous.] All they which were not Jewes were called by thys common word ethnikoi, that is Gentles. But now they are deuided into Greekes and Barbarous. By the Greekes he vnderstandeth men that were more ciuile, which were gouerned with good and ciuile lawes, and therefore it was an easy matter to be conuersant with them. But the Barbarous are the wilder sort, which were saluage and fierce, so that a man could not so easily deale with them. Neyther were they excluded from the number of the Greekes, which were not inhabitants of Grecia: so that they vsed their lawes and institutions. For there were many straunge nations whiche vsed the lawes of the Greekes. For the Romanes as we reade in Titus Lilius, sent ten men into Grecia, to bring vnto them the lawes of the Athenians: out of which afterward they wrote ten tables. Paule therefore seemeth in this place to make three kindes of men, so that after the Jewes he putteth the Greekes, and last of all the Barbarous, wherefoze the Greekes were in the middell betwene the Jewes and the Barbarous. But in other places, when he deuideth men into Jewes and Greekes, by the Greekes he vnderstandeth all kinde of men, besides the Hebrewes: so that vnder that word he comprehendeth the barbarous also. And if the Gospell extend so amply, that none are excluded from it, then it manifestly appeareth, that it farre excelleth philosophy: for all men are not made for it. It excelleth also the law of Moses, which was obserued of one nacion onely. But the Gospell was published euery where. Hereby Chrysostome gathereth, that for the admitting of the Gospel, there is no neede neyther of syllogismes of philosophers, nor preparacion of humane sciences. And vndoubtedly we see, that olde women, rude men, and old men, are as apt thereunto, as noble men, rich men and Philosophers. And in sum, there is none so noble or excellent, and agayne none so abiect and vnlearned, but that by the Gospell he may attayne to saluation. And Chrysostome also in this place to confirme the dignity of the Gospell, bringeth Plato for an example: who being a notable and most excellent philosopher, came thise into Sicilia, to cure thinges that were then troubled, and to perswade the tyranne, to vse equal and iust lawes. Which his perswasions had no successe at all. For Dionisius became euery day worse and worse, so that at the last he was deprived of his kingdome, neyther was that kingdome any thing the better for Plato, although Plato for that cause put his life in danger and being taken of Pirates was brought into bondage. By whiche example appeareth how weake philosophie is to amend thinges.

So that as much as lyeth in me, I am redy to preach the Gospell to you of Rome also. When he sayth, as much as is in me, he signifieth vndoubtedly, that there was some thing, which letteth him from comming to Rome. And that is the calling of God, which called him away to an other place. Neyther entendeth he by this kinde of speech to exclude ether grace, or free giftes, or powers geuen him by the holy ghost: as though he would preach the Gospell vnto the Romanes according to that onely which was in himself: euen as some say, that if men befoze grace or regeneration do that which lieth in them, God will neuer forsake them. But Paule speaketh not so: but sayth: In that I differ my comming vnto you, it cometh not of myne owne purpose, but of God, which hath otherwise decreed. For if I were left to myne owne iudgement, I had bene with you long ere this, neyther should any dangers haue stayed me. He is happy vndoubtedly, whiche with so chearefull and prompt mynde is redy to follow the calling of God: as Paule here affirmeth that he is. The thyng which he had in hand made hym prompt: namely, the Gospell: farther the noblenes of the city, through which, if they were once conuerted vnto Christ, he saw that it would easely come to passe, that other partes of the world would be the better wonne. Among those thinges which commonly discourage men from taking any enterpryse in hand, is the ignorance of the euent, also daungers which oppose themselves, paynes that are to be taken therein, and because we haue not power and ability inough to execute that which is taken in hand. But Paule, agaynst the ignorance of the euent, obiected the certenty of the promise, whereby he knew that the heathen should be conuerted vnto Christ: agaynst the dangers, which honged ouer him, he obiected the great aboundance of the gayne: for that he should winne vnto Christ infinite numbers of men. And of what force this is to shake of sluggishenes and slouthfulness, marchantes do declare, who setting gayne befoze their eyes, passe nothing for the dangers of tempestes, difficulties of iornyes, and inuasions of theenes. Lone and charity wherewith hys hart was kindled and inflamed, mitigated the paynes that he should take. And as for hys ability and strength he was nothing carefull: for that he did put no confidence in those thinges: but depended wholly of Christ, who sufficiently adozned him with free and gracious giftes of the holy ghost, as time and place should require. We may adde the fift cause wherby men are accustomed to be called away, ether from the profession of Christ, or from preaching: and that is shame: because our flesh indgeth the Gospell a thing to be ashamed of. And this impediment the Apostle putteth away, when he sayth:

For

For I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ: because it is the power of God to saluation vnto all that beleue, namely to the Jewe first and also to the Greke. For the righteousness of God is reuealed in it from fayth to fayth, as it is written: The iust shall liue by fayth.

For I am not ashamed of the Gospel.] And hereof he giveth a reason, namely: Because it is the power of God to saluation to euery one that beleueth. In that he writeth, that he is not ashamed of the Gospel, although he spake that vnder his owne person, yet meaneth he thereby to admonish the Romanes, vnto whome he writeth, that they also (though they were highly exalted) ought not to be ashamed of the Gospel. And he bleth the figure Liptore. For he speaketh not so much as he meaneth. Not to be ashamed, is in this place as much as if he had sayd, I very much glory. And this spake he playnly and without any figure to the Galathians, saying: God forbid that I should glory in any thing, but in the crosse of our Lord Iesus Christ. But there are many at this day, which boast that they are Christians & haue receaued the Gospel, which thing I would to God they did truly and frō the hart. For there are to many of them, which if they were well examined as touching manners, are most farre from Christ, and as touching rules of religion, if a man beginne to examine them but euen in the Catechisme, he shall fynde that they neuer vnderstoode any thyng of Christ. That commonly is counted a thing to be ashamed of, which is had in contempt of the world: and that is counted honorable, which the world hath in estimation, but in triall of the Gospel, our flesh is exceedingly deceaued. For it thinketh it a thing to be ashamed of as touching vnderstanding, as touching good thinges of the mynde, as touching good thinges of fortune, and also as touching the good thinges of the body. For as touching the mynde and vnderstanding it counteth it a thing folishe, to perswade it selfe of those thinges, whereof it can not render a reason. As touching the good thinges of the mynde, because we can not be iustified by our owne vertues, and excellent doedes. And it thinketh it a very folishe thyng to cast away the goodes of the body, and so to crucifye our flesh withall the lusses thereof: and concerning the goodes of fortune, to take vp our crosse, and by contumelies and reproches to followe Christ. All these seeme vnto the flesh thinges to be ashamed of: agaynst which we must continually set this which Paul here sayth: We are not ashamed of the Gospel. This doctrine hath with out doubt many enemyes. And first are the Epicures, or rather Epicor, that is men without God, who thinke that thys Gospel is vterly a trifle and a sayned thing: and do much meruaile at vs, and deride vs for that we are so carefull and diligent touching it. There are other ciuile men which are gouerners ouer the publike wealth. And these men thinke this doctrine to be vterly sedicious: and they count it a thyng vniueerte, that preachers, vnder the pretence of publishing of repentance and preaching, should be permitted to reprove the vices of magistrates and princes, and after a sort to accuse them vnto the people. And thys say they is nothyng els then to rent in sonder publike welthes. There are also hypocrites, monkes, and other religious persons which cry out that by our Gospel the lawes of God are ouerthrowen, holy ceremonies are contemned, good woorkes despised, holy Images taken away, and (as they say) all deuotions vterly abolished. With these selfe same aduersaries was Paul troubled, for the scribes, pharisees and high priestes, cried out that by thys Gospel whiche the Apostles preached, the lawe of God was abrogated: ceremonies, which the Patriarches and Prophetes had kept, were set at nought: the tribe of Levi spoyled of hys honour: the dignite of the priesthode made equall wth the prophane estate: and the publike welth of the Jewes vterly extinguished. Agaynst whiche sharpe saying thys remedy was to be vsed, namely these wordes: I am not ashamed of the Gospel, whatsoener ye say, or imagine agaynst it. It happened also in the tyme of Augustine and Christome (when that whole cities had not as yet receaued Christ, but that there were in one and the selfe same city both Christians and also idolatrs) that if at any time a noble or welchman had taken vpon him the name of a Christian, his affinity, kinsefolkes and frendes would come vnto hym and say: doost thou beleue in one that was crucified? Art thou not ashamed to committe thy saluation to hym which was afflicted with extreme punishment: neyther was he able to saue himselfe? What madnes is this of thee: doost thou beleue in one that was nayled vnto a crosse? Vnto whom he should haue answered (as they say) I beleue in hym that was crucified: and not in a whozemonger, in an adulter-er, an vnchast person, a parricide, or slayer of his owne children, such as is your Iupiter, Saturne, and other Gods whome ye worshippinge. Wherefore I am not ashamed neyther of Christ, nor yet of the Gospell. So also must we aunwere the heretikes, when they say, that it is a thyng folishe and to be ashamed of, to beleue that the sonne of God suffred in very deede, or that he tooke vpon him very humane flesh of the wombe of the virgine: forasmuch as these things are found in the Gospell, we do wholly beleue them: neyther are we ashamed of the Gospell of Christ. At this day also, the auncient men do bybrayde godly younge menne, whyche are studious of the Gospell, yea euen they: own senses and humane reason cryeth agaynst them saying: are ye not ashamed of this new doctrine? Are ye so blinde, that ye see not that by this meanes good workes are condemned, the worshipping of God perissheth, the ministry of the church is troden vnder foote, the dignity of priesthode is abieted, ecclesiasticall riches are utterly spoyled: what patrones or supporters of learned men, shall ye haue hereafter? Did your elders, which went before you both in this vniuersity and in others, being both doctours & notable men, follow these steps?

Vnto these men also ought we to aunswere: we are not ashamed of the Gospell, howsoever you speake ill of it. If so be they wil say: we haue the Gospell: yours is a new doctrine. Let vs aunswere them agayne: In such sort is that the Gospell which ye haue, as that is the Gospell, to set forth fayned worshippinges of god casting away and dispising the sincere worshipping, described vnto vs of God: as it is to worshippinge stockes and images: as is to obtrude bowes, whereby such men are byawen away from matrimony, which aboue others haue most neede therof: as is to go on pilgrimages vnto Images, to worshippinge the bones of Sayntes, to inuocate the dead: and an infinite number of such other like Wherefore ye ought to be ashamed of your doctrine, and not we of the Gospell of Christ. Let it be diligently examined, what we by the same gospel iudge of the honour of god. We attribute all thinges vnto hym only: we will in all thinges depend of hym only. Farther see what our iudgement is concerning the worshipping of hym. We desire to retayne the same pure and holy, as it is deliue-red vs in the holy scriptures. What do we thinke of good workes: we byge them continually, and requyre to haue them done of vs so perfectly, that we thinke alwayes that something remaineth not perfectly done of vs, vnto whiche we should leuel, and whereunto we ought to direct all our endeours. What iudge we as concerning the holy ministry: we trauayle to haue it to be in great estimation, as by which God worketh our saluacion. What of Sacraments: That they should be kept pure and vndefyled, and be reduced vnto that vse, where-vnto Christ instituted them. What iudge we of magistrates: that they should be obeyed, and that we should be subiecte vnto them in all thinges: so that they commaund nothing agaynst the word of God. What of poore and miserable men: that we should helpe, and relieue them. What of publike peace and tranquillity: That it be kept, yea euen with the los of our goods. What of sciences, and good learning: That they should be mayntained and aduanced. Why do ye object auncientnes vnto vs? There is nothing that we more desire then to haue thynges brought to their olde estate. We haue brought in new thinges:
we

We require againe the estate of the primitive Church, and desire to haue againe the institutions of the Apostles. Wherefore there is no cause why we should be ashamed of the gospel: of which such as complain, do rather lament the losse of theyr commodities, then that they can accuse our doctrine. And if anye troubles or discommodities happen, they are not to be ascribed vnto the doctrine, but vnto those which vnder the pretence of Christ and of the gospel doo seeke those thinges which are their owne, and not the thinges which are Iesus Christes. But now let vs see Pauls reason, why he is not ashamed of the gospel of Christ.

Troubles and discommodities are not to be ascribed vnto the Gospel.

Because it is the power of God to saluacion to euery one that beleueth. It is the power, that is, the organe and instrument, whereby God sheweth forth his power to saluacion. For together with the word of God and the gospel, are instilled grace and the holy ghost, and especially remission of sinnes: by which we are renewed and made safe. And yet this knittinge together of mans saluacion, with the gospel is not naturall, that is of necessity, so that the gospel beinge geuen and set forth, saluacion should straight way follow of necessity. For it is needefull that God doo also inwardly moue the hearts of the hearers: as in the Actes of the Apostles we reade it was doone vnto the woman that sold silke. Wherefore the gospel is to be counted an instrument arbitrary, which God vseth according to his will. Many thinke, that this definition is taken of the cause efficient. For in it is expressed the power of God, which maketh vs safe. Then is added the synall cause, namely that this power of God is to saluacion: neyther is that left vnspoken of, whereby we are made able to take hold of so greate a benefyte: and the same is sayth. For it is added to euery beleuer. For they which come to heare the Gospel, and wante sayth, receaue nothing but wordes: and the Gospel to them is no Gospel. Euen as in the Sacraments, they which are without sayth do in deede receaue the signes of the sacraments, but they haue not the fruite and thing of the sacraments. Here is now touched the chief poynt of all the controuersy. For in that it is sayd, that saluacion cometh of the Gospel vnto euery one that beleueth, is sufficientely declared that we are iustified by sayth: and not by works nor by our owne strength nor by philosophy, nor by ceremonies of the law. Neither did he without cause make mencion of the power of God. For that befoze we can be saued, our enemies ought to be vanquished: that is, the deuill, death, hell and in especiall sinne. Hereby playnly appeareth also the difference betweene the righteousness of the lawe and the righteousness of the gospel. The righteousness of the lawe is, to do and to worke. He that shall do these thinges, shall liue in them, sayd Moses, as it is alleaged to the Galathians: and shall in this Epistle be afterward intreated of in his place. But contrarywise the ryghteousnes and saluation of the Gospel is by sayth vnto all they that beleue. For it is sayth which taketh hold of the mercye and promes of God: although there haue bene some, which durst affirme, that this kind of speech, to take hold by sayth, is straung, that is, not vled in the holy scriptures. But they are exceedingly deceaued: It is in deede not vled among the sophisters, but it is read in the scriptures. For to the Galathians it is wyrtten, That we myghte receaue the promyse of the spirit through sayth. And he vseth the verbe λαμβάνω, which signifyeth nothyng els then to apprehend, take hold, and to receaue. Also in the Actes of the Apostles Paul speeketh vnto Agrippa the kynge, that he was sente for this cause, that menne shoulde receaue remission of sinnes, and lotte amonge the sayntes throughe sayth. Where he also vseth the same verbe. And vnto the Romanes the 2. chap.

This distinction hath the cause efficient, end, and instrument of receauing the Gospel. A similitude of the Sacraments.

The sum of the whole controuersy concerning iustificatio. Why in iustificatio mencion is made chiefly of the power of god.

The difference betwene the righteousness of the law and of the Gospel.

This phrase of speech, to take holde by sayth is not strange nor rare in the holie scriptures.

The Gentyles whyche followed not righteounesse tooke holde of righteounesse: euen that righteounesse which is of sayth. The greeke word in this place is xarizais. Wherefore it followeth, that we speake after the maner of the Scriptures. Neyther is this to be left vnspoken of, that there are some which thinke that this definition of the Gospel is take of the matter: as though it should be thus

A Commentarie vpon the

expounded, that the Gospell is the power of God to saluacion, for that in it is set forth and intreated of the power of God, whereby he saneth mankind. And that power is Christ the sonne of God, which was made of the seed of David, according to the flesh, enen as it is before sayd. So the first definitiō and this latter differ nothing as touching the kynd of the cause. And in deede I dyslike not this interpretacion, for Paul in the first to the Corinthe. calleth Christ the power of God, and the wysedome of God: howbeit I do more willingly allow the first interpretacion. Paraduventure some will say, for as much as the Gospell is preached vnto many vnto iudgement and condemnation, and we are (as Paul sayde) vnto manye the sauor of death vnto death, howe then is it called saluacion, or power vnto saluacion? And to the Corint. it is written, We preache Christ crucified, vnto the Iewes, in deede an offence: and to the Greekes foolishnes. Hereto we aunswere, that the Gospell is hurtfull vnto them, which trust in theyr owne strengthes, theyr proper workes, and theyr owne reason. But in the same place to the Cor. Paul wryteth: Vnto the called of God is Christe preached, the power of God, and the wysedome of God. Whiche place serueth verie muche vnto the interpretation of this sentence. For things ought to haue their name geuen them of that thyng, whyche they haue obteyned of theyr owne disposition and nature, and not of that, which is otherwyle annexed vnto them by happe, and (as they speake) per accidens, that is by chaunce. The Gospell hath of hys owne institution, and by the counsell of God, the propriety to saue. But in that it hurteth, the same happeneth from without, that is of the infidelity of the receauers: otherwyle Christ hymself could not be called a Sauour: because he was put for the fall and offence of many. Wherefore when he spake of the Scribes & Phariseis, he sayde: If I had not come and spoken vnto them, they shoulde haue had no sinne. But for that he was not to this ende sent, but these euils happened of an other cause, therfore he is called a Sauour. Notwithstanding many by occasion of hys comming perished. For as touchyng hymselfe, he had the wordes of eternall lyfe. And he hymself sayth: The wordes which I speake vnto you, are spiryte and lyfe. But manye of them whyche stande here beleue not. Wherefore those thynges disagree not, but aptly agree which these whiche Paul nowe wryteth. Further we must diligently examine, what maner of saluacion this is, whiche is brought vnto vs by the Gospell. For politicall or ciuill men do also promise health or sauety by good lawes, and seuerity of discipline. But that is singular, and very contract: for it is only that safety, whereby we are made safe from the iniuries of men. Physicians also promise health: but that pertaineth only to the body, that it may be in good case. Souldiers boast also, that they are appointed to the safety of men: but that safety belongeth only agaynst the inuasions of enemyes. Pea and handycraftes men say that theyr workmanship are healthfull vnto men: but these men also byng only porcions of safety. They whiche build houses, do defend vs from the iniuries of the aire and whether: they whiche make clothes and garments, do after a sort defend our bodys from colde: but this sauety which is of the gospell comprehendeth all: and contayneth in it the vniuersal summe and head of our conuersation, that is, felicity it selfe and blessednes. This is that saluacion, whiche was shadowed in the old Testament, as often as the publike wealth of the Israelites was defended from oppreßers by Iephthe, Samson, Gedeon, and Debora. And that this saluacion, which is now intreated of oughte to be taken generally, is proued by a sure reason: for that all these defectes, vnto which the porcions of sauety which we haue now reherſed, were a helpe, happened vnto vs by reason of synne. But by Christ and hys gospell, we are deliuered from synne: which thyng the Angell testifyeth, when he sayd vnto Ioseph. For he shall saue hys people from theyr synnes: and this is to restore vs to true felicity. For felicity (as it is commonly sayd) is to lyue agreeably vnto nature. And oure nature is instituted of God, that we shoulde be according to hys Image. And this particle, to saluacion, is necessarily added, because other,

For the power of God is also to take vengeance, to reuenge and to condemne. But the Gospell is not properly instituted to that ende, but to saluacion. Now if we were once fully perswaded of this, that in Christ and in the gospell we should haue perfect saluacion, we would not so much fixe our mynde on temporall thynges, but would alwayes contende thither, where we hope we should haue felicity and blessednes. Euen as princes and noble men do seldome go abroad into the market place, & create or lanes, neyther do they much passe for the spectacles of the common sort of men: for that they haue at home they delightes, pleasures, paradises and passing good thynges: therefore they willingly tary at home, and if they be abroad, they quickly get them home. So ought we also to vse the good thynges of this world only for the necessities of the body: but we ought continually to be conuersant in Christ, and in his gospell, as in our saluacion and felicity.

To the Iewe first and to the Greeke.] Here is declared that the Gospell is set forth vnto all in generall: neyther doth the preaching thereof exempt any kinde of men. The Grecians he taketh here generally, and vnder that worde comprehendeth all nacions besides the Iewes. And in that he sayth, First, he signifieth order, but not greater aboundance of fruite: as though the Iewes should haue more commoditie or vtilitie by the Gospell then the Ethnikes. Of which thyng Chrysostome hath a trimme similitude, when they of full age which were converted vnto Christ were baptised at the tyme of Easter or Whitson tyde, they could not be baptised all together: yet they which were first washed did not more put on Christ, neyther receiued they more grace then they which were last. Wherefore there is here signified an Analogy or proportion of order: the Iewes, are put in the first place. For Christ was the Apostle of the Iewes, and minister of Circumcision. For he sayd that he was not sent, but vnto the lost sheepe of the house of Israel. And when he first sent his Apostles, he commaunded them y they should not go vnto the Gentils, nor enter into the cities of the Samaritans. But in his last ambassage, when he was ready to ascend vp into heauen, he commaunded that they should be witnesses vnto hym in Jerusalem, in all Iewry and Samarya, and then he added euen vnto the uttermost borders of the earth. Pea and Paul also obserued this order. For first when he entered into any cities, he preached in the Synagoges. And together with Sylas and Barnabas he sayde vnto the Iewes, vnto you oughte Christ first to be preached, whome because ye haue refused, beholde we turne vnto the Gentils. The Iewes oughte to haue bene the firste whiche shoulde be called, because they had the prophesies, and Prophetes, and tables in a manner sealed with the promise of Christ. Wherefore sayth was first required of them. He proueth this definition now set, not indeede by thyngs before or by the cause (for that is impossible) but by the effect, and (as they say) by the latter, when he sayth:

For the righteousness of God is reuealed in it from fayth to fayth.] That is, the effect of the Gospell and of fayth is, that we should be iustified. Now the Apostle endeth his Exordium, and commeth to the entreatyng of his disputacion, and this is the principall proposition, which in sum containeth that which he goeth about to proue through eleuen chapters, that is, that a man is iustified by fayth. Wherefore this proposition serueth for two thynges, for first it is brought in as a reason of the definition set: And agayne, as the principall proposition of the whole disputacion. And so the Apostle by a soft, pleasant and couert transicion leadeth the attentyue hearer from the exordium, vnto the confirmacions and confutations which follow.

When we heare the righteousness of God named in this place, let vs not thinke that he entendeth here to speake of the severity of Gods iudgements, for that severity is not called of the Hebrewes Nedech, but rather Tischpat, that is, iudgement: and Tsedreth, which our men turne, righteousness, signifieth goodnes, clemency and mercy, whereby God declareth hymselfe good vnto vs.

The Gospell is set forth to all men indifferently. Now the Iewes are preferred before the Gentils.

An analogy of order as touchyng tyme betwene the Iewes and the Grekes. The calling of the Iewes was first. Paul preached first vnto the Iewes before he preached vnto the Gentils. The definition giuen is proued by the effect.

The effect of the Gospell is that we shoulde be iustified. The end of the Exordium and of the entent of his treatise. The proposition which shalbe proued euen to the 12. chap. A soft transicion.

And because he doth this chiefly in geuing vs righteousness: therefore I thinke that that word was so commonly turned, and that word in this place (if a man marke it wel) aunswereth vnto saluation, which he sayd befoze commeth vnto vs by the gospel. And the Prophetes many tymes craue the righteousness of god: which can not easely be taken euery where of the severity of hys iudgement. For there is none that is wyle, woulde haue god to deale wth hym according to that. We rather the sayntes crye. Enter not into iudgement with thy seruant. And god declareth thys his righteousness or goodnes towards vs, by three thinges chiefly. First he receaueth vs into sauour, for geueth vs our sins imputeth not vnto death those sins which we commit: but contrarily imputeth rather vnto vs the obedience and holynes of Christ. Secondly he kindleth in our myndes an endeuor to lyue by right, reneweth our will, illustrateth our reason, and maketh vs all whole pson to lyue vertuouly, when as befoze we abhorred from that which is iust and honest. Thirdly he geueth vs pure and chaste maners, good actions, and a sincere lyfe. All these thinges doth that righteousness comprehend, which is reueled in the Gospel. But the first of these three is the head and chiefe, because it comprehendeth the other, and it is sayd to be the righteousness of God, because it commeth from him to vs. For we attayne not vnto it by humane strengthes. Wherefoze Chrysostome here calleth it righteousness ex deo, that is from aboute, because it is geuen vnto vs (as he speaketh) without our sweate and labours. Howbeit he addeth one thyng which must be warily red: namely that we ought to bring ex nobis. that is, from home, and from our selues, sayth, whereby to receaue thys righteousness. In which sentence, if he vnderstande, that sayth hath hys offspring of our owne strengthes and nature, we ought not to geue eare vnto hym, forasmuch as the holy scriptures aperly testifie, that it is the gift of God, and commeth not of vs, which thinge is expessedly read in the epistle to the Ephesians. But I thinke not that this father was so farre out of the way: wherefoze I interprete hym after this maner: when he saw that this imputacion of god is after a sort set without vs, hys mynde was to declare, that if we will apply the same vnto vs, it becometh that we haue sayth in vs, whereby we may drawe it vnto vs. But he contenteth not by that sayinge, that sayth springeth of our selues as of the first roote.

Is reuealed in it.] Some haue vnderstanded, that these giftes of the goodnes of god which we haue rehearsed are reuealed in the gospel, because they are reade and contayned in it: which thyng I deny not: but I thinke that there ought to be added after the Hebrew maner, that (in it) is all one with Paul, as if he had sayd (by it). So that the sense is, in that the participation of thys righteousness and goodnes of god is exhibited or geuen vnto vs, the same commeth by the gospel, so that we receaue it with sayth. Wherefoze in this word Reuealed: let vs marke two maner of comparisions: one is as touching the godly, which receaue these thinges of god, that they myght by that meanes acknowledge, feele, and by sure experience vnderstand those thynges as touching all the three partes of righteousness, of which befoze we spake distynally. For they are not so moued of God, as though they felt not, nor knew by experience, such thinges as are done. But they which are only lookers on, and not doers of the matter, neyther see the fyrst part of righteousness, nor yet the second: for that they are but naturall men, and the god of this world, hath blynded their myndes, that they shoulde not be able to attayne to these spirituall thynges. But the third portion of righteousness, which bursteth forth into act, and is set in outwarde woorkes, will them or will them, is seene of them and they are euen agaynste they: will compelled to beare witnessse vnto it: as we reade that Pliny the yonger wrote vnto Traiane of the innocent life of the Christians. For holy men shewed exampls inough, whereby the vngodly, if they had bene wyle, mought haue considered that they were altogether renewed in mynd, and that this kinde of menne is moze acceptable vnto god, then other men are. But in these thynges humane wisedome is wonderfully blynded, which can geue geue no iudgement of spirituall thinges: and yet these partes of righteousness are of their owne nature so ioynd together, that the one depēdeth of the other. In this sense Paul writeth afterward of the righteousness of God: If our unrighteousnesse commendeth the ryghteousnesse of God: where we manifestly see that the righteousness of God signifyeth his goodnes and clemency. But now let vs consider this addition:

From fayth to fayth.] There be so many expositiones vpon these wordes, that if I should rehearse them all, time would not serue me. I will touch only a few of them, and will iudge whyche of them seemeth to me more probable, and nper vnto the truth. Some vnderstand, from the fayth of the elders to the fayth of their posterity. Others, fro a weaker fayth, to a stronger fayth: Others, from the fayth of one article to the fayth of an other. And to make an end of rehearsing opinions, I will come to that which in my iudgement is best to be allowed. It appeareth that Paul taketh fayth two manner of wayes. One waye for that assent which we geue vnto God, when he promisseth vs any thing: an other waye for the constancy of wordes and promises. And after that manner the fayth of God is commended, as we reade afterward in the 3. chapter: What if some of them haue not beleued? Shall their incredulitye make frustrate the fayth of God? By which wordes he signifyeth, that God faythfully performed that which he had promised. According to this distinction we may say, that this reuelation or exhibition of the righteousness of God towarde vs, is brought to passe by fayth, namely, our fayth, whereby we geue credite vnto God making promise to vs: and that our fayth is both strengthened, and also confirmed by the fayth of god: namely, because we see that he hath constantly performed the things which he had promised. And this interpretation Ambrose toucheth in this commentaries: and in my iudgement it seemeth very agreeable. It followeth:

As it is written: The iust shall lyue by fayth.] Paul laboureth to proue that we are iustified by fayth: and Chrysostome when he interpreteth this place, telleth vs, that by it only we obtayne remission of sinnes. For he sayth, we may not hope for it any other where. If thou aske, why scripture is in this place cited of the Apostle, the same Chrysostome answereth: for that vnto humane reason it seemeth a thing unlikely to be true, that he which was euen now an adulterer, a murderer, and a committer of sacrilege, should straight way be counted iust, so that he beleue and receaue the Gospel of Christ. These seeme to be thinges passing comon capacity, neither can they easily be beleued. For we reade in the Tripartite historie the first booke 6. chapter, that Constantine the great, which was the first emperor that publicly receaued the Gospel, slew many that were of his affinity and kinred, and was the author and procurer, that his owne sonne which was called Chrysipus, was murdered. Of which wicked actes when he began to repent to hym, he asked aduise of Sopater, the philosopher, who in teching succeeded Plotinus, whether there might be any expiation or satisfaction made for these greates paynous crimes: vnto whom the philosopher answered, that there could be none. Afterward he asked counsell of Christian Bishops: and they answered, that all those sinnes might be expiated, so that he would beleue in Christ, and with a sincere fayth receaue his Gospel. Hereby it came to passe, that that Emperor embraced our religion. The author of this history receaue this narration as a thinge fabled: and by diuerse argumentes proueth that it was invented of malicious men, which fauoured not Christian religion. But what soener it were, this thinge onely haue I a respect vnto, that they tooke this occasion to sayne this lye, for that both Philosophers, and also ciuile men iudged it absurde, that a man being vnpure and laden with sinnes, should straight way be counted pure & iust before God, so soone as he receaueth the fayth of Christ. Paul therfore, lest he should seeme to be the author of this wonderfull doctrine, from which humane reason so much abhorreth, citeth a place out of the holy Scriptures, and by it plainly plainly proueth, that it is euē so. The testimony which he bringeth is taken out of Abacuk the prophet the 2. chapter: althoughe Chrisostomes interpretation, as it is in the Greke, citeth the name of Sophonias. But that is not to be merueyled at: because peradventure his memozy failed him. For the fathers as they were men, might sometymes erre. For Ambrose also, when he entreated of this place a little before put (To the Iew first and to the Grecke) sayth that the Iewes were so first named of Iudas Machabens, which did set at liberty his nation, when they were by the Grecians brought into bondage. Which saying how true it is, the second booke of kinges testifieth in the 25. chapter: and also Jeremy in his 40. chapter: and Hesler in the 3. chapter: and *Esdra*s, Nehemias, Daniell, Zachary and other such like places, wherein the surnames of the Iewes is most manifestly rede, long tyme before Iudas Machabens was ruler ouer them. Neyther do I therefore speake this, that I would malepartly contemne the authority of the fathers. But that we should vnderstand, that soasmuch as they do often fall, we should not attribute so much credite vnto their writings, but that we may examine them by the rule of the scriptures. But as touching this place of Abacuk, we must vnderstand, that this prophet in the first chapter of his booke, with ouer much boldnes prouoked God to reason of thinges which are done in this world: so that in a maner he reproveth him, as though he had little prouidence ouer them. For he complayneth, that iust men are miserably oppressed of the vngodly, and that wicked men haue wonderfull and happy successes in all thinges. But after many complayntes at the length in the 2. chapter: he cometh to hymselfe and sayth: I will stand vpon my watch: that is, I will pronounce nothing rashely concerning this matter: But will wayte to see what God speaketh in me. Thus do the Saintes, sometymes to put forth in theyr writings humane tentacions and affections, and diligently to expresse those thynges wherewith we are sometymes tossed. For they were menne, and were oftentimes subiect vnto these troublesome cogitations. At the length the Lord answereth hym: and in some thus he sayth: That men ought not straightway to geue sentence of hys iudgements, but to waite farther. By which wordes, humane rashnes is reproveth, whyche will straight way geue sentence as sone as it seeth, that God hath done any thyng: when yet notwithstanding we are admonished, not to iudge of Comedies, vntyl we haue sene the last Acte. If we could waite longer, we should see that the iudgements of God haue good successe, & that all those thyngs which he doth, are most wysely ordered. In the meane tyme whylest the ende is in comming, we must patiently wayte. And it becometh that in waiting we vphold our selues by faith: by which faith the iust shall lyue: and the vngodly soasmuch as he is destitute of it, wanteth all righteousnes and vprightnes. The wordes of the Prophet as they are in the Hebrewe, are these: Lohinah ceg peluh iesohah nibbaschoh boh vetfaddim beemunatho ijmiah. The latine translation hath it thus, He that beleueth not, hys soule shall not be vprighte in hymselfe. The seuenthy thus turne it: If he wythdrawe hymselfe, my soule shall not delyghe in hym. But as touching the propriety of the Hebrewe: This word Apelah is deriued of Aophel, which signifyeth defense. Wherof is afterward deriued a verbe which signifyeth to defend himself. Hereof is gathered a double exposition. The first is, that by defense we vnderstand those which defend theyr mynde, and harden theyr hart not to beleue. These haue neyther vprightnes nor righteousnes. And agayne, it signifyeth those, which beyng puffed vp with pryde thinke themselves to haue abundante strength and power: and, as though they needed not the helpe and ayde of God, beleue not. Wherfore theyr soule also wanteth vprightnes, & righteousnes. This exposition of the proud and hygh mynde is gathered out of Rabbi David Chimhi. And this desce, in either of these two interpretations is taken metaphozically. But if we take that worde properly, Rabbi Moses teacheth, that they which are not of an vpright mynde and doo want faith, flye vnto defenses: and there they defend them selues, and thinke that that they are very safe. But he which is iust, and endued with a sincere sayth, and of a modeste and lowly mynde, the same man shall lyue by sayth, neither will he depend either vpon armoz, or vpon mans power, or vpon fenced castles. And it had ben sufficient for the Prophet, to haue rehearsed this first part of the oracle. For when he had affirmed, that a man wantyng sayth hath not righte-ousnes and vprightnes: it foloweth of contraries, that a saythfull man by sayth obteyneth both righteousnes and lyfe. But bycause we should not labour or stagger in gatheryng of it, the Prophet hym selfe concludeth: But the iust man shall lyue by sayth. Neither is this to be left vnspoken of, that Paul in this place, hath omitted the pronounne possessiue. For in the Hebrue it is written, He shall lyue by his sayth. And the Seuenthy haue, By my sayth. And Symmachus manifest-ly agreeth with the Hebrue veritie: for he writeth ἐκ τῆς ἰσχύος αὐτοῦ. that is, by his owne sayth. But the variety of these translations commeth of a certayne simi- litude, which these two letters Vau and Iod haue one with the other. For they differ but in length and shorynes. Some reade Emunatho, and other some Emu- nathi. But eyther reading agreeth with the truth. For sayth may as well be called our sayth, as the sayth of God. It hath indeede his offspring of God, but it sticketh in our myndes, otherwise we could not vse it to receaue the Gospell. I thought it good the larglier thus to entreate of the testimony of thys Pro- phete, for that the Apostle vseth it oftentimes: namely, to the Hebrues the 10. chapter: and to the Galathians, and also in this place. Wherefore it is very ne- cessary and profitable, to vnderstand these wordes a right. But in this place we haue to aunswere vnto a caussation, wherewith the vngodly vse to accuse the Apostle, as though he peruersly abused the testimonies of the olde scripture. And they accuse him especially in thys place, for that Paul dareth draue this Prophet, which promisseth the returne from the captivity of Babylon, to thys purpose: as though his sentence should pertayne vnto iustification, and absolu- tion from sinnes. Vnto them we aunswere, that in all the promises of the olde lawe were namely for the most part exprested tempozall good thinges: which yet were the wzappers, and foundacions, and heade of this promise chiefly, whereof we now intreat: of the deliuey (I say) through Christ. To the vnzap- ping of which promise out of these olde promises, this reason is of no small force, to search out, how God would graunt vnto the fathers those tempozall good thinges, which at that tyme he promised: whether being wel pleased and mercifull, or being yet angry and displeased with them. Andoubtedly we can not say, that he would geue these thinges being angry and displeased. For they would not in such maner haue accepted them. For those thinges which are ge- uen to that purpose, do at the length dzyue to damnation and destruction. But if he promised, that he would geue these thinges, because he was pacified and reconciled towarde them, then let vs search out, by what thynges he was pa- cified towarde them. Which thyng without doubt could not be brought to passe, but by Iesus Christ only, who is the only mediator of mankind, where- fore whatsoener thing was promised, though it were neuer so much abiect and of no reputation, yet was it taken to be geuen for Chyristes sake. And therefore in all the promises of the olde Testament, the myndes of the godly ranne vnto this foundation and ground. Then let vs consider the finall cause. Wherefore would God haue the publike wealth of the Jewes preserved to the ende, but only, that Christ should be boyn therehence? Why provided he that the stock of Dauid should contynue safe even to the ende, but onely, that the sonne of God should of it take humane fleshe? Why brought he agayne his people from cap- tivity, but only, that the Messias should at length be boyn at the tyme promi- sed, in the place appointed and of a stocke assigned? This undoubtedly was the cause of all those promises vpon this cause did all the fathers bend their minds, as many as vnderstood a right. Wherefore Paul wryteth not the testimonies of the prophetes, neyther doth he rashely abuse them. And let this be vnto vs a sure and faythfull rule for the perfect vnderstanding of the promises of the olde testament, whereas he sayth that the iust man shall lyue by fayth, he meaneth, that he shalbe able to moue hymselfe to all good thynges, as to beleue, to hope, to contynue in hope, and to loue of charity: vnto which thynges by the power and strength of our owne nature we canne by no meanes attayne. And that by faith we obtayne eternall life, it very well agreeth with those thynges, which Christ spake. This is the life eternall, that they should acknowledge thes to be the only true God, and him whome thou hast sent Iesus Christ. These thynges shall we playnly and openly knowe in heauen our countrey, and that with a cleare and manifest sight. But now haue we these selfe same thynges with a very obscure knowledge, that is, through fayth. This is not an other lyfe from that. But then shall that be made perfecte, which we haue now but only begon. And the righteousness which by this fayth maketh it selfe open consisteth here in especially, that from the tyme we are reconciled vnto God, we leade our life in such sorte that both we render vnto hym his due worshippe, and also vnto our neighbour our bounden due offices or dueties. And whereas the Prophete writeth, that the iust man lyueth by fayth, his wordes must not so be taken, as though he should affirme that we are first iust, and that then afterward we lyue by fayth. But this thyng he teacheth, that by fayth do come vnto vs two commodities, both that we should be iust, and also that we should obtayne life, we see here also set forth vnto vs the difference betwene the righteousness of the law and of the Gospell. The righteousness of the law: is a perfecte obedience of the commandementes of God. But the righteousness of the Gospell is an imputacion thereof. The righteousness of gospell, God geneth vnto vs, but the righteousness of the law we gene vnto God. The righteousness of the law leauieth vnto woorkes. For it is written. The man which doth these thynges shall liue in them: and cursed be he, whiche abideth not in all the thynges whiche are written in the booke of the lawe: also, If thou wilt enter into lyfe keepe the Commandementes. Also, doo thys and thou shalt lyue. But here it is sayd, The iust man shall lyue by fayth. Wherefore looke what difference there is betwene, to do, and to beleue, so much seeme these places to be repugnant one to the other. But these thynges shall easely be made to agree, by making a distinction of righteousness. For so much as the righteousness of the Gospell is one, and the righteousness of the lawe is an other, some testimonies speake of the one righteousness, and some teach of the other.

Sayth is ours and also Gods. The Apo- stle vseth oftentimes this testi- mony of Abaenck. Paule abuseth not this testi- mony.

Vnderstande also by pro- mises, yea of tempozall thinges, to be of Christ.

Christ is the heade & foundati- on of the pro- mises of God in the olde Testa- ment. The finall cause of Gods bene- fites to- wards the people of God, was Chyrist.

Now by that which hath bene spoken, the Apostle setteth forth three good thynges, and those most principall, which by fayth we obtayne, namely, saluation, righteousness, and life. For the Gospell is the power of God, to saluation to euery one that beleueth: agayne, the righteousness of God is revealed by it from fayth: also, the iust man shall liue by fayth. If there be anye, that requyre more then these good thynges, then is he ouer curious. Further euen in the very first entrance into the cause, we see how strongly he affirmeth by these three sentences now reher sed, that by fayth these good thynges happen vnto vs.

Here also maye be noted, in what estimation Paul hath the holy scripture, for vnto it he ascribeth the chiefest authoritie to proue the question take in hand: namely, that the righteousness of god is revealed by fayth. And if both the Apostle and also the Prophet do so manifestly pronounce, that we are iustified by fayth, then is it not meete, that our aduersaries should so crye out agaynst vs, for that we affirme the very selfe same. Wherefore if they be herewithof fended, then let them grudge agaynst the scriptures, agaynst Paul, and agaynst the Prophet, and not agaynst vs. And agaynst them, which crye out, that we spoyle good woorkes of theyr dignity and honour, there is no present remedy, then to lyue by sight and holily, that thereby we may abundantly haue testimonies of good woorkes, and say to our aduersaries: if any confy-

hence were to be put in good woꝝkes, then should we in no case geue place vnto you, forasmuch as in them we farre excell you. And all that whiche we say and teach of iustification, which cometh through fayth, tendeth only to this: that the truth should by the woꝝd of God: be defended. This was Paul's meaning, when he sayde vnto the Philippians: If any man may put confidence in the fleshe, I also may much more: and by many thinges he declareth, how much in this kinde of gloꝝy he excelled others. But he after ward addeth, that all these thinges he counted as dongue and losse, that he might wynn Christ: and that he might be found in him, not hauing his own righteousness, namely, which is of woꝝkes, but that which is by the fayth of Iesus Christ. This excellent example of the Apostle ought we to imitate: that although we attribute not iustification vnto woꝝkes, yet ought we plentifully to abound in them aboue other men. For if we leade an vnpure lyfe, and on the other syde boaste of iustification through fayth, then shall we be laughed to scoꝝne of our aduersaries, as though we for that cause professed this doctrine, to lyue without punishment, lawlesly, and without all order.

For the wrath of God appeareth from heauen agaynst all vngodlines and vnrightheousnes of men, whiche withhold the truth in vnrightheousnes, seing that it, which maye be knowen of God is manifest among them, because God hath shewed it vnto them. For his inuisible thinges, that is to say, his eternall power and godhed, are seene: forasmuch as they are vnderstand by the woꝝkes from the creation of the world.

For the wrath of God is reuealed from heauen.] To the ende he would cōfirme the proposition now proposed, namely, that by the fayth of the Gospell we are iustified, he bringeth many reasons: The firste is when the Gospell is receaued by fayth, there springeth forth righteousness. But take away the Gospell, and fayth, and then the wrath of God wareth hotte, and men are defiled with most vnpure vices and sinnes. Wherefore it is manifest, that the cause of our righteousness is the Gospell, taken hold of by fayth. The minoꝝ or second proposition, that where the Gospell is away, there are both wicked actes, and the wrath of God, he proueth by a diuision, as well towarde the Iewes as towarde the Gentiles. Of the Iewes he will speake in the next chapter now he entreateth of the Gentiles. And that the wrath of God is powꝛed vpon them he proueth by the horrible and filthy vices, which he numbꝛeth: and declareth that those men deserued so to be forsaken of God, and hedlonge to be thrust into those sinnes: because when they knew him, they dishonoured hym, and gaue his honour vnto creatures. And that they knew God, he proueth: for that his creatures entrusted them thereof. And he maketh mencion of so grosse and filthy vices, that they were not able to deny theyꝝ owne perversenes.

For if he had spoken of those enoꝝmious sinnes whiche pertain vnto the mynde, for that in them there is not so much shame, it would not so much haue moued the readers. But after this maner may the reason of the Apostle be resolved. They were thus filthyly contampnated, therefore were they not reformed within, neyther renewed through the spirite and grace. Wherefore they were neyther acceptable vnto god, noꝝ yet reconciled vnto him. And we see that Paul by this reason hath not only confirmed that which he intended, but also by the selfe same, laboꝛeth & instituteth a most holesome exhortation, which he began of repentance. For he setteth befoꝛe their eyes their most haynous wicked actes, and sheweth them that eternall punishments are at hand vnto them, and that they suffer these thinges through the anger of god towarde them. And to the ende he would make them the moꝛe afrayd, he taketh away from them all maner of excuse, affirming that they knew right well, after what soꝛte they should leade theyꝝ life. And the summe of this reason is red in the gospell of John the 3. chapter: He which beleeueth in the sonne, hath eternall life:

The first reason whereby is proued that we are iustified by the fayth of the Gospell. Take away the Gospell and then remaineth the wrath of God, and most vnpure sinnes do range abroad.

but he which beleueth not, shall not see eternall life: and the wrath of God abideth ouer him. There it manifestly appeareth that by fayth which is geuen vs in Christ we do obtayne righteousness and life: and contrariwise, it being taken away, righteousness is also taken away, and the wrath of god remayneth kindled. Take away the gospell and fayth from philosophy and good artes, and what sound thing shalt thou see then in those men, which so challenge them vnto themselves. Undoubtedly all things shalbe contayned, as Paule paynteth them out in colours. Here peradventure a man will aske, why god so forsake men, that they should be wrapped in so greates wicked actes. Hereto may be answered, he did it both for that they deserued this thing by reason of the idolatrye which they committed, when as they had the knowledge of the true god: and also chiefly, to the ende we should vnderstand the necessary helpe had of the comming of Christ. For if men had bene but in a tollerable case, they woulde scarcely haue iudged, that they had any neede of the Mediator Christ. But where sinne aboue measure abounded, there also was grace made more illustrious, of so greates force I say, that it was able to breake in sonder the most greuous yoke of sinne.

sion of wrath according to Aristotle.

The wrath of God from heauen.] By wrath he figuratiuely vnderstandeth vengeance. Augustine writeth to Optatus in his 157. Epistle, that wrath is not in god a perturbation of the mynde, as it is in men: but only a iust and fyred vengeance. Which selfe same thing he writeth in his booke de Trinitate. Wherefore it is a fygure much vbled in the holy scriptures, that for the vengeance of God we rede, anger, or wrath. And Aristotle in his Metaphisikes, defineth it to be an appetite of vengeance for negligence or contempt. For when a man seeth himselfe to be contemned, his desire is straight way inflamed, to seeke to auenge. Wherefore the Apostles meaning is, that these most wicked vices, were a reuenge proceeding from god being angry.

From heauen.] These wordes haue a greates Emphasis or force. For they signify, that this vengeance is manifest, largely spred abroad, and most mighty: as are showers of rayne and tempestes, which fall from heauen vpon the earth. And it is as much, as if he should say, that this wrath or vengeance of God was inflicted, by his deuine might or power. For we are sayd to receaue those thinges from heauen, which seeme to be sent by the power of God, as in Satyras the Poete sayd: Tertius e coelo cecidit Cato, et tanquam Sacculus e coelo descendit: Tertiū de auro. Which is in English: The third Cato descended from heauen, and as a sacke fell this sentence from heauen, Knowe thy selfe. And Cicero also sayth of Pompey, that the prouince saw him, not as one sent from a city: but as one fallen from heauen. So Paule sayth, that this vengeance may in no case be counted as a thing naturall, but as a plague inflicted of God. For as it shall afterward be declared, God deliuered them into a reprobate mynde. And although the corporall calamities, wherewith God striketh vs, are greuous, yet far more greuous is this, when we are deliuered into a reprobate mynde. For in that case men seeke destruction vnto themselves, and are euen their owne slaughtermen. Neyther contrarywise can we obtayne any good thyng more to be wished for, then to attayne vnto an holy mynde and a right vnderstanding. For euen as this is a singular gifte: so is the other a most seuerer vengeance.

Agaynst all vngodlynes and vnrighteousnes of men.] He sayth not agaynst men: because God hateth not them, but taketh vengeance on their wicked actes. And those comprehendeth he vnder the name of impietie and vnrighteousnes: for wicked actes are partly committed agaynst God, and partly agaynst men.

Which withholdeth the truth in vnrighteousnes.] They attayned vnto so much truth, that thereby they vnderstode, how they ought to behaue them selues towarde God, and towarde their neighbours. And yet withheld they the truth in vnrighteousnes. Which selfe same thyng dyd the Hebrewes committe concerning concerning the truth which God had reueled vnto them by the law. Being therfore both these Hebrewes and those Gentiles were so greuously punished, what ought men which professe themselves to be Christians to hope for, which with holde to themselves so great a light of the Gospel without fruit. Undoubtedly, they shall at the length become most wicked, and euen experience teacheth, that those which boast of Christ, and do liue filthely, do at the length in naughtynesse and filthynesse passe all men, though they be neuer so wicked. The truth is after a sorte with hold captiue in them, which vnderstand it, and yet expresse it not in woordes & life. And it is overcome & restrained with the chaynes of euell lustes, which breathing by out of the inferior parts of our mind, do obfuscate the vnderstanding, and as it were in a darke prison close in the truth knowen. God kindeleteth the truth in our myndes, but by our lustes it is wonderfully darkened. There is no cause why we should thinke (as Chrysostome admonisheth vs) of the truth of hys owne nature can suffer any thing. For it of hys owne nature is vnchangeable. But what soeuer euill happeneth, the same is hurtfull to our mynd and soule. Paul toucheth in two wordes those thynges, whiche Aristotle in hys Ethikes (when hee disputeth of the incontinent person) proferreth in many wordes. For he demaundeth, by what meanes the incontinent person declineth to vices, sithen that he hath in hys mynde a right opinion. And he answereth, that that thing happeneth, by reason he is so much pulled by his owne singular profite, which presently is offered vnto his senses: by the wayght wherof the better part also is oppressed, so that it geueth place to the lusts, neither excuteth it hys office, with efficacie to consider and peyle the truth, whiche before it knew. Whiche thyng also the Poete affirmeth of Medea: Vide meliora, probog, deteriora sequor, whiche is in Englishe, I see what thynges are best, and I follow them, but I follow the worst. All this doth Paul teache vs, when hee sayth, That the vngodly wythholde the truth in vnrightheousnesse, That truth laboureth as muche as is possible to burst forth into acte: but it is letted of concupiscence or luste. And this is that, whiche is written in the first of the Ethikes. That the more excellent part of the mynde alwayes exhorteth and prouoketh to thynges which are of the best sorte. For so hath God and nature framed vs, that the thyng which we knowe, we desire to expresse in acte, which thyng when we do not, we are reproued euen by our owne iudgement. And hereof cometh those wonderfull forces of the conscience, whiche in sinnes of great wayght can neuer be perfectly quieted. To with holde the truth in vnrightheousnesse, is properly to refuse the calling of God, which continually by hys truth calleth vs vnto hym self. Wherefore it shall be very profitable for vs, if whē soeuer we haue attained to any thing that is true either by our owne study or els by the obseruation of thynges, we straightway weigh with our selues, where vnto God calleth vs through that truth, which he layth before our myndes. By vnrightheousnesse the Apostle vnderstandeth generally, what soeuer we sinne either agaynst God, or agaynst men. Wherefore Paul speaketh of that truth which is naturally grafted in vs: and also of it which we attayne vnto by our owne study. For either of the instructeth vs of most excellent thynges touchyng God: so that the vnrightheousnesse whiche we commit, is not able to blot it out of our hartes. Whiche thing yet the Academians attempted to teache when as they contended, that nothing can certainly be knowen of vs. And so they can not abyde, that we should embrace any thyng, as being sure that it is true: but they will haue vs to count all thynges as vncertaine & doubtful. And in lyke maner do the Epicures goe about to blot out of mens myndes those thynges which by naturall anticipation are imprinted into our myndes concerning God. And yet notwithstanding neither of these were able to bypasse to passe that which they endeououred themselves to doo. For will they, or will they, these truthe continue still in the myndes of men. But (which is muche to be lamented) they are withholden in vnrightheousnesse. Peraduenture thou wilt aske how it cometh that the truth which we haue by saythe, is of more strengthe to burst forth into acte, then is the truth which is naturally attayned vnto. And undoubtedly, this cometh not therof, for that one truthe being taken by it selfe and set

Cap. i. A Commentarie vpon the

The diuersity is not in the truth but in the means whereby it is taken hold of.

Example of diuers apprehensions of the truth.

A great many more things are reueled vnto vs by the scriptures, than we knowe by nature.

We cannot by nature vnderstande the mysteries of God

There are two principall things which may naturally be knowne of God.

The maiesty of God wherein it consisteth

aparte is stronger then an other. For eether truth hath one and the selfe same nature, but the difference cometh of the meane and instrument, whereby it is receiued. The strengthes of nature are corrupt, weake, and vitiate throughe sin. And therefore the truth which they take hold of, is of no great force. But faith hath ioyned with it the inspiration of God, and the power of the holy ghost. And therefore it doth with great force take holde of the truth. Wherefore, the diuersitie is not in the truth it selfe, but in the meane and instrument, whereby we embrace it. This is the cause why there we are changed, but here we remayne the selfe same men which we were before. Of which thing we haue a manifest testimony in the Gospell. Christ did set forth vnto the young man, what he should do to obteyne saluation, which when he had heard, yet was he not moued to geue place, but went away with heauines. He trusted vnto naturall strengthes, and therefore he was demanded of the Lord, what he might do to attayne vnto eternall lyfe. But contrariwise, Maithew, as soone as euer he heard his vocation, did with so great faith take hold of it, that forsakinge money and hys office, he streight way followed Christ. And Zaccheus, who otherwyle was most couetous of gaine, when he had heard of the Lord, that he would turne into hym, byd not onely with a cheerefull mynd receiue hym into hys house, but also straight way offered himselfe to distribute vnto the poore the halfe of his goodes, and to render foure folde vnto those whom before he had defrauded. Wherefore, the whole difference consisteth in the power, whereby the truth is taken holde of: which thing yet we ought not so to take, as though we affirme that many more things are not reueled vnto vs by the scriptures, as well the new as the olde, then we knowe by nature. Onely we make a certayne comparison betwene one and the selfe same truth, when it is naturally knowen, and when it is receiued by faith.

For that which is knowen of God is manifest among them.] In the Greke is red, το γνωστον εστιν, as if a man should say: That which may be knowen of God, which is therefore spoken, for y there are many deuine mysteries, vnto which we can not by nature attayne: as is this, that God would freely iustifie vs: and through Christ crucified pardon our sinnes: and restore these selfe same bodies of ours vnto eternal felicity. These & other such like, the nature of things teacheth vs not. Therefore Paul sayth, that which may be knowen of God, was made manifest vnto them. In this place he declareth, what maner of truth it was which they withheld in vnrightheousnes. It was the knowldege of things pertaining vnto God, which they attayned vnto by the light of nature. And Paule reduceth all that which they knew vnto two chiefe poyntes: namely, vnto the euerlasting power of God, and vnto hys diuinity. For by the composition of this world, they knowe God to be most mighty: Farther, it could not be hidden from them, but that they knewe by the beautifullnes, forme, and distinction of naturall things, so great a power is gouerned by a prouidence and singuler wisdom. And the commodity & vtility of things created taught the maiesty of God, which in this thing principally consisteth, to do good vnto al men. These are the things which God bestowed vpon the Ethnikes: but they abused the giftes of God. Wherefore right wel agreeth with them the similitude which Chrysostome bleth. For thus he sayth: If a king should geue vnto vnto one of his seruantes a summe of money, with it to adorne his samely, and to encrease his honour, in such maner, that his dignity and maiesty might be the more famous: and the naughty leude seruant should go and bestow it all vpon bandes and harlottes: both not (sayth he) this seruant seeme woorthly and iustly to haue deserued punishment: In such sorte did the Ethnike wise men behaue themselves: they receaued of God a most excellent knowledge of things: wherewith when as they ought to haue worshipped and adorned him, they transferred it to the worshipping of images made of stockes and stones. Wherefore not vnwoorthly wared the wrath of God whotte agaynst them. And when it is written, It was made manifest vnto them: He sayth not: vnto them all, for the scripture scripture putteth a difference betwene the wise men and Philosophers, and betwene the Barbarous and vnllearned common people. For thinges were not to all men a like knowen: which yet happened through the default of these philosophers. For they ought to haue preached and beaten into the eares of the common people these thinges which they knew. But so did they not, as did the Prophets, and the Apostles, but, being puffed up in their mindes, they kept these thinges to themselves: yea rather they after a sort hid them, that all men should not come to the knowledge of them. As there is abroad a certayne Epistle of Aristotle to Alexander the king, wherein he sayth that his booke of natural philosophy were so set forth of hym, as though they had not bene set forth at all. For those thinges which they wrote, they seemed of purpose to darken, that other men should not vnderstand the. Farther through their disputacions they blotted those pure and good thinges which they knew. When they vnderstood that there was but one God, and indged that he only ought to be worshipped, afterward of themselves they thus gathered: soasmuch as the common people are not apt to worship the highe and principall diuinity diffused abroad in all thinges (for they can not in such sort attayne to the vnderstanding of it) it shalbe good, that it were deuised, and annexed vnto Images, celestiall signes, and other creatures. And the selfe same men, when they knew that the nature of God is a thing separte from all corporall matter, that is, that he is a spirite, and therefore ought to be worshipped in spirite and mynde, they I say thinking that the people were in comparison of them so rude that they could not attayne to this, brought in outward rites and ceremonies, which of their owne heat they had inuented: which when men had done, they should thinke, that they had fully done their duty as touching the honour of God. And so by their deepe disputacions and reasonings, they despyled that pure thinge whiche they attained vnto by the creatures, neyther beleued they the truth which they knew, which yet they ought to haue done. Otherwise they would haue submitted them selues vnto that chiefe power which they knew: and haue suffered themselves to be gouerned by the prouidence of God, & would haue put their trust in it in all aduersities, which yet they did not: yea rather they filthily fell into desperation. Cicero crieth out in his latter tyme in his Epistle to Octavius: Oh vnto me who neuer was wise. And he bringeth in Cato in his booke of the nature of the Gods, who, although he were a highe priest, yet desired he that it might be proued vnto hym for truth, that there were any Gods at all. And soasmuch as they beleued not those thinges which they naturally knew of God, they were not only vngodly towardes hym, but also iniurious towardes theyr neighbours. And oftentymes, the excellenter philosophers they were the more filthily life they liued. As the Poete reproveth the, Qui Cynos simulat, & Bacchinalia viuunt, that is, which sayne themselves sad and sober, as though they were Cynics, but lyue most riotously, because the wrath of God waied hore agaynst the. For euen as a scholemaster, if he should continually instructe his scholer, and yet he in the meane tyme should be in hand wth other matters, and haue his mynde runnyng vpon other thyngs, could not suffer so great negligence: so dealeth God wth vs. For he continually setteth befoze our eyes an open booke of the thynges created, he alwayes illustrateth and calleth vs, but we euermore turne away our mynde from his doctrine, and are in hand with other matters. Therefore wyll God cast vs away as naughty scholers, neither wyll he suffer so great injury vnreruenged.

For God hath shewed it vnto them.] Hereby is gathered, that all truth is of God. For it springeth not of our selues. But how it is of God, there are two opinions. Some say y it is therfore of God, because God hath created those thinges by which we may vnderstande these truthe. But others say (whome I best allowe) that God hath grafted in our myndes prolepses, that is, anticipations, and fore instructions, by which we are diuinen to conceaue excellent and wonderful things of the nature of God. And these knowledges of God naturally grafted in vs, are, by the obseruation of thinges that are created, daily more and more confirmed and polished. Some foolishly and also no lesse vngotly say, that they haue learned these truthes of Aristotle, or of Plato, so that they geue no thanks at all vnto God for them. These men in dede were Organes and instrumentes, but yet not authozs. And these mens sayings are, as if an Israelite should say, that he knew the truthes of the law, not by God, but by Moyse: whē yet he was but onely the mediatoz and messenger of God, and which declared these things vnto the people, God beyng the authoz of them. And it is to be noted, that wher as God, of his nature, is so separated from all matter, that he cannot be perceiued by our senses, he is therfore wont to declare himself by signes, and certaine woordes subiect vnto our senses. And these signes, whiche doe at the beginnyng set forth God vnto vs, are creatures: whiche when naturall Philosophers diligently weighed, as touching the proprieties and wonderful qualities of nature, they were brought vnto the knowledge of God. For they knewe the order of causes, and the coniunction of them wpth theyr effectes: and when as they easily perceaued, y there could be nothyng founde infinite, they concluded at the length, that theyr reasonyng must nedes come to some one first thing, that was before al other, and so concluded they, that there is a God.

These thinges both Plato, Aristotle, and Galene, haue most learnedly taught. But lest we should neglect the holy Scriptures, they also haue shewed vnto vs this selfe same way to learne by. Christ sendeth vs to the birdes of heauen, and lillies of the field, and to the grasse, therby to know the singuler prouidence of God in the preservation of those thinges, which he hath brought forth. And Salomon setteth before vs the Antelope to imitate for his prudēcy, wherby in the Sommer he preparerth for himselfe those thinges, which shall bee nedefull for hym in the Winter. Esaie sayth, that the Assē knewe the manger of hys Lorde, and the Ox hys maister, but Israell knewe not his Lorde. Hereby appereth, that we may be taught many thinges by creatures. Dauid wrote a Psalmē wherein is declared this selfe same thing: The heauens set forth the glory of God. But amongst other bookes of the holy scripture, which most excellently set forth this thyng, is the dialogue of the booke of Iob. For the interlocutozs whiche he bringeth in, were Ethnikes: and therfore the matter is there handled onely by naturall reasons. There, are reasoned many thinges of the reuolutions of heauen, of stars, of the earth, sea, lyghtes, wyndes, raynes, thunders, lyghnyngs, snow, yse, also of beastes, as of Lyons, Goates, Hartes, Horses, and Behemoth, which manye thinke to be an Elephant, and lastly of Leuiathan the most huge beast of the sea. All these thinges are there in such maner entreated of, that they set forth vnto vs the eternall power and diuinitie of God. But amongst other thynges, which do chiefly set forth God vnto vs, is euen our owne nature, for we are made after the image and lykenes of hym. Wherfore, we most of all resemble him, and chiefly as touchyng the soule. Wherein, shyneth the prouidence of thynges to come, also iustice, wisdomē, and manye other most noble habites, or qualities: and also the knowledge of byghnes, honestye, noughtines, and filthines. And forasmuch as man and hys soule is not sprong of himselfe, but dependeth of God: then followeth it that we ought not in any case to deny these selfe same thynges vnto God, but ought to attribute them vnto hym, as to the principall and chiefe authoz: so that hereby we may gather, that God hath his prouidence ouer those thinges whiche are done, and that he is y iudge of our actions, vnto whome, as honest thyngs are pleasaunt, so are filthye thinges displeasaunt. I knowe that Cicero in hys booke De Natura Deorum, labourerth to ouerthrowe this reason, wherby we affirme, that those thyngs which in vs are most noble ought to bee ascribed vnto god. But let hym alone, howe so euer he reasonerth, vnto vs it sufficeth, that we are by the holy Scriptures confirmed in this matter. In the 94. Psalmē it is written: He which planted the eare, shall he not heare?

He

He which made the eye, shall hee not see? Wherby we are taught, that those things which are perfecte and absolute in vs, ought not to bee taken away from the nature of God. Moreover, we see that our consciences do naturally abhorre from wicked actes, which we haue committed: and contrariwise doe reioyce and are glad in good deedes. Which thyng, forasmuche as it is naturally grafted in vs, teacheth vs, that the iudgement of God remayneth, whose condemnation our mindes aboue all thynges are asfayde of, so that sometymes they seeme to bee tossed with surpes: and contrariwise they reioyce, when they hope that from that iudgement seate they shall carpe away comendation and rewarde. I could rehearse a great many other such lyke thynges: but they may easilye be gathered both out of the holy Scriptures, and also out of the booke of Philosophers. Wherefore I will cease to adde any more, and counte it sufficient to haue sayd, that there is nothyng in the worlde so abiecte and vile, which beareth not witness of God. All thynges (sayd the Poete) are full of Jupiter: For what so euer is in the worlde, so long as it is preserved, so long hath it the power of God hidden vnder it: which, if by searching out, and naturall knowledge it bee vncouered, then will it resemble God vnto vs. To this sentence of the Apostle, other places of the Scripture appeare to be repugnaunt, in which from the wicked is taken away the knowledge of God. We read in the Psalmes: The foolish man sayd in his hart, there is no God: And agayne it is written: In earth there is none that vnderstandeth, or that seeketh after God. And not to rehearse many places, in Esaie the first chap. it is written: But Israell hath not knowne me. But this contrarie tie is after this sorte conciliated: The vngodly doe in dede confesse (as Paule sayth) being conuincid by creatures, that there is a God: but afterward, they so define of his nature and proprietie, that thereby a man may well conclude, that there is no God. For Epicurus sayd, that there were Gods in dede: but he toke from the almaner of doing, care, & prouidence, so that he ascribed a felicity vtterly idle. Also for that they say, that there is a God, but yet such a one as hath not prouidence ouer humane thynges, neither punisheth, nor heareth such as call vpon hym, and such other like: thereby is concluded, that they were of this opinion, that they thought there was a God, but onely in name. And therefore the Scripture denyeth that they knewe God. For the true God is not such, as they say, ned hym to bee: and as touching them selues, and their life, as to be holpen, or to haue the fruition of Gods ayde, it was all one as if there had bene no God at all: forasmuch as they fledde not vnto hym, to call vpon hym, neither dyd they at his handes looke for either helpe or ayde. And besides that, there haue bene some so vngodly, that they haue gone about to perswade the selues, that there is no God in dede: and although they were not able to bring this to passe, their owne minde resisting it, and their conscience striming agaynst it, yet doth the Scripture pronounce of them, according to their endeouours: and after this sorte sayth, that they knewe not God. Lastly, this is to be knowen, that the knowledge of God is in two sortes: one is of efficacie, wherby we are chaunged, so that we labour to expresse in workes, those thynges which we knowe, and this knowledge of God the holy Scriptures ascribe onely vnto the godly: but the other is a colde knowledge, wherby we are made nothing the better: for we shewe not forth in deedes, that we knowe those thynges, which in very dede we knowe. And of this kinde of knowledge Paule afterward speaketh, when he sayth: And as they regarded not to knowe God. &c. Christ also shall say vnto many which boasted of his giftes and knowledge, I knowe you not. But so to knowe God, forasmuch as it nothyng profiteth, the holy Scripture oftentimes so reiecteth, that it vouchsafeth not to call it by the name of the knowledge of God, and saith, that the vngodlye, forasmuch as there were such, know not God.

The perfections which are in vs cannot be taken away from God.

There is nothinge so vile in the worlde which beareth not a testimony of god.

How the knowledge of god is attributed vnto the vngodlye, and how it is taken away from them.

Some haue gone about to perswade themselves that there is no god. The knowledge of god two manner of wayes.

So that they are without excuse: Because that when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were they thankful, but waxed full of vanities in their imaginations, and their foolish hart was blinded. And when they counted them selues wise

So that they are inexcusable.] In þ Greke it is, ὅτι τὸ εἶναι αὐτοὺς ἀναπολόγητοι. God reuealed not those naturall knowledges to thys end: but the same happened through our default. Howbeit, that which Paule sayth in thys place, seemeth to be repugnaunte vnto those thynges which are often spoken, where mention is made of woorkes & grace. For if it be true, that by our owne strengthes, and free will, we can not performe the lawe of God, which we knowe, howe can these men be sayd to be inexcusable? For if that which we say, be true, they might easily be excused, that they in dede by the light of nature knew this law: but yet they wanted strength wherby to performe so much as they knewe. And therefore they seeme not to be inexcusable. But here Paule entreateth of that excuse onely, which might be alleaged of ignorance. For, that which is now sayd as touching infirmities, the Ethnikes layde not for an excuse: for they attributed all thynges to free will. Therefore they would not haue sayd, that they wanted strength to performe it: onely this remained, to excuse the selues by ignorance.
Which Apologie or refuge, seing Paule hath cutte of from them, there resteth onely, that euen by their owne iudgement, they should bee sayd to be without excuse. If they had sayd, that they were weak, although they knewe, what they ought to doe: that was it which Paule traueileth to bring them vnto: namely, that therefore the knowledge of the lawe of nature, could not make them better, because the lawe, although they knewe it, yet coulde it not alter them, nor geue strength vnto them to liue byrighly: wherfore it was necessarie for them to flye vnto Christ. But because he knew, that the Gentiles fledde not to that excuse, therefore he repelleth that which he saw might easily haue bene objected: which thyng was ignorance. Although the other excuse also of the infirmities of strengthes, was not woorthye to bee admitted. For the same debilitie happeneth through our owne default, that is, through sinne. Further, they were without excuse, because that litle which was in their power, namely, as touching outward actions, they performed not according to their knowledge. For we are not so destitute of strength by reason of sinne, but that in outward woorkes we are able to performe many thynges: in whiche they declared them selues to be moste wicked. Wherefore it followeth, that they were utterly without excuse. Neither could they alleage thys for a cause, namely, that those thynges wherein they sinned, were done agaynst their will. Wherefore, seing wittingly and willingly they doyd euill, they had no excuse at all. Neither is it to be thought, that God graun-ted vnto them this excellent knowledge, to the end they should be without excuse.
For, that happened through their owne default: when as otherwyle the prouidence of God bled theyr wickednes to hys glorie, and to set forth hys iustice.
Thus much they profited through their sinnes: that the doctrine and knowledge which they obtayned, furthered them to iudgement and condemnation. Wherefore we ought not to be seared away from teaching, though we see that men become nothing the better: forasmuch as the selfe same thyng happeneth vnto that doctrine, which God hym selfe ministrerh vnto vs. At the least way, thys commo-ditie shall thereby aryse: if men bee not of God conuerted, yet shall they by theyr owne iudgement and testimonie be condemned. And thys thyng chiefe semeth God to will, namely, then to appeare righteous, when he punisheth or con-demneth. The profite that Judas the betrayer receaued by the doctrine of Christ, was at the length to condemne hym selfe, saying: I haue sinned, in deliuering the iuste bloude. For to that poynt are the vngodly drinen, at the length by their owne iudgement to be condemned. And such which ought to haue taken profite by the doctrine, are by the same greuously hurt: which thyng we read in Esai the pphet, when it is sayd: Make blinde the harte of thys people: Stoppe their eies, and shutte their eyes: Least peraduenture they shoulde see, heare, and vnderstand, and bee conuerted, and I shoulde heale them. So also by the wordes of Moyse was þ hart

of Pharao alwayes moze and moze hardened.

Because when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were they thankfull.] Here is added a reason, why they were without excuse. And not to go confusedly to worke, this is the methode which Paule useth. He made mention of the naturall knowledge, which ought to haue bene to the Ethnikes a most profitable lawe, how to leade their life: namely, to expresse in maners, that which by knowledge they vnderstoode. Now he accuseth the of the transgression of this lawe. And his accusation containeth two principall poyntes. First he layeth to their charge the contempt of the worshipping of God, and ingratitude towardes hym: which thynges pertayne vnto the mynde: then he accuseth them, for that they attributed vnto Images (which they themselves had made) and vnto creatures, that honour whiche was due vnto God only. And to the ende he would eraggrate or amplifie these sinnes, he sheweth how they escaped not vnuenged. For first God tooke vengeance vpon their wickednes with this punishment, that he blynded theyr hart, and theyr mynde waxed foolish: so that they which aboue other professed learning and wisdom, appeared most fooles of all: and theyr reasones whiche they counted wisdome, were made frustrate and became viterly hayne. The punishment of the other sinne, namely, of the inuention of Idoles was, that they should contaminate themselves with most fylthy vices. By this order of accusation is gathered, that idolatry taketh not place, vnles error, or (to speake moze playnly) sinne first haue place in the mind. And those things which are here spoke of these two principall vices, are bewayled of Jeremy in the 2. chap. when he sayth: Be astonishd O ye heauens, be afraide and exceedingly abashed: For my people hath committed two greuous thinges: They haue forsaken me the fountayne of the water of life, and haue digged for themselves cisternes, which are not able to hold water. To forsake God is, to take away the worshipping due vnto him, and true geuing of thanks. And to make and worship Images, is to make cisternes, out of whiche can not be drawen the waters of helpe and grace. The selfe same order we fynde in the first table of the tenne commaundementes. For God first commaundeth, that he be worshipped alone: then in the second precept he commaundeth, that we take not vnto our selues any other Gods. And vndoubtedly if we depart from the true God, it is not possible, but that straight waye shoulde spring forth idolatrye. Because, will we or nill we, we can not be without a God. Wherefore take away him, which is the true God, out of our hartes, and of necessitye an other fayned God must be substituted in his place. And Chrysostome hath profitably noted, that euen as they which walke or sayle by night without light, do oftentimes hit agaynst some rocke or stumbling blocke and miserable perishe, so farre is it of that that they come to the place they determined to come vnto: so they, which depart from the light of the doctrine set forth vnto vs by God, must needes of necessitye fall into most greuous euils. By these thinges which the Apostle now speaketh, is easely perceaued, that this was a weak knowledge, which the Ethnikes had naturallly touching God: for as much as it altered the not, but rather was overcome with lusses, which darkened hys minde.

They glorified him not as God, neyther vvere they thankfull.] By these wordes he describeth the worshipping, which they ought to haue performed in mynde, and in spirite: whereof we haue before written at large, and haue reduced the whole matter vnto fower principall poyntes: namely, vnto prayers, hope, thanks geuing, and the feare or obeysance, which good chyliden haue towardes their parentes. For then we worshippe God truly, when we wholly submitte our selues vnto him, so that we embrace him aboue all thinges, and aboue our selues also. And all this is expresse in that commaundement: Thou shalt loue thy Lorde thy God wyth all thy harte, wyth all thy soule, and wyth all thy strengthes. And this word δοξάζειν, which Paule here useth, which is translated, to glorifye, signifyeth chiefly, to iudge very well and honorably of a man.

But how slenderly the Philosophers iudged of the prouidence of god, & of his iudgements: of his rewards I say & punishments, their opinions: which are euery where abroad, do sufficiently declare. If a man should demaunde what it is, that both chieflly glorifye god, I would answere that it is faith. Which thynge I affirme not of my selfe: but the scripture teacheth it, for afterwarde it is sayd of Abraham, that when god had promised vnto him an heyre by Sara his wife, he considered not his body being in a maner dead, nor the wombe of Sara now past childe bearing, but gaue glory vnto God. For he iudged so honorably of hym, that although he saw that by mans power that could not be performed which was promised, yet neuertheles, he beleued. This is to geue glory vnto God: to thinke that he both is able and knoweth, and also will performe all those thinges which he promisseth.

Neither gaue they thanks. They do perfectly geue thanks, which when they vnderstand that they haue receaued of God all the good thinges which they haue, do geue thanks vnto him for the same. But this did not the Philosophers forasmuch as they did not thinke that all thinges depended of God. For they referred many thinges to chance and to fortune, that is, to the concurrence of causes, which they supposed to be most frequent, in this our lower region which is vnder the Moone. Further they affirmed, that many thinges happened vnto vs through the necessity of the matter. And so, forasmuch as they excluded very many thinges from the prouidence of God, they became very colde in geuing him thanks.

But waxed vayne in their imaginations. In Greke it is, ματαιόθυτοι ἐν τοῖς διαλογισμοῖς αὐτῶν, Erasmus sayth: they were frustrated: For when by theyr imagination they thought to haue obteyned the name of excellent learning and wisdom, they wonderfully vttered their owne foolishnes. And to be frustrate, is nothing els, then when we hope for some good thynge to come vnto vs, and the same falleth far otherwise then we thought for. Although we myght say as Aristotle writeth, that is vayne which is not brought to the ende appoynted. And experience teacheth by these men, that so it happened vnto naturall wisdom.

For therfore was it reueled, that when they knew God, they shoulde haue had hym in reuerence and honour: But forasmuch as they bended not that way, it became vayne. διαλογισμοί, which is turned into English, imaginatiōs, or cogitations, are reasonynges or disputations, which are done wth great pelling, and depe iudgement. Wherefore the Philosophers are reprobued, because they abode not in those thinges which they naturally knew of God: but declined from it through their dispartations and wittie collections. For on the one side the creatures taught the that the one God which they knew, ought to be honored of the wth a singular seruientnes and purenes. And on the other syde fleshy lusses & entysing pleasures byged them, whiche oughte vterly to haue bene excluded in that true and lawfull worshipping of God. But these wittie men inuented, how to knit them both together. For they brought in a worshipping of God, but yet such as consisted of gold & siluer, gorgeous sacrifices, dainty banquets, playes, spectacles or goodly straunge sightes, and such lyke thynge, whiche ministered vnto their flesh the pleasures therof: so that wth one and the selfe same worke, they both worshipped God, and also delighted the senses. And in summe, they sayned that goodnes, which Augustine agaynst Iulianus, calleth Scylleum bonum, because it consisted partly of a man, and partly of a beast. Wherefore, we ought diligently to watch agaynst these fond imaginations, for that they engender so great danger. For in the latter epistle to the Corinthians. Paule writeth, For the weapons of our warfare, are not carnall, but mighty through God to cast downe stronge holdes. Wherefore we ouerthrowing such depe reasonings, and euery high thing that exalteth it selfe agaynst the knowledge of God, oughte to be content wth that manifestation, wherby God declareth himselfe vnto vs. For as often as we patche any thing of our owne reason to the worde of God, so often we bring forth forth errors. Forther do these thynges whiche Paul now reproveth, serve any lesse for these our tymes, then did they for idolatry of those tymes. For Christ instituted the Lords supper, that the death of the Lorde should there be had in remembrance, and the communicantes should be partakers of the fruite thereof, and be joynted unto Christ, and be alwayes coupled together among themselves with a greater amitie, and mortifie the wycked lustes, and through that heavenly meate more and more practise a new lyfe. This is the worshipping, which in this sacrament God requirerh of his. Wherewith men not being content, eyther because it was a thyng hard to be done, or els because they would evermore adde theyr owne inventions to thynges pertaynyng unto God, have invented outward ornaments, vestmentes, golde, silver, precious stones, ware, rapiers, belles, and infinite ceremonies, therby to set forth this sacrament: And would have men to stand by at theyr Masse, and to be onely gasers on & hearers, which should in the meane tyme mumble by theyr prayers: and after this sorte they would be counted very byrighly to have done their duties in these deuyne mysteries: so that by such humane deuises the true and lawfull vse of the institution of Christ is in a maner abolished. This is the profite that cometh of humane inventions. So madde and foolish becommeth the hart, that it preferreth lyght and frivolums thynges, before thynges necessary and sound.

This is applied to our tyme, Of the abuse of the supper of the Lord.

And when they counted themselves vwise, they became fooles. ] They had a wonderfull pleasure in themselves by reason of theyr owne inventions. And they which aboue others professed wisdom, by the iust iudgement of God became fooles. They disdayned to contayne themselves within the bondes of that wisdom and knowledge which God had reveled unto them by his creatures, whereby they were called to worship God: and did rather geve place to theyr owne imaginations, then to the doctrine which they had receyved. They delighted in their owne sharpe wittes, & counted it for a great praise that they had found out the reason, how to set forth before the eyes of the common people, the worshipping of God by images, & glorious idols. Which could never have bene brought to passe without such reasons, whiche had great lykelyhoode of truth. When they were reproved, they excused theyr acte with this pretence, that they counted not those thynges to be gods which they worshipped, but that they used such helpes, whereby they might the easelier come to the true God.

An excuse of idolaters.

And they obtained a similitude taken of a civile custome: for that men have not free access unto kynges and Emperours, but by Criers, and vnder officers. But of how much force this reason is, Ambrose vpon this place declareth. For thus he writeth: Men through shame vse accustomedly every where this miserable excuse, why they neglect to come vnto God, saying: that by them we go vnto God, as by noble men we come vnto a kyng. Well saide, as there any man so madde, or so vnmindfull of his health, to geue vnto a noble man the honor due vnto the kyng only? For that if any in such sorte behaue themselves, they are iustly condemned as guilty of treason. And shall these men not thinke themselves guilty, which geue the honor of the name of God vnto a creature? and forsaking their Lord do worship theyr fellow seruantes? as though there were any thing greater then God, to whom a man might do seruice. For therfore also do we goe vnto a kyng by Tribunes, and noble men, because the kyng is also a man and knoweth not to whome to commit the publique wealth. But to come vnto God from whome vndoubtedly nothing is hidden (for he knoweth the merites of all men) we haue no neede of an aduocate, but of a deuout minde. For wheresoeuer such a one shall speake vnto hym, he will answer hym. These wordes of Ambrose, if they be of value to confounde this similitude of these idolaters, they are able also to confute our men: for, as much as they by the self same sayned deuise, defend the inuocation of saints.

We neede no aduocates to come vnto God.

They became fooles. ] For that in steade of the true and perfect worshipping of God, they embraced but a shadow thereof: which thyng Paul in moe places then in one reproveth. In the 2. to Tim. the 3. chap. he sayth: Having in deede the forme of piety, but viterly denying the power thereof. And to the Colossians the 2. chap.

And they turned the glory of the immortall God into an image.] Made not onely after the similitude of a mortall man, but also of birdes, and foure footed and creepng beastes. After that they began to esteeme their owne inuentions aboue the doctrine which was reueled vnto them, straight way followed idolatry, which springeth of the error of the mynde. And whereas it is sayde, that they transferred the gloze of God vnto creatures, they are reprovied, for that they knew that that gloze was in deede in God. But when it was offered them they turned it by sacriledge from him an other way. Which sinne is here wonderfully aggrauated. It was an hainous acte to robbe God of his due honour: it was haynous also to transferre the same vnto a corruptible man: but it was more haynous to transferre it vnto brute beastes, and mooste haynous of all was it to transferre it vnto the images of all these thynges. Neyther is thys thyng spoken, as Chrysostome noteth, as though they could in very deede depriue God of hys gloze or honour: for that lyeth not in the power of any creature: But they are accused of rathe boldenes, in that they presumed, as muche as laye in them, to assaye to byng the same to passe. God is in this place called εἰδωλον, which signifieth not onely immortallitye, but also the taking awaye of all kynde of griefe, or spotte of anye manner of corruption. And contrary wyse, in that man is called φθαρτος, it declareth hym not onely to be mortall, but also to be subiecte vnto manye discommodities and corruptions. Thys phrase of speech, Paule transferreth out of the 106. psalme, where it is written: That the Israelites made a calfe in Horeb, worshipped a molten Image, and chaunged theyr gloze into the similitude of one that eateth haye. Herein onely seeth meth the difference to be, in that here it is sayd, that the gloze of God was chaunged: but ther is sayd, that theyr gloze was chaunged. Whobeyt in eyther of 2 places is contayned one and the selfe same sense. For their gloze was God: in him gloried the Hebrewes: And Dauid euery where in hys psalmes, calleth him hys gloze. And if a man should peraduenture demaunde, in what thynges this gloze of God consisteth, to aunswere briesflye, herein it is contayned: to acknowledge him for the authoz and distributor of all good thynges: the iudge of all mens doinges: and so amplye to bee spread abroad, that he filleth all thynges. These thynges if they be beleued, do engender adozation, a trust or confidence, inuocation, geuing of thanks, feare, and other such lyke poyntes of religion. But the wicked inuentions of men doe ascribe these thynges vnto Idoles, and doe binde God vnto certayne places, signes, and images. And whom we know to be euery where, hym do they make to dwell in some one place onely. And as mennes mindes are presumptuous and bolde, contrarywyse now in our dayes, whylest with toth and naide they maintaine theyr transubstantiations, or (if I may so call them) theyr inpanations, they in such sorte diffuse the body of Christ; which occupieth in deede one certayne place, that it is really, not onely in so many places, in how many the Supper of the Lorde amonge Christian men is celebrated: but also now they contend by expresse wordes, that it is euery where. The endeouour of Idolaters at that tyme was, to teach the common people to honour God (which is but onely one) by sundrye proprieties, which they adioyned to certayne Images of their owne inuention. And it is a wonder to see, how much those men pleased them selues in these thynges. Plato in Cratylus bringeth in Socrates disputing of the right imposition of names: and chieflye he diligently examineth the names of the Gods, and sheweth, that by them are very aptlye signified the proprieties of thynges deuine. Which place Cicero also seemeth to haue imitated in hys booke of the nature of Gods: wher vnder the person of the Sroyke, he sheweth, what the names of the Gods signifie, and in what maner they ought to be referred vnto one God, one y. These men vndoubtedly woulde make them selues wyser then God, which hath declared hym selfe by the framing of the whole world. For, as though that were not sufficient, these men inuented Images, and many many kindes of Idoles. But this is a wise saying of Athanasius: When a living man moueth thee not to knowe God, how can a man of woode cause thee to doe it? They first inuented Images, as they alleaged, for representation sake. But from thence they were afterward ledde to worship the. And that they also worshipped the Images of brute beastes, many histories do manifestly declare. Unto Bell among the Babylonians was first erected an Image, by which was alwayes a Dragon present, if we credite to the Apocryphas of Daniell. The Egyptians had Anubis, an Oxe, which they worshipped. And Ambrose testifieth, that there were holy seruices done to Rauens. Furthermore, for that the Poetes sayned, that Iupiter for the fulfilling of his filthy lustes, was sometymes turned into a bull, sometymes into a Swanne, and sometymes into an Eagle, those kinde of beastes they consecrated vnto God, and honoured them as Gods. But they needed not thus to haue set forth the power of God, by so many sayned inuentions: forasmuch as all creatures doe beare witness of hym. Wherefore to inuent Images, was nothing els, then to light by Candles and Torchies in the Sunne. This thing the deuill chiefly laboured for, that the power of God might be bound vnto certayne places: that men myghte there onely praye vnto God: and there receaue great holynes: and lastly, there to make an end of theyr godlines: as though out of those places, they might line as they luste them selues: as we see now the vse is, in receauing of the Supper of the Lorde. There onely we thinke that all good thynges are to be poured out towarde God: vnto it they prostrate them selues, there they knocke their brestes, there they make inuocation, there shewe they forth what soeuer pietie they haue. All other thynges in comparison of it, are a playe and of no waight. This is worthy to be noted, that Paule doth here so sharply reprove these men, which yet sayd that they worshipped not those Images, but by them honoured the one onely God: and the Scriptures do euery where reprehend them, for that they worshipped the workes of theyr owne handes. By which wordes an vpright iudgement may gather, that these bulgare and common excuses, are not to be admitted. Yea, and Augustine also in his 6. Sermon in the 10. tome, after this sorte conuinceth the Ethnickes, that they toke theyr Idole for a God, because vnto it they builded altars: For (saith he) that they haue a God, and doe worship that Idole for a God, the altar doth testifie. What maketh the altar there, if that it be not counted for a God? Let no man say vnto me, it is not a God. I haue already answered, that matter I would to God they knew this thing so well as we know it. But both what they haue, and also for what thing they haue it, the altar doth testifie. This place of Paule taketh away all excuse from Idolaters. They were no lesse wittie to defend their Idolatries, then are our men at this day to defend the worshipping of Sainctes. Which thing he that beleueth not, let hym read the 30. Epistle of Ambrose, which containeth the oration of Symmachus: wherein in the name of the people of Rome, and of the Senate, he desired of the Emperours Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius, that the worshipping of the Gods myghte be restored. Symmachus denyeth not in that place, but that God is euery wherebut yet he sayth, that it is much better, to haue some certain places appoynted for religion. And he would haue the secretes of the deuine nature to be secluded from the people, vnto which diuerse nations aspyre not by one and the selfe same meanes, for that all are not of one disposition. He boasteth much of miracles: namelye, that by these Gods, Rome was defended from Hanniball, and from the Senons, and lastly, that it had subdued the whole worlde vnder her gouernment: but since they were neglected, greuous calamities haue happened vnto the publike wealth. He contendeth, that there is but one God only, vnto whom all men haue a regarde, and doe come vnto hym by sundry wayes. Wherefore in the conclusion, he requireth that the Emperours would be so good, to suffer euery nation to haue his owne religion. But what Ambrose answereth to these thynges, here is now no more place to declare. They which are desirous thereof, may easilie read it in his 31. Epistle.

V Wherefore God deliuered them vp.] Now is described the punishment, wherewith God took vengeance vpon the haynous sinne of idolatry. Whiche he therefore so greuously punished, for y he will haue his owne glozy alwayes reserued vnto himselfe. By Esay the prophete he sayth: My glory will I not geue vnto an other. And forasmuch as he hath spoused vnto himselfe the faythful, as a spouse and chaste virgin, he can not abide, that they should be defiled with the adulterous worshipping of Idols. In the law he calleth himselfe a gelous God, for that he will not suffer this dishonour. Further greate was the anger, wherewith he was incensed: because these wicked actes were done by the, of whom they were least of all to be looked for, that is, of the learnedest sort, which farre excelled others in wisdome, as it is reported the Egyptians did. For as this nation was counted the mother of sciences, so also was it a most abundant fountayne of idolatry. There, not only men were worshipped, but also Oren, Crocodiles, Leekes, Dynions, Cattes, and many more such like thinges. And as Chrysostome thinketh, Plato for that by much traueling, he had attayned vnto their doctrine, had a great pleasure in himselfe. And Chrysostome reprooueth Socrates the scholemaster of Plato, because when he was at the poynt of death, he desired his friendes, to pay vnto Esculapius a Cocke, which he remembred he owed him. Astronomers, which aboue others boast themselues as touching the knowledge of celestiaall thinges, haue transferred into heauen a Beare, two swynes, a Bull, a Crowne, an Eagle, a Scorpion, a Snake and such like monstrous thinges: and to the starres which are the excellent workes of God, they fainedly adioyne these they made dreames, and do after a sort attribute vnto them the gouernment of the world. This thing hath the deuill procured, that men should become subiect vnto those thinges, ouer which they ought to be Lordes and rulers. So man which was made, to be lifted vp into heauen, neglecting himselfe, hath to his power lifted vp to the same place brutishe and vnreasonable beastes. Further the Poetes, which aboue other men were had in admiration, did they not sayne what they lusted themselues of the Gods: Of their deuise and opinion Plato (which is counted the most graue amongst the Philosophers) speaketh doubtfully. In his booke De Repub: he iudgeth them worthy vnto be banished out of the city, because they spake so vnreuerently of the Gods. And yet in an other place, he commaundeth, that when they entreate of thinges deuine, we shoulde geue credite vnto them: because they declare such thinges not of themselues, but by heauenly inspiration. If a man would demaund of them why so wise men worshipped eyther Crocodiles or serpentes, peradventure they would haue answered, that they in them wondred at the most mighty power, whereby they do hurt men: and that in them is expressed the auenging wrath of God, which by those worshippings they desired to be turned away from them, in worshipping God as ἀντιπαρὸν, that is, as an expeller away of those euill thinges. And this sinne was so spread abroad, that it infected the Jewes also. For in Ezechiel it is written, that when he was of the spirite caried by the beates of the head into Jerusalem, he saw in it not onely that Idole, whereby the wrath of God was prouoked, but also in the Temple he perceaued, that on the walles were paynted, beastes, liuing creatures, and all maner of creeping beastes, vnto which the chiefe elders of the people with much reuerence offered incense: which was to geue vnto them deuine honours. The selfe same thing is at this day openly vied in the Papacy vnto signes, Images, and stockes: and yet they say, they are free from the crime of idolatry. Further the Prophet saw on the other side women bewayling Tamuz, that is, Adonides. Lastly he beheld men in the sanctuary, whiche turning their shoulders ders to the most holy place, and their face towarde the doores of the Tempell, worshipped the Sunne as it rose in the East. And it is there sayd, that by reason of all these thinges, the wrath of God was wonderfully prouoked. Paule also in this place declareth, with what punishments God punished the Gentiles for these sinnes. For he saw that his doctrine was contemned: in that whereas he had reuealed himselfe through the beauty and hugenes of the whole worlde which he had made, so excellent a gift was utterly had in no reputation amongst men. And they chose vnto themselves so many Images and peculiar inuencions, as there were kingdomes, prouinces, cities, families, and in a manner men. The punishment which they suffered, was, that God deliuered them vp to their owne lustes to be tormented. This was that punishment which is called Pena talionis, like for like. For even as they spoiled God, as much as in them lay, of his glory, so agayne on the other side, God deliuered them, to be vexed with most filthy lustes: so that they degenerated, not only into brute beastes, but also became farre vnderneath them. This is the greatest infelicity that can happen vnto man, when the spirite and the mynde, which ought to governe, are by the iust iudgement of God made subiect to cruell and most filthy lustes, we haue no neede of any outward tormenters: we haue auengers inough at home. For that which the Poetes fable of Acteon, that he was torne in pieces of his dogges, hath place in these men, which are inflamed and rent in sonder of the lustes of their owne mynde. And this phrase, which Paule here bleth, is taken out of the 81. Psalm, wherein is read: My people hath not hearkened, neyther hath Israell given heed vnto me. And I haue deliuered them vp into the frowardnes of theyr hart: and they haue walked in their owne denises. Let those which defend the powers and strengthes of man, and which attribute in a manner all thinges vnto free will, yea and that without the grace of Christ, consider by these thinges, howe farre they erre from the truth. Here is described the horriblest punishment that can be: when a man is forsaken of God and deliuered vp to be gouerned of himselfe. Neither helpeth it any thing at all to say, that here is now entreated onely of lustes, and of the brutish, or inferior partes of our mynde: forasmuch as Paule hath together with lustes made mention of the hart, whereby is noted the nobler part of the mynde. And Dauid sayth playnly, That God forsooke them, that they should go on according to their owne hart, and counsels. But how is this kinde of speach to be expounded, God deliuered vp them to their owne lustes? All the fathers in a manner teach, that To deliuer, is all one, as if it should haue bene sayde, to suffer, to permitte, or to forsake. For they seme to abhorre to say, that God is the cause of sinne. And these are the reasons as farre as I gather, that moue them therunto: Because the holy scriptures do testifie, that God willet no sinne, forasmuch as it is written: Thou art the God that wilt no iniquity. Further this thing they labour for, to take away all manner of excuse from the wicked actes of men: vnto which wicked actes if God shoulde diue them, it shoulde seeme, that they might lay for an excuse the will of God. Further they endeuor themselves to aduance the glory of God, that he shoulde not be accused of iniustice, for that he diueth men into sinnes, and then afterward reprooueth them for the same. Lastly they labour to maintayne free will, least if it shoulde be thought, that God diueth men to sinne, it shoulde either be taken away, or els be diminished. Vnto these reasons Chrysostom vpon this place addeth two similitudes. One of a captayne, which in the fight or battayle forsaketh his host. For he is sayd, to betray his souldiers to his enemyes, when as in very deede he only withdraueth from them his helpe and presence. So God is said to deliuer vp these men, because he taketh away from them his helpe and grace. The other similitude, is of a Prince or king: which when he seeth his sonne to be past all goodnes, and perceaueth, that he can not make him good, deprieth him of all his goodes, and forsaketh him. So (sayth he) dealeth God with these men. But these reasons seeme not of necessitie to diue vs to this kinde of interpretation.

We haue domesticall tormenters at home. Many Accusers. A place of the Psalm.

That free will is nothing without grace.

Whether to deliuer vp be all one with God to permitte. The reasons of the that say to deliuer vp is to permitte.

We answer eth to the reasons alleaged.

terpretation. For as touching sinne, we graunt y<sup>e</sup> God willethe no sin, if we loke vpon his will, which is declared vnto vs in y<sup>e</sup> lawes of God & in y<sup>e</sup> holy scriptures.
But y<sup>e</sup> he utterly and absolutely willethe no sinne, we may in no case graunt, for asmuch as we know, that he made all thinges whatsoever he would: & agaynst his will no man can resist, wherefore if by all maner of wayes he would it not, then could it by no meanes be done. Further we affirme, that all excuse is taken away from sinners: forasmuch as their conscience repproeth them, neither sinne they against their will or by compulsion. And that litle which lay in them to do, as touching our ward disciplinethy perfozmed not. Neyther ought God to be accused of vnrightheousnes, although he will and incline or bypue the wills of the wicked into greuous sinnes. For these synnes as they procede from hym, are punishments, and those most iust, and whatsoever God appoynteth or decreeth, it is streight way iust and holy: neither ought hys iustice to be weighed accor-dyng to the consideration of our iustice. For God oughte not to be accused of blame or iniquity, because he suffereth many to sinne before hys face, whome he could holde backe, and helpe with his grace that they should not fall, vnder thys pretence, because we should iustly be accused if we shuld permit any such thing.
We may not thinke that these thinges are repugnant to the one to the other: Namely, that we are iustly accused, and that we utterly wante all excuse if we sinne: and yet notwithstanding can not abstayne from sinne, neither can we as we ought, obey the commaundements of God, vnles we be holpen by grace.
And lastly, that it is God which worketh all in all: forasmuch as in him we lyue, and are moued, and haue our beyng: And he beareth by all thynges wyth the worde of hys power. These thinges ought we to beleue, for that they are oracles of the holy scriptures. Wherfore, if by our reason they seme not to agree together, yet must we be content: for we can not perle the secretes of God, neither hath God any nede of our excuses. Which excuses yet, if a man would na-rowly examine, he shal fynd y<sup>e</sup> they do not in any thyng satisfy our iudgement.
If there be a maister of a householde which hath seruantes in hys house, which continually commit most greuous sinnes, and wou'd make hys excuse and say that he byneth them not therunto, neither prouoketh them to do naughtely, but onely suffereth them, wincketh at them, and permitteth them, what an excuse I pray you should this be. Neyther is free will, by thys thinge in daunger, so far forth as we must graunt y<sup>e</sup> free will is. For we ought not to beleue y<sup>e</sup> god doth so deliner men, that he compelleth them or bypue the agaynst theyr will. They willingly, gladly, and of theyr owne accord serue their owne lustes. The simili-tudes which Chrysostome, byingeth are verye weake. For howe can a Captayne which forsaketh hys host, not be counted the cause of theyr destruction? And although, when the house toppeth falleth, the wayght thereof byaweth it vnto the earth, yet how shall not he which remoued the beame or pillar, whiche stayed it vp, be sayd to be the cause of the fall therof? So that whether soeuer they turne themselves, when they say that God forsaketh and withdroweth his helpe, they must nedes be compelled to say, that God after a sort willethe sinne. And the father which disinheriteth hys sonne when he can not amend hym, what comparison hath he with God, whiche can if he wyll, amende men: Wherfore, we see not why we should be iustly perswaded by these reasons to interprete these wordes. To deliner, to harden, to blinde, by these wordes. To suffer, to permit, and to forsake. But as touching this matter, let vs byriefely examine Augustines opinion: whether God be sayd to deliner the vngodly vnto their lustes, onely in for-sakyng them, or also after some maner forcyng them. He semeth in this matter to be diuerly mynded. For in hys booke of predestination and grace the 4. chap. he hath this interpretation, of sufferynge & permittynge. And he addeth that to harden is nothing els, then y<sup>e</sup> he wil not make soft. To blinde is nothing els then y<sup>e</sup> he wil not illuminate: to put backe, is nothing els then y<sup>e</sup> he wil not call. But in his booke of grace & free will y<sup>e</sup> 21. chap. he writeth manifestly inough as I thinke.
That God worketh in the hartes of men, so incline their willes, whether so euer it pleaseth hym:

Augustine
de prede-

hym: eyther to good thynges according to hys mercy, or alls to euill thynges according to theyr desertes: and that by his iudgement, being sometimes open, and sometimes hidden, but alwayes iuste. These wordes declare, that our willes are sometimes styred bype of God, not onely in toylaking or permitting vs, but also by some inclination on to euill thynges. Julianus Pelagianus also (as the same Augustine agaynst him in hys 5. booke and 3. chap. sayth) reproveth Augustine, because he had read, that the same Augustine affirmed, that God is wonte to punishe sinnes by sinnes. And he sayth: If the matter were thus, then ought we to prayse and commend concupiscence and sinnes, as good thynges, which than affirmest to bee inflicted upon vs as punishments. But there, agaynst hym are brought forth many notable places of Scripture, by which is proued, that God byngeth in sinnes, as punishments, and paynes deserued. We can not denie, but that the deuill in tempting, pouereth in to vs wicked cogitations: and that he receaueth power of God so to do. God styred by Dauid to number the people, as it is written in the 2. booke of Samuel the 24. chapter. But in the booke of Chronicles, Sathan is sayd to haue moued Dauid vnto it. And it skilleth not, whether God ddo it by hym selfe, or by the deuill: for it is all one. In the 1. booke of Kinges, God would haue Achab the king deceaued by a lying spirite, that hee shoulde geue credite vnto false prophetes: which without doubt was sinne. And in Esaie the 63. chap. it is written: Wherefore haste thou made vs to erre, and haste hardened our hartes that we should not feare thee? And in the 11. chap. of Iosua: God hardened the hartes of the vnbelieving Gentiles. And in that Roboam harkened not vnto the elders, which gaue him good admonition, that was therefore, because the conuersion was of the Lorde, to performe hys worde, which hee spake of hym by the hand of the Prophet. And in the 2. Paralip: the 25. chapter: Amasias king of Iudah harkened not vnto Ioas king of Israell, because God had so wrought in hym, to deliuer hym into hys handes. And in Ezechiel the 14. chap: If a Prophet bee deceaued, I haue deceaued hym. Also, in the Lordes prayer we praye: Lead vs not into temptation. These thynges in a manner alleageth Augustine: wherby appeareth, that God deliuereth the wicked vnto theyr owne lustes, not onely by permission, but also by a certayne incitation. But agaynst these sentences, Julianus seemed to obiecte thre thynges: First, that lustes are (as I sayd at the beginning) to be praysed, for that they are sayd to be punishments inflicted of God. Further, as touching this place, it is manifest tynough (sayd he) what Paulus meaning is. For in that he sayth, that they were deliuered by vnto their lustes, it appeareth, that they were before infected with them, and that they had them before within them selues: and that God to deliuer by, is no thyng els then to permitte. Thyrddly he sayth, that God is sayd to deliuer, rather by a certayne patience, or suffering, then by power. God in dede suffreth these thynges to be done: but he doth not by hys power and myght driue them to doe them. To these thynges, Augustine in the same chapter maketh aunswere, and sayth, that it is a very weake argument, that sinnes should therefore be prayse worthy, because God by them doth sometimes punishe vs. Otherwyse we should commend the deuill also, whose bondslaues we are made through sinne, and of hym are greuoulye afflicted. For he is the tormentour of God, and the executioner of the deuine vengeance. Moreouer we read, that Saul was geuen of God to be kyng, in Gods furpe and wrath, to auenge the wantonnes and rebellion of the people, by the tyrannie of a wicked kyng. And yet is not an vngodly kyng therefore to be commended or praysed. These thynges and such lyke, do plainly declare the weakenes of that argument. And as touching that which was sayd in the second place, that the wordes of the Apostle, which we are here in hand with, carye with them theyr exposition (for they are sayd to be deliuered by vnto the lustes of theyr owne hart. Wherefore they had them within them before, and God wrought them not within them: but for that they were before extant, he deliuered them by vnto them, to be set a fire of them) we graunt in dede, that the powers and faculties of lusting, are naturally grafted in man. And God was the author of them, when he created man. But God made them moderate, and such which should be subiecte vnto reason, and obedient vnto the worde of God:

and not be rebellious, eyther agaynst hym or agaynst reason. But after tyme, they became stubborne, violent, and rebellious. Wherefore it is plaine, that that is false which thys man sayth, that suche lustes as we are now deliuered by vnto for to be punished withall, were extant in vs before sinne. They are vndoubted, Ipe Iarlar harang, that is, an euill workmanship or imagination, wherewith our hart is perpetually enfebled. But this euill imagination was not geuen of God in the creation, but followed after sinne. And agaynst that whiche was lastly alleaged, namely, that these things are done rather by the patience or sufferance of God, then by his power, Augustine declareth by the words of Paul that either of them is true: for to the Romanes it is written: Euen so God, willing to shew his wrath, and to make his power knowne, suffered with long patience the vessels of wrath ordeyned to damnation. In these wordes is expresse mencion, as well of power as of patience. And although in that 3. chapter of the 5. booke agaynst Iulianus, Augustine sayth, that he greatly passeth not, together of these wayes these kinde of speeches be expounded, yet enclineth he more to my sentence, to thinke, that God wylleth something els, when he deliuereth, hardeneth, or blyndeth, then that he suffereth, permitteyth or forsaketh. Yea, he manifestly writeth that it is not likely, but that, eue as God whē he punisheth, worketh something in our bodies: so also should we thinke that he worketh something in the mindes, although after a secrete maner. And thus much hitherto of the Fathers. If my iudgement therein should be demaunded, I would say, that these kyndes of speache, To deliuer by, to blinden, to harden, and to seduce, do signify somethyng more then to be forsake of God, or withdrawing of grace, which hapneth through sin, and which all men confesse. For we can not deny, but that of God are offered many occasions, which in men that are destitute of grace and of the holy ghost, seeme to stirre by euill lusts: & to be vnto the occasion of falling, as it is manifest of y vngodly king Achab, vnto whō the words of the false prophetes wer as a snare. And the words of God pronounced vnto Pharao by Moses, wer instrumēt of his greater hardening. And the aduersities, whiche happened vnto the Israelites in the desert, were occasions both of blasphemye, and also of infidelity. And that God ministred such occasions, it is out of controuersye. Whiche occasions, when they light vpon a godly mynde, and one that is adorne with the grace of God, they turne vnto good, and are profitable for theyr saluation. But when they happen vpon those, which are forsaken of God, they cause a greater fall, and a greater turning away from God. And such occasions happen both outwardly, and also inwardly. For not only persecutions, aduersities, pleasures, and entismentes do outwardly offer themselves vnto vs, but also cogitations, and inward motions are suggested vnto the mynde, which to the godly are profitable to saluation: but the wicked they do more and more confyrme in impiety. Besides these occasions, such as are already alienated from God seme not to nede any other preparation to sinne. For by reason of our corrupt nature we are prone inough vnto it of our selues. Wherefore Paul, in this Epistle to the Romanes, sayth, that these vessels of wrath are prepared and apt to destruction. And in the booke of Genesis, Our cogitations and counsels are prone vnto euill euen from our childehode. But to make the thing more playne, being otherwise somewhat darke, it shalbe good to marke, that sinne comprehendeth two thinges, Action, and a defect or want. For, that action is called sinne, which wanteth of the law and of such conditions and circumstances, which should make it byrght and commendable. If we speake of the action, in that it is extant, and is counted among naturall creatures, it is not to be doubted but that it is done of God. But the defect or want (so far as it pertaineth to p[er]uersion, neyther is in very deepe extant) hath no nede of any efficient cause: but it sufficeth, that the grace of the holy ghost be remoued, and our strengthes taken away, by whiche that action myght haue bene brought to a iust perfection. And who can deny, but that this withdrawing of strengthes and grace is done of God: For he is the moderator

Sinne comprehendeth two things

It is God which with draweth his grace from sinners.

rator of hys owne gistes. But we must alwayes adde this, that God doth iustly and for our euill desertes withhold hys ayde. And as Anselmus writeth, in his booke, of the fall of the deuill: Euen as we are not afrayd to confesse, that that creature is made of God, which yet is brought forth through the wicked will of man (for we say that God is the Creator of an infant borne of adultery) why also shall we deny, but that he is the author of that action, which is brought forth through an euill will? And this must we without all controuersy graunt, that whatsoeuer is extant in the nature of thinges, the same must of necessitie haue God for hys author. Therefore it followeth, that these thinges are done of God, not only by permission, but also his might and power thereunto helpeth, and (as they say) worketh with all. Otherwise that thing should be nothing. For whereas they talke of permission, I would say the know of them, whether God permitteth willingly, or not willingly? If thou say not willingly, then shall it followe, that God permitteth it agaynst hys will, and by compulsion. But if thou say, that he doth it willingly, because he made all thinges, whatsoeuer he would, it can not be auoyded, but that the will of God after some maner concurrereth to the producing of sinne. But this thing ought we alwayes to haue before our eyes, that one & the selfe same thinge, as it proceedeth from vs, is sinne: but, as it is of God, it is no sinne. Therefore if in thys question we should answer simplye, we ought to say, that God is not the cause of sinne, in that it is sinne. Because he (as we haue alreedy often sayde) inflicteth those thinges, which in vs are sinnes, as punishmentes, and withholdeth his grace from such as haue deserved euill, and oftentimes ministrereth vnto them occasions of falling, to the ende they should iustly be punished. And if thou wilt demanda, whether a man endued with grace, and not forsaken of God, can fall, I would answer, that the grace of God is not alwayes after one and the self same maner. For sometymes, by the iust iudgement of God, it is more remisse, and by it our hart and mynde are not so strongly, and with such efficacy chaunged. And then a man may fall, and often tymes committe greuous sinnes. But when it is of efficacy, and mighty, and when it fully beareth dominion in our hartes, it preserveth vs from the greuouser sort of sinnes, so much as in this life is possible. But to returne to that which we were in hand with, we can not deny but that God after a sort is the cause of sinne, whether we consider the action, which is naturall, or the taking away of strengthes and grace: although that happen not but through our fault. For so sayd Oscar: Thy perdition or destruction commeth of thee O Israell, but thy saluation commeth from me. Therefore, when it is sayd that God is the cause of sinne, we must graunt, that not to be spoken properly: forasmuch, as we haue in our selues sufficient cause of sinne. And although we cauel neuer so much of other sinnes, yet what shall we say of Originall sinne? Undoubtedly, there is none which doubteth, but that it is inflicted to vs of God for the auengement and punishment of the first fall. And we are so bozne with it, that it can not be sayd, that we draw it by any other proper sinne before committed of vs. But in these thynges we must deale moderately, and in a Christian assembly we must speake warily. For if a man streight way shall absolutely and simply say, that God is the cause of sinne, he shall not say true: and the thyng not being well vnderstoode, will cause many to be offended, and men will excuse theyr wycked actes, and go about to lay the cause of them vpon God. The matter may be declared by partes, and the truth may in such maner be spoken, that all maner of offence may be auoyded. But, which is the best way thus to deale, we haue alreedy shewed. A great many heretofore haue erred in thys matter. The Maniches, for that they woulde not make the almighty God the author of sinne, because they perceiued the Scriptures to be repugnant vnto theyr sentence, appoynted two beginninges, and framed vnto themselves two Gods, one good, and an other euill: one of the old Testament, and an other of the new, one the Creator of thys visible worlde, an other the father of our Lorde Iesus

God permitteth not against his will, but willingly.

Whether a man endued with the grace of God, can fall into sin. The grace of God is not alwayes of one and the selfe same efficacy.

It must be answered by partes.

Christ. They thoughte that by this meanes they could concillate those thynges which are euery where witten in the holy scriptures. The good God, they beterly denied to be the cause of sin. But the authoz of it they made the god of this worlde, whome they pronounced to be euill. They abused a place of the latter epistle to the Corinthians, where it is sayd: In whome the God of this world hath blindded the hartes of the vnbeleuers. Behold, sayd they, to make blynde pertayneth not not in any case vnto the good God, but vnto the God of this worlde. But thys place nothinge helpeth them. For we may thus vnderstande it, that God hath blynded the hartes of the vnbeleuers, which are sayd to be of this worlde. And after this maner doth Augustine read it. Farther peradventure by it, is signified the Deuill, whome Christ, and also Paule calleth the prince of thys worlde, with his fellowes, powers, aduersaries vnto vs, & the goneruers of this worlde and of darkenes. Neyther is it any meruayle, if he be called a God: for so was he counted and worshipped of the infidels. For the Scripture blesch sometymes to name thynges, not as they are, but as they are counted. Whereouer, there is no cause why, but that we may vnderstande by the God of thys worlde, the true God, which hath created this worlde, that is, thys visibill worlde: and the self same God is the father of our Lorde Jesus Christ. Neyther is it a thyng vnseemly for hym, to blinden the hartes of the vnbeleuers: when as Paule in this place saith: that he deliuered them by both vnto theyr owne lustes, and also into a reprobate mynde. Yea and Christ also sayth of hymself, that he came into iudgement: that they which saw, should be made blynde: and they which were blynde, should see.
But vnto those thynges which we haue now spoken of, as touchyng occasions, namely, that God sometimes ministrerth suche occasions, by whiche men destitute of grace and the holpe Ghoste, are stirred vpp to sinne, a place of James seemeth to be repugnaunte, who in hys i. chapter writeth thus: God tempteth not to euill. And yet we cannot deny, but that the scriptures sometymes testefye, that God tempted the Israelites, Abraham, and others. Augustine de consensu Euangelistarum, deuidenth temptations into two kyndes. Namely, that some are to proue, and other some to deceaue. And he graunteth, that God sometimes temp-teth to proue, but neuer to deceiue. But this distinction seemeth not to be sufficient. For one and the selfe same temptation, when it lighteth vppon a godlye man, profiteth to trye hym wryth all. But if it happen to an vngodlye person, and one that is destitute of grace, it serueth to seduce him. As in the desert the temptacions, as touching Moses, Aaron, Iosua, and Chaleb, were probations and trials: but vnto others, they were prouokementes vnto sinne. And yet it sufficiently appeareth, that God was the authoz of them. Wherefore, laping a part Augustines distinction, there is an other which is more allowable, which is read in the Greeke Scholies: namely, that there are certayne temptations vtterly outward: whose beginning or cause we haue not in our selues: as aduersities and persecutions: but there are other temptations, which seeme to burst forth out of the lustes of our mynde. And of thys kinde of temptation, say they the Apostle James admonisheth vs, that we should not make God the authoz of them. Which must so be vnderstanded, that we ought not in such maner to appoynt God the authoz of them, thereby to excuse our selues. And that thys is the Apostles meaning, those thynges which go before do well declare. Let no man (sayth he) when he is tempted, say, that he is tempted of God, as though he woulde excuse hys sinne. For euery man is tempted of his owne lustes. Wherefore he willet vs to acknowledge in our selues the originall beginning of euill: and not to lay the fault vpon God. But yet he nothing prohibiteth, but that God may be sayd by hys iust iudgement sometimes to ministrer vnto these lustes which are grafted in our corrupt nature, occasions and prouokementes, as well inwardly in our myndes, as outwardly. But we oughte to accuse the grounde, whiche wee haue in our selues: and not to laye that for an excuse, whiche is ministered by God. Further, this is to be added, that we can not deny, but that the

of originall sinne are inflicted vpon vs, to auenge the fall of the first parentes, with which lusses every one of vs is tempted. These lusses, vnto which those that are idolaters are deliuered by to be punished, maye be deuised into two kindes: so that some lusses cometh that which seemeth good, and other some, vnto a way that, which is thought to be euill. And although it may seeme, that these affections were grafted in man by nature, yet were they not such at the beginning, when man was created, as now they are. But (as I haue already sayd) they were grafted moderate, and such as shoulde obey reason: but now they are vnbridled, and they resist reason and the woꝛde of God. Wherefoze when the Stoikes saw this corruption of them, they gaue iudgement, that their wise man shoulde be vnterly free from all affections and passions, because, as the matter goeth now, they thought that wisdom could neuer agree with affections. For affections alwayes appeared vnto them to be subiect vnto vice and sinne. But the Peripatetians iudgement was, that the wise man ought not to be vnterly without affections: but they allowed those that were moderate. And being demaunded, how these lusses shoulde be kept in a meane, they sayd, that there is a mediocrity prescribed of reason. And they added mozeouer, that this right reason, which shoulde be iudge of this mediocrity, longeth to a wise man. But they were not able to shew who this wise man was, which shoulde perfectly despise of this meane, Wherefoze the Christians, which deferre this iudgement vnto the woꝛd of God, do nothing at all erre: sithen they haue most sure rules taken out of the holy scriptures, by which are most manifestly defined, what thinges are to be desired, and what to be refused. There are two thinges vndoubtedly which amend, vitiate, and corrupt lusses. One is, that whether we eate or drinke or do any thinge els, we do all thinges vnto the glory of God. Which thing neither Aristotle nor Plato, nor any of the wise men of this woꝛld had taught, as Paule hath done. Further, soasmuch as it is agreed of the end, we must beware, that our woꝛke be not defiled other with defect or wante of affections, or els with excelle of them. And in summe, these appetites, so farfoꝛth as God hath grafted them in our nature, oughte not to be accused: but as we now haue them they are not without fault.

To vncleannes, with ignominye to defyle their owne bodies amonge themselves. The commentaries whiche are ascribed vnto Hierome, affirme that this ignominy or dishonour is to be referred, vnto the filthines, and vnpurenes whiche the Ethnikes committed in their sacrifices. And they expound the ignominy or dishonour of the bodies to be burninges and markes, with which the bodies of those whiche were initiated and dedicated to Images, were defyled. But these thinges are farre wide from the truth: and the Apostle by those thinges which follow, doth manifestly declare, what his meaning is. For he referreth all thinges to vnnaturall carnall pleasure. Those thinges are called vncleane, whose sight we can not abide, as in naturall thinges, is matter or corruption that cometh out of a soze, and dongue, and such like: and as is, as touching humane woꝛkes, glotony, drunkennes, especially when vomiting followeth, also lechery, especially that which is agaynst nature. Hereof he writeth vnto the Romanes, that that nation, and all other nations, when they were without Christ, were wonderfull infected with this pestilent vice. Neyther is this obscure, that he addeth. To defile their owne bodies with ignominy. For if he which committeth fornication, sinneth agaynst his owne body, much moze he which is defiled with this kynde of wickednes. Our bodies are the temple of the holy ghost, organes of God, and instrumentes sanctified.

Wherefoze they which contaminate or defile them, do exceedingly stray from the institution of God. And this happeneth vnto them, which departe from the true woꝛshiping of God. Vnto the Ephesians it is written of the Gentiles that be straungers from Christ. Howe that they walke in the vanitye of the mynde, hauyng their mynde darkened, and that they are alienated from the lyfe of God by reason of the ignorance ignorance which is in thē, & blyndenes of hart. Who, after that they came once to this point, that they ceased to be soj: gane themselves to wantonnes, with a greedy desire to commit all maner of vncleannes. It might at the first sight seme, that Paul speaketh vnreuerent and filthy thinges. But we must remember, that Vnto the cleane, all thinges are cleane: & the holy Ghost vseth, when he speaketh of the elect, very freely to reprove wicked and most filthy actes. In h Prophetes, and especially in Ezechiel, is mencion made of the Synagog, as of an harlot, which openeth her knees to all that come, and whose filthy lust was so great, that with reward she hired louers, which had the fleshe of asses, and the sure of horses. The holy ghost abhorred not from these kindes of speech. And yet thys letteth not, but that h wordes of God, are wordes most chaste. For wordes otherwyle of they: owne nature are indifferente: it is our luste that maketh them vile and filthy. Nowbeit Paul semeth somtymes somewhat to fauour the eares of the hearers, when vnto the Ephesians, by one word only he noteth these filthines of the Ethnikes, saying: It is filthy to declare the things which are committed of them in secrete. But Chrysostome sayth, h the Apostle in thys place tempereth hys speache betwene two great daungers. For on the one syde, soasmuch as it behoued that these men should in such sort be reproved, that they should not be able to deny their filthines (which thyng peraduenture had bene hard to be done if he had layd befoze them faultes not very greuous) it was necessarye, that he should most openly reprove those crimes, which euery man cōfessed to be most filthy. On the other syde some reuerence was to be had vnto the readers & hearers. Wherefoze, he did with a wonderful prudence order his wordes. For in making mention of nature, he reprovethe them, for that they were not content wth the vse of nature, but by their filthy lust, committed violence against their owne nature. He vseth also some sharpenes of wordes, when he sayth: that they burnt, & defiled they: bodies wth contumelies and dishonour, & that they fell into vncleannes and impurenes. All these thinges haue a wonderfull strength to moue the hartes of the readers. Ambrose demaundeth, howe these thynges shoulde be counted a punishment, which were vnto them great pleasures: when as contrariwise this semeth to be the nature of punishments, to be displeasunt, and to be vrged vpon men euen by compulsion and against they: willes. He answereth that this is to be ascribed vnto the goodnes of God, whiche woulde not punish these men moze greuously. But this semeth not to make much to Paul's purpose. For that he by the bitterness of the punishment ment to increase the greuousnes of the sinne. Wherefoze Chrysostomes iudgement herein sitteth better: for he sayth: that it is the greatest euill that can be, when a man reioyceth in hys owne hurtes, for if a man when he is sick, fele great grieve and payne, & phisitions dispayre not of hym. But when he cometh once to that poynte, that he feleth no payne nor grieve, then is he in a maner past all hope of recouerye. And madde folkes whē they teare themselves, and fare full ill wth themselves, are glad in so doyng, & miserably reioyce, when they eate dongue, stones, or coales, or beray themselves with dirt or filthy thinges. And yet doth not they: mythe make the calamity any thing the easier. So lykewyle are these men no lesse punished wth thys deformity of sinne: nor wth standyng, they seme to delight themselves therein. Paul coulde vndoubtedly haue vpbayded vnto them other vices. But those had not bene so full of shame, nor so apte to declare the calamity of the vnbeleuers.

uous euill,

Why h dois are called a lye.

VVhiche haue chaunged his truth for a lye.] He agayne repeteth, that the cause of so greate a punishment was idolatrye. By truth he meaneth the selfe felte same thynges whiche before he noted by glozpe. And he calleth idols a lye. Because they wente aboute to take awaye from woode and stoncs that whiche they were: for that they no moze counted them woode nor stoncs: And attributed vnto them that which they were not: deuine powers (I say) and the nature of God. And whē he sayth of God, which is to be prayfed for euer. He endeth his sentence with an excellent acclamation, which selfe thing he doth also when he writeth of Christ in the 9. chap. that he is God aboue all thynges to be prayfed for euer, Amen. Wherefore seyng he pronounce th one and the selfe same thing both of the father, and also of the sonne, he manifestly declareth, that the sonne is equall wyth the father. And Chrysostome affirmeth, that this particule was therfore added, to the end we should vnderstand, that the enterpryse of these men had no good successe. For although they assayed to robbe God of his glozpe, and to change hys truth, yet would they, or would they not, he remayneth God to be prayfed for euer, Amen. Neyther did he therfore in suche sort take vengeance vpon them, to deliuer them by into a reprobate sence, as though he could not other wise cast them from hym. Their impiety was no let or hurt vnto him: they were their owne destruction: But because the Ethenikes are accused for the woꝛshipping of images, it shall not be from the purpose, somewhat to speake bꝛiefely as touchyng images. First we will speake of them whiche go about to resemble God by images: after ward we will touche somewhat of the Images of thynges which are coꝛpoꝛall: and then whither they may be had in temples & in holy places: lastly whether there may be any good vse of them at all. And as touchyng the first, there is an expresse commaundement in Deut. that God should not be poꝛtured by any images. And hereof he geueth a reason, because when he spake vnto them in Horeb, the people sawe there no image. The Prophetes also haue very often inculcated thys thyng: and especially Esay from the 40. cha. vnto the 45. entreateth in a manner of nothyng els. And Paule in the actes of the Apostles, when he preached to the men of Athenes, sayde that men are of the generation of God: but the nature of God hath no similitude, with stoncs, golde, or siluer. Farther, seyng no man hath sene God at any tyme, how shall any mā attempt to make his lyknes? He is infinite and can not be comprehended in mynd, and much lesse in sence. Wherefore they which either painte or make his picture, do dishonour hys nature: as though it can be limited with lynes & colours. And in the olde law the mercy seat in the middle part, which resembled the seat of God, was empty, to the ende occasion should not be geuen of making the nature of God in formes and images. For the representing of him by an image sprang first of infidelitie, because the reason of men could not perswade it selfe, that God was present, vnlesse it were manifest by some signe or image. Which thinge the Hebrewes plainly declared, when in the wilderness they sayde vnto Aaron: Make vnto vs Gods, which may go before vs.

But they object agaynst vs, That soasmuch as God is oftentimes diuersly described in the Prophetes, why in such sort may he not also be paynted? Especially seyng scripture or writyng differeth very little from payntyng. Esay saith that he sawe the Lord sittynge vpon an hygh seat, and exalted &c. How commeth it then to passe that the paynter may not set forth God in forme of a iudge or king. He is described in Daniell the 7. chap: like an olde aged man of person, vnto whome the sonne of man was brought. What offence then shall it be for the paynter, if he only by lynes and colours sheweth that, which the Prophete expꝛesseth by woꝛdes and writynges? In dede this argument semeth to haue a goodly shew: but it concludeth not that which it intendeth. For where the precept of God begeth, there reasonynges and such like can not perswade, nor conuince to cause vs to do other wise. And though there seme to be some comparison betwene those thynges which are prohibited, and those thynges whiche are permitted, yet oughte we neuer to take vppon vs to make those thynges a lyke, betwene which the woꝛde of God hath put a difference. or bayne disputations and reasonings, which haue ingendred superstitions, & brought in idolatry. And though there were none other thyng to aunswere, yet were this sufficient. Howbeit, we coulde put a difference betwene writing and paynting: that although in the holy Scriptures there are set forth the one or two similitudes of G D D, there is yet in the same place expounded and declared what is the meanyng of them. And yf a man reade farther, he shall at the length fynde that God is a spirite, infinite, and whiche filleth heauen and earth. Which thyng paynting teacheth not, neyther doth it declare it selfe: wherfore it should easely at the length bring men into errors, and make them to be of that minde, to thinke that God is like a man. Augustine also in his little booke De fide & Simbolo, the 7. chap: And yet (sayth he) must we not therefore thinke, that God the father is circumscribed, as it were with the forme or shape of a man: that when we thinke of him, we should conceaue in our minds that he hath a right or left side, or for that the Father is sayd to sitte, we should therefore thinke, that he doth it with bowing of his knees: least we fall into that sacriledge, for which the Apostle execrateth those which changed the glory of the incorruptible God into the likenes of a corruptible man. For, all Christian to erect vnto God such an image & to place it in a temple, it is wicked: & much more wicked is it to place such a one in the hart. Now resteth to consider touching Images which represent corporall things: as Christ, the Apostles & holy histories. Undoubtedly, as touching the nature of these things, ther is no cause, but that they may be resembled by signs and pictures. Neither are the arts of grauing, caruing or molting, or painting at any time forbidden by the commandement of God. Augustine affirmeth, that the beginninge of Images, came of the desire whiche men bare towards the deade. For when men tooke it vnpaciently, by death to be bereft of them whom they dearely loued, they desired at the least to solace themselves with the images of them. Which pretence (as shall after-ward be declared) the deuill abused to idolatry. And by this meanes the Images of the elders were kept: and that was counted an honour vnto the dead, and brought some solace or comfort vnto theyr friends. It is written of Alexander Emperour of Rome the sonne of Mannea, that he had in his Temple the Images of Christ, of Moses, and of Abraham. The Turkes haue no Images at all, neyther publike, nor priuate: In carpets they weue knots & small flowers, and certayne other thinges: but neuer any perfect Images. Which Images yet if they be had without worshipping: and that out of Churches, can not be condemned: so that they be rightly bled and not worshipped. Wherefore Marcellina, is iustly condemned: which woman Augustine, in his booke de haeresibus, ad Quodvult Deum, sayth, was a fellowe companion of Carpocrates, and had the Images of Christ, of Paul, of Homere, and of Pithagoras, which she both worshipped, & also offered incense vnto: which thing only was to be condemned. Other wise to haue images, was not among the elders counted worthy of reprove. Eusebius Cesariensis affirmeth, that he saw the Images of Peter and Paul, which certayne of the saythfull kept by them. And he telleth, that in Cesarea Phillippi, which was called Panias, was a Image of Christ made of copper, at whose fete lay prostrate an other Image of that woman, whiche by touching the hem of his garment was healed of her flux of blood. And he sayth moreover, that vnderneath it sprang by a certayne herbe, whiche when it grew so high, that it came to the hem of the garment of the image of Christ, gate thereby such power that it healed all maner of diseases. And Socrates in his 7. booke of the Tripartite history writeth, that Julianus the Apostate remoued this Image, and commanded his owne Image to be put in the place thereof: whiche was so stricken with lightning, that it was utterly destroyed. And although that Image of Christ was by the Ethnikes drawn throughout the whole world, yet it was by the Christians after a sort gathered together again, & reserued. Eusebius writeth also of our Lord Iesus Christ: that he sent his owne Image by his disciple vnto king Abagarus: but soasmuch as this is Apocriphall, I can not easily ly be perswaded, that it is true. But let vs see whether these Images of Christ and of Saintes may be had in holy places, where the saythfull assemble together, or whether rather they be forbidden. There were certayne of the Ethnikes which as touching this thing had no very ill iudgement. Numa Pompilius (as Plutarch declareth in his lyfe,) erected no kynde of Images in holy Temples. And so continued it at Rome for the space of 150. yeares. That king had learned Pythagoras sentence. Who taught, that God is a mynde and a spirite, and utterly toke from him the nature of a body. Wherefore these men were of this mynde, that they thought it a thing most unworthy, to represent a more noble nature by viler thinges. Although by the verity of the history, it is certayne, that Numa was before Pythagoras, neyther could he learne thys of hym. But how soeuer it be, we may inferre, that that thing which they repelled out of their Temples, ought we much more to banishe from ours. For those thinges which are there set forth, may withdraue the mynde from the wordes of God. For our mynde is of such condition, that it is so vehemently withdrawen by those thinges which are offered vnto the senses, that it can not attentively applye it selfe vnto other thinges. Wherefore the Lacedemonians gaue straight charge that in the court, wherein the Senate was kept, there shoulde stand no signes or Images: for that it behoueth: that they which decide affaires concerning a publike welch, should not be plucked away to other matters by any occasion. And Virgill in his first booke of Eneas writeth, that when Eneas entred into the Temple where Dido was, and beheld the pictures on the walles, he gaue his mynde wholly to the contemplation of them. Furthermore it cometh to passe (as sayth Augustine vpon the 113. Psalm, in his 2. Sermon) that much honoꝝ and maiesty is gotten vnto Images, when they are placed in Temples. Because partly thorough the worthynes of the place, and partly by reason of the authority of such as dedicate them, men beginne to conceaue, that there lieth hidden in them some deuine vertue. And although this be of some force to enstraine them, namely, that they see, that they with theyꝝ eares cannot heare, neyther can they with the mouth speake, nor with the eyes see, nor dō any office at all pertaining to life: yet are they deceaued by reason of the holy seruices which they see done vnto them, and also because of the honours which they perceaue to be geue vnto them: so that now they beleue, that in steede of life, there is grafted in them a deuine power. And that they so thinke, it is by this manifest, for that they in such manner humble themselves vnto Images. But for that they are afrayde to confesse, that some deuine power lieth hidden in the Images, they say that they worship that which is represented by those Images, that is, the sea, the earth, or the heauen.

And if a man goe on, and still reprove them, saying: that these bodyes also are not of that worthynes, eyther to be worshipped, or to be honoꝝed, they will answere, that in their mynde they haue a respect vnto hym, which hath the dominion ouer all these thinges: that is, vnto God only, by whome all these thinges are governed. Wherefore we ought in any wise to beware, that a holy place do not so much encrease the estimation of Images, that it become a most certayne occasion of idolatry. The deuill will easily adioyne himselfe vnto them. For he is proud & deceitfull. Wherefore he will soone deceaue men, & draw vnto himselfe those worshippinges which are due vnto God only, whē he includeth himselfe in these erected Images in steade of a soule, or a deuine power. And according to the desertes of the sinnes of men, he deludeth our sightes. There is a saying, that at Rome in the Church of Laterane, appeared an Image of our Saviour paynted vpon a wall. Of the verity of which history I am not so certayne, that I dare fully affirme it to be true. But graunt that thys kynde of miracle happened, and other miracles parauenture more notable: yet ought we not for them to be pulled backe from the true worshipping of God. But agaynst them we must fence our selues with the oracles of God. It is true in deede, that Gregory the great (as we reade in his epistles) reproved the bishop of Massilia for that he had broken to peeces an Image in his Temple. But in this case the authoritie of the reprover ought not to blinde our eyes: but rather we must marke, whether he did by iust authority confirme that which he reproheth. Undoubtedly, we are so prone unto idolatry, that the saythfull thought it necessary, that Images should utterly be abolished out of Temples. For who is he, that perceiving himselfe to be given unto filthy lust, will willingly keepe company with a harlot. In doing so, shall not he be thought to tempte God? Even so to haue Images, where holy seruices are done, where there is adoration vnto God, and where the saythfull assemble together about gods affaires, can not be but a thing most perillous. They alleadge agaynst vs, that God had by the sides of the arke of the covenant two Cherubines. But they should therunto haue added, that those were not open vnto the sightes of the people. For they were put into the entrance, which was called Sancta factorum, into which the high priest only entred, and that only once in a whole yeare. Further, they had the word of God, which commanded such things to be made: which selfe same word is agaynst other Images. Neyther is it lawfull for vs to vse those things, which were lawfull in the ceremonies of Moses. Otherwile let vs appoint in this realm, or in this prouince, but one Temple only, as it was among the Hebrewes: and let vs take agayne all those thinges, which at that tyme pertayned vnto offeringes, and to the furniture of sacrifices.

What the blage of the olde church was as touchyng images, Epiphanius declareth, who dyd rent in sonder the image of a man, which hong in the place of prayer: And wrote an epistle vnto the bishop of Ierusalem, in whose dioces he dyd this thyng, that from that tyme forthward he should not permit any such thyngs to be done in his church: so much, as they were not agreeable with Christiā religion and discipline. And this epistle of Epiphanius, as a thyng very worthy to be knowne, Ierome turned into Latine. By the translation wherof, it appeareth, that he was of Epiphanius opinion. Yea and in the counsell of Eliberinum it was decreed in the 36. article, that no pictures should be painted on the walles of Churches. And vnder Leo Isauricus, which was an Emperour of Rome, there was a Counsell had at Constantinople, wherein images were condemned, & broken to peeces, and consumed with fire: although Irene which afterward reigned with her sonne Constantine, thorough the suggestion of Tharasius Patriarche of Constantinople, called the second Counsell of Nice, which is commonly named the 7. Counsell, in which images were restored, and also the worshippyng of them. But by what frivolous & fond reasons they did this, I am ashamed now to declare. It is true that Charles the great about the same time called a Counsell in Germany, vnto which assembled also two legates of the bishop of Rome: where the decrees of Nice touchyng images were abrogated. And yet notwithstanding, I know not by what meanes, that toke place which was decreed by Irene and Constantine in the seventh Synode.

I know that Iohannes Damascenus, in the tyme of Leo Isauricus, fought hard for Images, and had much trouble about them. And he telleth a miracle, whereby to confirme images. But he bringeth no reasons out of the scriptures. And as for myracles, they ought not to moue vs, to resist the worde of God. The brazen serpent was ouerthrowen of kynge Ezechias, which yet was erected by the commaundement of God, and approued by wonderful great miracles. For as many as looked vpon it were healed. Our temples are not therefore built, that we should in them behold pictures. But in them is ministered the worde of God, the sacramentes are given, and denyne prayes are celebrated. All which thinges far excell all maner of images. And he which is not perswaded by this kynde of doctrine, shall nothyng at all profite by pictures. A man will say peradventure, that in Churches these thinges are not alwayes had which we now speake of: for sometymes there is no teaching, neyther are the sacramentes ministered, neyther ther are the sacramentes ministred, neither is there had any holy assembly. I graunt this to be true: but yet the temples ought to be shut, when these christian exercises are not in doynge. Otherwyle, they are open for men to walke by and downe and to be occupied about trifles. And of how small force their excuses be, which they bring for images, hereby appeareth, in that they alwayes say: that these images are the booke of idiots and of the laitie. But how chaunceth it then, that the images of highest estimation, vnto which were instituted pilgrimages, and which were had in greatest reuerence and honour, were kept close: so that none could see them, but for money? Why should the booke be kept shut, by which they would haue men to be taught? Farther, a man may see certayne images euen of one and the selfe same kynde and person, neglected and contemned: and other of them, contrariwyle laden aboue measure with honours. They haue peradventure, the image of the Virgin at home, or in the streate, or els in the market place, which yet they forsake, and go on pilgrimage into Boleyne, or into Italy, an other image of the selfe same. Undoubtedlye, if they desire by them to be taught, the image at home could haue taught them euen as well as the image in a strange place. We see moreouer, that then the vse of images chiefly flourished, when pastours of Churches ceased from feeding their flocke with holpe sermons: as though they went to deliuer the people committed to their charge, to be instructed by domine images. Wherefore, my opinion is, that images oughte vtterly to be remoued out of holy temples. But in other places there may be some vse of them. At the least, they may bring an honest pleasure, which may haue some vtilitie ioyned with it, yf they represent those thinges which are monumentes and examples of pietie. But they are in no case to be suffered, no not in other places also, if they shoulde become occasions of Idolatrye. For then must we alwayes imitate Ezechias. Neither ought we at any tyme to attribute more vnto them, then vnto the holpe scriptures. For who falleth downe vpon his knees, and worshippeth the booke eyther of the new Testament or of the olde? None undoubtedly, which is godly wise. And yet in them both, Christ and also the workes of God are more truly and expessedly set forth vnto vs to contemplate, then they are in all the images of the world. Neither is this to be passed ouer, that the maner of hauing of images came vnto vs rather from the Ethnikes, then from the practise of holy men. And also if we haue images priuately, two other thinges also ought diligently to be taken hede of. First, that they be not lying images, so that vnder the title and name of sayntes, they represent not those which neuer were extant. Suche as are the signes of George, of Christopher, of Barbara, & of such lyke, which are by images & pictures obtruded as sayntes, when as there is nothyng sound, of certainty touching them. Howbeit, I deny not, but that some thinges may sometimes be painted, which may by an allegoricall signification profitably enstrucke the beholders. Farther, we must beware that the pictures or tables be not filthy or wanton, wherewith to delyght our selues, lest by the syght of them, should be prouoked filthy lustes. Now resteth that we speake somewhat of the breaking of Images. In which thing I will content my selfe wth the testimony of Augustine: who in his sermons, and especially in his first sermon, hath these wordes: So God performe, and geue all thynges into thy power: as he hath geuen that which is broken. This we say to you good brethren, that ye do not these thynges, when they are not in your power to do them. It is the maner of wycked men, and of tauerne haunters, there to rage where they haue no power, and without cause to thrust themselves hedlong into danger of death. Ye haue heard the thinges which we red vnto you all, when ye of late lyled in cotages and losely. When the land was geuen into your power. First, Moses sayth: that the land shall be geuen into their power: and so he tolde them, what they should then doo: Namely, ye shal destroy theyr altars, groues, images, &c. When ye haue receaued power, then do ye these thynges. Where power is not geuen vs, there we do not these thynges, but where it is geuen, we omiste them not. Many Paganes or infidels haue these abhominations.

Against the which say that images are the booke of idiots or of the vnderne.

raions in their fieldes, do we come and breake them? No doubtles, for first we labour to breake the idoles in their hartes, when they also are become Christians, or do inuise vs to so good a worke, or do preuent vs. Now then we must praye for them, and not be angry with them. And thus much as touching images.

Wherefore God deliuered them by vnto shamefull affections. For euen the women did chaunge the naturall vse into that whiche is against nature. And likewise also the men leste the naturall vse of the woman, and bent in their lustes one with an other: men with men wrought filthines, and receiued vnto themselves the reward of their errour, as was meete.

He disposeth of nature with the Ethnikes.

The sinne of the first Parentes.

A false Argument of the Pelagians.

Wherefore God deliuered them vp vnto shamefull affections. For that he had repeted the crime of idolatry, he also more largely beginneth againe to declare the punishmentes therof. And sayth: that the men leste the naturall vse of women, and were inflamed against nature: which selfe thing he mencioneth of the women, whom reason, iudgement, and shamefastnes, ought to haue contained in honest life, as they ought also to haue caused the men to haue done: which thing came not to passe: because as God threatned in Deut. 32. chap. The vngodly are stricken with madnes and fury. And the Apo. vseth this word Nature, because he disputed against the Ethnikes, which had no skill or knowledge in the scriptures, but onely in nature. And against them he taketh toble things, which by the light of nature are by themselves manifest. And he sheweth, that they were altogether so foolish, that casting away the institution of nature, they followed those thynges which were repugnaunt against it: when as otherwise thynges that are done according to nature, are honest, profitable, and pleasant. But it iustly came to passe, that these men were in this maner blynded. For euen as they were not content with the doctrine of God, when as they thought it not sufficient, that he shoulde be represented by the fabrication of the world, but would nedes bring in idoles & images, so also as touching thynges that were to be done, they were not content with the institution of God, which was according to nature, but more allowed their owne inuentions, although they were most filthy. And herein they did the selfe same thing which our first parentes did when they fell. For their desire was to haue the knowledge of good and euill: that is, at their pleasure, and as they lusted to determine of good and euill, iust and vniust: whiche thing is proper vnto God onely: vnto whose determinations creatures ought to stand. So these men attempted in the coniunctions of bodies to doe according to their owne pleasure and filthy lust, and not according to the decrees of God and of nature. And these affections are after the Hebrew phrase called the affections of dishonour, whiche in the Latine tongue is spoken by the adiectiue. For euen as that which the Hebrewes say, The sonne of perdition, in Latine is turned filius perditus, that is, The lost sonne: So that which in this place is written, Affections of dishonour, in Latine is, Affectus ignominiosi, that is, Shamefull affections. Paule hath this worde πάθη, which signifieth not bulgare motions, or the lighter sort of affections, but perturbations, and violent diseases, by which we are by a mightye impulsion stirred vp and prouoked. Neyther are these shamefull affections any thing els, then that which he before sayd: namely, lustes of the hart. By these thynges which are now written, is easely confuted that which Iulianus the Pelagian, obiected vnto Augustine. For he said, that lustes are extant in vs: and, God to deliuer vs by vnto the, is nothing els, then to leaue vs vnto them. But Iulianus cannot proue, that these shamefull affections were in the nature of man before his fall. And it semeth that the Pelagians abused this place, as Augustine, writeth in his 2. booke de nuptiis & concupiscentia ad Valerium, in the 19. & 20. cha. For they laboured to proue the concupiscentie or lust is a thing laudable, by an argument taken of contraries. For sith (said they) Paule condemneth the coniunction which is against nature, it consequētly foloweth, that the lust which is according to nature, is both vpright, and also worthy of praise. Wherefore (said they) although some do in it excede the meane, yet ought it it not to be reproued: vnles we wyl also accuse both bread and wyne, because ther are some which abuse them. Neither is that of any force which thou saiest. The goodnes of generation excuseth not þe crime of adultery: neither doth original sin which is drawe fro þe nativity, cōdemne þe goodnes of wedlocke. Because, this is to speake darkly, and thou seemest to laboꝝ not to be vnderstaḡd. The naturall copulation of men with women, oughte at the length to be expꝛessed by some certayne note, that we may know whether it be good oꝝ euill. That it is good, hereby appeareth, because Paule condemneth the contrary. But if it be good, & the birth is good, which springeth thereof, by what chynkes oꝝ holes the doth original sinne creepe in? These thinges they objected vnto Augustine. But in this sort did he aunswere them. We must make a distinction (sayth he) betweene those thinges which God instituted, and betweene those thinges, which were by Adam brought in after sinne. We say that the naturall copulation of man with the woman was instituted of God, and therefore it is good, neyther of it cōmeth any euill. But lust, which is thereto adioyned, as we now haue it, is rebellious agaynst reason, vnbridled, & flamburne, also the disobedience of the partes of the body, which is not kept downe by our will, procedeth from vice and sinne. And such a lust, ought to be counted shamefull and euill. Which thing the sense of nature testifieth: for that we see that when man and wife will haue sellowship together they do hide themselves: which declareth that in it there is some thing which bath shame annexed vnto it. Further Paule writeth: I know that there dwelleth no good in me, that is, in my fleshe whome we ought rather to beleue then you, which set forth lust as a good thing. And he addeth: If our nature be to be made saue, then ought it to be good: other wise it ought not to be made saue. And if it had no euill in it, then ought it not to be made saue, because of it selfe it shoulde be saue. But as touching Paule, whereas he condemneth the vchast, for that they left the naturall vse of the woman, he speaketh not a word there, of matrimony: but only he weth, that these idolaters, were horriblye punished, in that they forsooke the naturall vse: whiche naturall vse yet may be obserued among whoremongers and harlots, wherefore those thinges whiche ye alleadge of concupiscence are farre from Paules meaning. But how original sinne is traduced by procreation, I will not in this place expꝛesse.

And they receaued vnto themselves the reward of their error as was mete.] By the name of error he here in this place vnderstandeth manifest sinne, and that which is committed of men, wittingly. And these filthy thinges whiche he hath spoken of (he sayth) were an hire and reward. In the Greke it is written μισθωδον, which may be turned, a compensation. And this kinde of speech seemeth not to be much unlike that, which is spoken in the Gospell, touching hypocrites, that they haue receaued their reward. And forasmuch as sinnes properly deserue not a hire oꝝ a rewarde, but a punishment: by this place is most manifestly perceaued, that that is true which Augustine oftentimes affirmeth, namely, that God auengeth sinnes by sinnes. And þe greuousnes of the wickednes committed agaynst nature appeareth, by that that it is answerable and is compared to the most greuous sinne of idolatry. Augustine in his first booke and 24. chap: agaynst þe aduersary of the law & of the prophetes, sayeth, that that place which is written in the 38. of Deut. is vniustly reproued of the Maniches: where it is written that God wil inflict this punishment vpon the wicked, that sometimes they shall kill theyꝝ owne children and eate them: whiche thing without doubt is sinne, neyther (as they say) ought it to be thought to proceede from the righteousness of God. And hereby the Maniches endeuored themselves to cōclude, that the God of the olde Testament is euill, because he inflicteth euill thinges, that is, sinnes. But Augustine aunswereth: The same thing might also be sayd of the God of the new Testament. forasmuch as Paule writeth in this place, that he deliuered vpon men into these shamefull affections. But it is farre otherwise. Because the true God inflicteth this kinde of punishment vpon the wicked, which punishments are not tormentes of such as sinne, but encreasings of sinnes. And after this maner doth Paul reason. They whiche are without Christ and his Gospell, haue experience that such wrath of God, lighteth vpon the: Therefore at Christs handes must be sought

The naturall copulation of man with woman as it was instituted of God is good.

Concupiscence which was adioyned vnto it after the fall of Adam is euill.

Here is proved that God punisheth sinnes by sinnes.

both remedy and also righteousness. Wherefore it appeareth, how wickedly some do in such manner defend free will, that they are not ashamed to say, that by the strengthes thereof, and by that which is in vs, we may auoyde all sinnes. Which thing if it were true, then should Paul weakly conclude, that we ought to come vnto Christ, and vnto the Gospell. For a man myghte saye, I can auoyde these synnes euen without Christ, by my selfe, and by myne owne free wil. And this is woorthy of noting, that the Apostle in this chapter vseth this kinde of speech, God deliuered vp men, three tymes. For which thinge if there be any man y will accuse the iustice of God, as though he committeth iniquity, the same man seeketh now to be God ouer God. So far is it of, that he counteth him for God. Hether to Paul hath entreated of the most filthy crime which is committed against nature, and that agaynste nature being bittate and corrupted. As though he should haue sayd: We would not retayne: no not that little brightness, and honesty, and institution of God, whiche remayned in nature. Now he goeth to the rehearsall of other vices, which be both not so largely entreate of, but onely rehearse they: byndes in number. And before he commeth to the rehearsall of them, he sayth:

And as they regarded not to know God: euen so God deliuered them into a reprobate mynde, that they should do those things that are not conuenient:

And as they regarded not to acknowledge God, euen so God deliuered them vnto a reprobate mynde. He now diligently openeth, how the punishment was correspondent vnto y sin. That which we haue here turned, regarded not, is in the Latteen probare, & in the Greke δοκιμαζω. Where this word, probare, signifieth not, to tempt, or by argumentes to confyrm: but rather firmly, perfectly, and constantly to appoynt. And this is the meaning of his reprehension: They knew God by his creatures but they would not acknowledge him: that is, they would not haue the knowledge of him perpetually before they: eyes, wherebye mought haue followed some change of life, and lustes mought after a sorte, haue bene bydeled. And this thing do the commentaries which be ascribed vnto Hierome meane: wher we reade, that these men would not haue God before they: eyes, for where that is, there men fall not so easily in sinne. Andoubtedlye there are many, which being endued with an excellent wyl, do know a greate many of thinges righte well, and can handesomely deliberate vpon them: but when they know and haue determined vpon them, they lay them a side, so that when they to come to actes and doinges, they seeme in vaine both to haue known them, and to haue deliberated vpon them. Wherefore righte well seemeth Erasmus in this place to haue noted the difference betwene, cognoscere & agnoscere, that is, to knowe, and to acknowledge: and he graunteth, that these menne knewe God: but hee denieth that they acknowledged him, because when they knewe hym, they gaue not vnto hym, that whyche they oughte to haue done. And in sum, that whiche is here sayde, is all one with that whiche is before writtten: When they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neyther were shankefull, and all one with this, which he reproboued, namely, that they withhelde the truth in a lye. Although Ambrose seemeth to expound this, as though these men, although they knew God by his creatures, yet seemed not to allowe, that God hath intelligence of those thinges which we do. For they thought him not to be curious ouer our actions. And therfore they did put themselves in good hope to escape unpunished. This exposition is not amisse: but may right wel be applied vnto the wordes of Paul. But that which Chrysostome writteth in this place, is woorthy to be noted. The minde of man (saith he) is compared with the driuer of a carte. Wherefore in the course there is no error, vnles the mind be troubled. And therebence come all manner of euils. Neyther is they: flesh to be counted the chiefest fountayne of them. They are therfore deliuered into a reprobate minde, because they did not after a iust manner embrace the knowledge of God, whiche they had attayned vnto.

That they should do those things that are not conuenient.] That is, those things which utterly shake of al honesty and comelines.

Being full of all vnrighteousnes, fornication, wickednes, couetousnes, maliciousnes, full of enuy, of murther, of debate, and of disceate, euill conditioned, whisperers, backbiters, haters of God, doers of wrong, proude boasters, inuenters of euill, disobediente to parentes, without vnderstandinge, couenaunte breakers, without naturall affection, such as can neuer be appeased, vnmercifull.

Being full of all vnrighteousnes.] Here is set forth a cataloge of sinnes, as it were of the tormenters & auengers of God. And this hath a wonderful Emphasis, that these men are said to be filled with al vnrighteousnes: neither sayth he absolutely, with vnrighteousnes, but addeth this word, all, by ἐν τῷ πλεονεξῆσαι, which is a strength or an increase. Because it is possible, y godly men also may sometimes somewhat slip, & feeble in themselves the grounds of these vices. But these men are sayd both to be full, & also to be stuffed, in the whole nature of these evils. First is put vnrighteousnes, namely, whereby we do injury vnto our neighbour. The is added fornication, he speaketh not of adultery: because (as sayth Ambrose) of the condēnatio of the lesser sinne, is the griuouiser sinne condemned. For if fornicatio be sinne, then much moze is adultery sinne. And if he had ouerhipped fornication, and had made mencion onely of adultery, then peraduenture they woulde haue thought fornication to haue bene no sinne at all. Whiche thinge (sayth he) the Romane lawes did, for they leuing fornication unpunished, punished adultery. Πονηρία, which is englisht wickednes, signifieth that endeuer, whereby we labour to do hurt vnto an other. Πλεονεξία, that is, couetousnes, is deriued of these wordes πλεονεξία & ἐχθρὰ, which signifieth, hauing to much: and those men are called πλεονεξταί, which seeke by all meanes possible in all manner of commodities to haue moze then other men: and with the hurte and losse of theyr neighbour to surpe moze then is meete, whether it be as touching riches, or as touching pleasures or honours. Κακία, which is englisht maliciousnes, if it be generally taken, signifieth vice, and is contrary to ἀρετή that is, to vertue. Sometimes it signifieth sluggishnes: from whence cometh this proverbe ἐκ κακίας, that is, to speake negligently. And so κακία signifieth that vice whereby we are straghte way wery of well doing. It signifieth also trouble and affliction, wherunto we bring our neighbours. Μεσότης φθόνου, φόβου, ἐριδος, that is full of enuy, murther, and debate. Again he sheweth that they wer not in a meane sort infected with evils, but wer ouerwhelmed with the. Very wel ioyneth he enuy & murther together. For first the murther of Cayne sprange of a certayne enuy. Agayne contentions or debate follow straight way after the committing of murders. Δόλος, that is, deceate: by it are signified guiles: for whome they cannot kill and oppresse by violence, those they encounter with guiles and disceate. Κακοθυμία, that is, euill conditioned. Here are reprobated those that are bytter, sharpe, and hard to be pleased. And such as they which can almost be contented with no mans condicions. Ψιθυριστάς, that is, whisperers. These are they which prinely cary tales to and froo of whatsoeuer they ether heare or see, and chiefly they seeke by all meanes possible to breake and dissolve frendshippes betweene party and party. Καταλάλυσ, that is, backbiters: who herein differ from whisperers, for that backbiters detract openly: but whisperers do it secretly. Θιουσηγίς, that is, suche as hate God, as of whom they delight neuer either to heare, to thinke, or to speake. And Iulius Pollux in his dictionary, sayth, that it is an Epitheton of the vngodly, and that also it is a tragicall word. For it signifieth those which say vnto God, depart from vs, we will not haue the knowlege of thy wayes. Υβριστάς, These are contumelious persons, which ouerburdē theyr neighbours with reproches insamies and filthy iniuries. Υπερηφανείς, that is, proude, these men in al places that they come shew themselves disdainful, proude, and high mynded. Αλάστορας, that is boasters, he meaneth such Chyzaos and glorious fellows, which attribute vnto themselves those thinges, that were neuer ether seene, or written, or pictured. Επισπερας κακων, that is, inuenters of euill, These men are so wicked, that a man can set before them no good, sound, or fyne thing, but they will gather some euell thereof. Or els it signifyeth those, which not being content with the formes and kindes of vices, which are already in vse, do inuent new kindes of wickednes. Γενωσι ανωβια, that is, disobediente vnto their parentes. By parentes he understandeth, not only father and mother, but also magistrates, scholes masters, and pastors, Αουβιρς, that is, without vnderstanding. They are such, which do thinges without iudgement or reason, & order all thinges foolishly & furiously, Αουβιρς, that is, couenants breakers. These men will abide by no conditions, couenantes, nor leagues. They are vnfaithfull, and breakers of all couenantes. Αστοργς, that is, without naturall affection: which are moued with no affection, toward those which are ioyned vnto them by any kind of kindred, They neyther care for parentes, nor children, nor betherne, nor countrey, nor friends, and at the length for no man. Ασπονδς, this signifieth those, which will neuer be reconciled or pacified, when they are once moued, or haue taken any quarell in hand. Αναλεμους, that is, vnmercifull. So last of all he maketh mencion of those which are so cruell, that they are touched with no kinde of mercy. But these sower vices last spoken of, Chrysostome doth after this maner order, that by Αουβιρς, which we haue turned couenant breakers, he understandeth those which can agree with no man, no not with those, whose nature is like vnto theyr owne. An horse, acquainteth himselfe with an horse, and an Dre, with an Dre: but these will agree with no man. By Αστοργς, which we haue turned, without naturall affection, he understandeth those, which are not touched with their next & most friends. By Ασπονδς, which is englished, to be those that can neuer be appeased, he understandeth those that breake all manner of leagues and fellowshipes. By Αναλεμους, which is in the Englishe, vnmercifull, he understandeth, those which shew mercy or compassion to no man. These vices are therefore so diligently rehearsed, that by them, as by certayne notes, impiety mought the better be knowen. And they are for this cause also set forth vnto vs, partly that we shoulde behold & miserable estate of those which lyue without Christ and bys Gospell: and partly, that we shoulde haue before our eyes the enemyes, agaynst which we must fyght.

Who when they knewe & righteousnes of God, that they which commit such thinges are worthy of death, yet not only do the same, but also haue pleasure in them that do them.

By amplification he still depresseth them, when he sayth, that both they themselves are wicked, and also they exceedingly delight in those that are wicked: when yet notwithstanding they knewe the righteousnes of God. For both knowing & willingly, they commit sinne. How the lawes of God were knowen vnto men, he teacheth not: for that it is well knowen vnto all me, that the same cometh by the light of nature. And this righteousnes which men by nature attayne vnto, he calleth the righteousnes of God: so that we must remember, that the law of nature, is also the law of God. They were not ignorant, that they which do these and such like thinges, are worthy of death, because the light of nature, sheweth (which thing also Paul teacheth) that the reward of sinne is death. Draco the lawgiver punished all manner of sinnes with death. And when he was admonished, that all sinnes were not alike, he answered, that he knewe that to be true: but he had no punishment more greuous nor crueller then death: and therefore he could adde no greuouser punishments vnto the haynouser sort of offences. And yet was it not therefore to be suffered, that lighter offences which deserued death, should not be punished with it. To consent vnto unto them that do euill, is to saue, and embrace the, & not to reprove the: yea rather to praye the. And whē a mā hath committed vnto him h office either of teaching or of preaching or els of admonishing, to winke at these things: or (as the maner is in the court of Rome) to dispece with the, to take money, to bargayne, and (as they terme it) to copoud for those things, which they count for manifest hainous crimes. The Apostle (as Chrysostome noteth) endeouureth himself vtterly to stop the mouth of this kind of men. For if they had layd ignorance for an excuse, thereto he answereth, when they knew the righteousness of God: but if they had excused theselues by weakenes: yet neuertheles, were they guilty, because they consented and reioyced at others, which committed the selfe same thinges. But for as much as Paule inueigheth here against them, which when they knew God, glorified him not as God, neither were thankfull, but addicted themselves vnto idolatry: whether shall we condemne all these Ethnikes, as guilty of so many and so great crimes, as we haue now heard recited, or no: Undoubtedly, there were in the publike wealth of Rome many excellent and good men: as the Valerians, the Catos, and the Scipios: and also there were suche among the Grecians, as Aristides, Phocio, and Socrates, whome we reade not to haue bene defiled wyth so many shamefull and filthy lustes. There are some whiche to this question thus answer, that although these men were not polluted wyth all these sinnes, yet there was not one of them, but that at the lest he was spotted wyth a great many of them. Undoubtedly they were proude, and ouermuch desirous of glory & fame. Farther, without all doubt their iudgement was very ill touchyng God. But this it should seme is an easier exposition to say, that these excellent men as touching the hart and mynde, were vnpure and contaminated: as such which had not Christ both for a mediator, and for a propitiator, through whome they natural lustes, mought not haue bene imputed vnto them for sinne. Neither had they the holy ghost or grace of Christ, whereby they should haue bene restrained from committing of sinne, and also haue wrought suche workes, which mought haue aduanced the glory of God. Wherefore, this their uncleannes of hart, and naturall enmitie agaynst God, as touching it selfe, coulde haue burst forth into all these wycked actes, if God had not prouided (lest publike wealths should haue bene turned vpside downe, and least all politicall discipline should haue perished) that euermore some excellent men should flourish, by whose lawes and pure lyfe after a sort, other men should be conteyned in doyng of ciuile duties. And although the actions and doynges euen of these men were sinnes, as touchyng God, yet in outward appearance they were not so polluted, but that they might be vnto others an example, and also a certain rule of ciuile honesty. But there were so few of these men, that amongst a great number of Philosophers a man could scarcely fynde one or two of them: and in an infinite multitude of ciuile men, a man could (as we see) scanty be able to fynde a few examples of moztall vertues. And Paule speaketh of men, as they are for the most part. Wherefore, that which he here sayth: abideth firme, neither doth thys objection any thyng weaken it.

Wherefore O man thou art inexcusable, whosoever thou arte that iudgest, for in that that thou iudgest another, thou condemnest thy selfe: for thou that iudgest doost euen the selfe same thyng. But we knowe that the iudgement of God is accordyng to truth, agaynst them which commit such thinges. And thinkest thou O man, that iudgest them which do such thynges, and doest the same, that thou shalt escape the iudgement of God?

kinds of knowledge

Knowledge generally is deuised into two partes: wherof, the one pertayneth onely vnto contemplation: of whiche he hath hether to from the beginning at large written; when he declared that these men by the obseruation of thinges created, mought haue come to the knowledge of the most high God, the author of the world: from whome when they had thorough idolatry filthily fallen, they were deliuered by to be punished with most shamefull lust. There is another knowledge, which is called practike, for that it is occupied aboute the doynge of thinges. Now in this place doth Paule teach, y they abused this knowledge also: for that when as they knewe what was equitie, and right as touching the doynge of thinges, yet notwithstanding, partly they maintained and supported others, when they transgressed these bondes: and partly if they dyd punish the sinnes in other men, yet wincked they at the selfe same sinnes in themselves. And he in such sort reproveth them, that he declareth vnto them that they shall not escape the iudgement of God, although in the meane tyme they auoid the iudgement of men. So that his entent is, to take away from them, al manner of excuse. Such great loue and affection beare we vnto our selues, that oftentimes we can geue by right iudgement vppon other men, but can easely overlook our selues offending in the like, or rather in thinges more haynous. Wherefore he sayth, Thou art inexcusable. This sentence he inferreth of those thinges which he had before spoke: because that as touching epyther of these two knowledges they are conuincid both wittingly & willingly to haue sinned. Origen supposeth, that this is not a very apte distinction of the chapter, when as those thinges which are here spoken, do so plainly depend of the thinges going before. Ambrose also supposeth, that in this place is a preuention against them, whych peradventure would excuse themselves, for that although they sal themselves, yet consent they not vnto such as worke wickedly, which men he willet to call to minde, that forasmuche as they are senere in punishinge of others, the selfe same iudgement shall at the length lighte vpon themselves. But why the Apostle seemeth, to cut of onely the excuse of ignorance, we haue already before declared the cause: namely, for that the Ethnikes, whiche attributed all thinges vnto free will, neuer pretended the other excuse of infirmite: Wherefore was it needfull to byge them on this behalfe, that they should vnderstand, that they knewe knowledge was not sufficient for them. Moreover, the entent of the Apostle is, to call them backe from the lawe, and from Philosophy: of whiche two thinges, the principallest office is, to teach. Wherefore when he had declared, that knowledge by it selfe was not sufficient to iustify them, he moste manifestly inferreth, that iustification cannot be obtayned, neyther by Philosophy nor by the lawe. And that these men by the lighte of nature, knew what thinges were to be doone, he proueth manifestly by this token, namely, for that they coulde iudge of them. But there is no man, which can geue iudgemente of those thinges wherof he is utterly ignorant. But how muche the wise menne of the Ethnikes excelled in sharpnes of iudgemente, the goodly lawes and excellent booke, whiche they haue set forth, do declare, and also the determinations whiche were decreed at they places of iudgemente, when matters were decided. Chrysostome supposeth, that these thinges are therefore written vnto the Romanes, because at that time they were the chiefe Lordes ouer all, and the iudgementes in a manner of all prouinces were drawen thither. But vndoubtedly those thinges wherof the Apostle here writeth, pertayne vnto all menne. For there is none, whiche hath his righte wytt, whiche epyther wyth himselfe or els with other menne discusseth not of those thinges, whiche he epyther publicly or privately seeth done: and either prayseth or disprayseth the same, as they epyther disagree from naturall iustice, or agree therewith. But forasmuche as they can geue iudgemente of other menne, they oughte in especiall to geue iudgemente of themselves: for y vnto them it is most plaine, not onely what they do, but also with what mind they do it: which they cannot so easely see in other menne. But they

they spare themselves, and do the selfe same thinges, whiche they geue iudgement of. Paul therfore to strike into them a terror sayth:

But we know that the iudgement of God is according to truth against them which commit such thinges. And thinkest thou o man, which iudgeth them which do such thinges, and dooit the selfe same, that thou shalt escape the iudgemente of God? They dissembled theyr owne sinnes, eyther because they thought that God little regarded the thinges which are done of men, against whiche errorre the Apostle sayth, that it is mosse certaine that God wil iudge these thinges, and that accordynge to truth. Otherwyle as sayth Ambrose he shoulde be counted an euell woorkeman, as one whych shoulde neglecte hys woork. And forasmuche as those thinges whiche he hath made are most good, and the same (as the continuance and order of thinges declareth) hath he not cast of fro his care, how dare they thinke, that man, which is the most excellent of all creatures should continue without the providence and presence of God? Others peradventure were therfore perswaded to sinne against their owne iudgement, and to thinke that they shoulde not be punished for it, because they saw and perceived, that God deferreth punishmentes. Which erroneous opinion, he afterward confuteth, when he sayth: Dost thou despise the riches of his goodnes, patience, and long suffering? But because such seeme there to be reproued whiche iudge others (& that not a misse) when as yet they theselues liue in the selfe same wicked actes: let vs see, whether theyr opinion be byright, which thinke that suche iudges cannot nor oughte not to geue sentence against others whiche are accused vnto the, they theselues being guilty of the selfe same fault. But this were to ouerthrow all publike wealthe, and utterly to take away iudgements. Neyther doth Paul here any thing serue for the maintenaunce of this opinion. But onely sheweth, that they most grievously sinne, which with a greate securitie punish others, and overpasse themselves. They ought vndoubtedly first to correct and amend themselves. But yet Paul biddeth them not, to forsake the office committed vnto them. They be also for this purpose to cite the sayinge of Christe vnto them, which accused the adulterous woman: He which amongst you is without sinne, let him cast the first stone at her. But this sentence of Christ is not against iust punishmentes, and lawfull iudgements. Neyther commaunded he them, that they shoulde not go forward in accusing the woman, whome they had taken in adultery. He himselfe was no magistrate, but the most high preacher of God. Therfore, that which was his office to do, he executed, in perswading those hypocrites to repentaunce. And he woulde haue them first hereunto to haue a regarde, by a liuely sayth and repentaunce, to deliuer themselves from the sinnes whereof they were guilty. Neyther so bad he, but that they shoulde execute that which the law of Moyse commaunded. He saw that these wicked men in these punishmentes wer infected with two manner of faults. For first the punishment and payne, which theyr neighbour was put vnto, was pleasant vnto them: for by accusinge him before the Magistrates and iudges, they pryncely wecked vpon him their hatred and enimities. An other fault was their hypocrisy: for that when as they themselves otherwise abstained not from the selfe same wicked actes, yet by accusynge of offenders they made a show, as though they had bene zelous of the law. These thynges Christ wente aboute to correct: He condemned not the woman, for that he was not a polleticall magistrate. He accused her not to the Magistrates, because he tooke her not in adultery. Wherefore forasmuch as he was not a sufficient witness, he was not bound by the law, to prosecute such an accusation. But that which pertayned to hys function, he left not vndone: for he admonished her, that she shoulde afterward absteyn from sinne. Likewise when we see any wicked acte done by our neyghbour, God requirith not, that we shoulde not iudge of it accordynge to the nature thereof. For we be vnto vs (as sayth the Prophete) if we shall call euill good. That whiche is euill oughte to be iudged, accordynge as it is. Neyther oughte we ether to suspende our iudgemente, or to turne away our eyes fro those things, whiche are in very deepe euill. If that we shall seele our selues also, to be infected with the selfe same fault, let vs descend into our selues, and with a due chastisement reprove our selues. And thereby shall it come to passe, that we our selues being by repentance corrected, may both, more byrightly, and also, with more fruite, admonishe our brother, when he offendeth. Neyther againste this, is that sentence in the, 7. of Mathew: Iudge not, and ye shall not be iudged. Because in that place is not entreated of the taking away of brotherly admonicion: but onely the curiositee of the vngodly is there reprovied, whiche aboundinge themselves, in all manner of synnes, do most diligently search out the synnes of other men: not to the intent to amend them, but to delight themselves in the multitude of sinners, and because they thinke, that hauing company, they case is the better. The godly are not infected with this curiositie, as they which haue continually their eyes fixed vpon theyr owne synnes, and dayly falles: so that they haue no leysure (vntill they offer themselves vnto them) to consider the faults of other men. Wherefore, they reioyce not, neyther delight themselves in the condemnation of theyr neighbours, especiallye that condemnation whiche is done rashely. For they know that theyr brother, so much as he is of God, eyther stādeth to his word, or falleth. But we increase now of priuate menne, and not of Magistrates or Pastors, whose parte is by office to be inquisitiue touching the life and manners of those, which be committed to theyr charge. Wherefore all men, as well subiectes, as magistrates, ought to iudge synnes which are layde before them, by admonishing and punishinge, euery manne accordinge to his office, leasse vices shoulde spreade to farre abroad. But this thinge aboue others is diligently to be taken heede of, as Paule now teacheth, that wee thinke not at those thynges whiche we our selues wickedlye committe. For as he sayth, In that we iudge an other, we condemne our selues. The selfe same sentence, whereby we punish other men, striketh also our selues. And seing we can not escape our owne iudgement, how shall we escape the iudgement of God, which is accordinge to truth? For then shall not that thinge happen whiche we see now doth, that in one and the selfe same kinde of crime one is condemned, and an other escapeth. Euen as our deedes are, so shall they be iudged. Now men spare themselves, and are seuer agaynst others. But so shall it not be in the iudgement of God. It resteth therefore, that we execute the selfe same severity vpon our selues, which we vse in iudging of other men. Which thing how little the aduersaries of religion do performe, hereby it is manifest, in that they euery where crye out agaynst the mariages of prestes, because they seeme vnto them vnpure: but in the meane tyme while they ouerpasse themselves, being ouerwhelmed with all kinde of filthy lustes. They make exclamation, that vovwes are not performed: and they consider not what they haue promised vnto God in Baptisme. They complayne, that fastes, which men haue commanded, are not kept: and they neuer make an ende of their banquettings and delicious feastinges. They make lamentacion, that the sacramentes are vnto they neglected of our men: when as they themselves with their lyes of transubstantiation haue hitherto sold them, mangled them, and filthyly deformed them.

The summe of Pauls doctrine is, that we iudging others, shoulde descend into ourselues: for that it is most certayne, that the iudgement of God shall be accordinge to truth. Therefore we must to our power endeour our selues, to make our life and maners acceptable before so great a iudge.

But this sentence to sinne, and to consent vnto sinners, which before he objected to the vngodly, seemeth to be repugnant vnto that, which he afterward speaketh, namely, that they punished others, but spared themselves. For how do they consent vnto others which do euill, if by their iudgemente they condemn them: but the apostle speaketh not generally. And the selfe same disease of selfe lone strytheth them by, both to spare themselves, and also to supporte and and mayntayne them, which are by any aliance knit vnto the, whē as they are infected with the same vices, that they themselves are: but strangers and such as they beare no affectio vnto, by their iudgement they most severely cōdemne, if at any tyme they commit any fault. Which thing is most playne in the history of David. For when Nathan the prophet had accused befoze him, the cruell act of the riche man, the king burst forth strayght way into these wordes, he is the sonne of death, which hath committed this acte. Vnto whome the prophet declared, that he himselfe was the man, which had committed this so haynous an act. He was seuerer against an other mā, and had yet, neuertheles so long tyme wincked at himselfe, hauing committed the like fault.

Or despisest thou the riches of his goodnes, patience and lenity, not knowing that the goodnes of God leadeth thee to repentance: But thou after thyne hardnes, and hart that cannot repent, heapest vnto thyselfe wrath agaynst the day of wrath, and of the declaration of the iust iudgement of God, who will render vnto euery man according to his workes.

Or despisest thou the riches of his goodnes, patience, and lenity? In amplifying and setting forth the wonderfull and excellent proprieties of God, the scripture very oftentimes useth this word riches, notwithstanding that the goodnes of God is not limited or bound in, with any endes, but much exceedeth copia cornu as Latine men vse to speake, that is, all kinde of plentifulnes. Neither is goodnes in this place all one with brightness, iustice, and temperance: but is a redines, and an endenour to helpe our neighbour. For this Greke word, χρηστότης, is deriued of profite and commoditie. This bountifullnes of God, Christ partly touched, when he sayd, that God our Father maketh his sunne to arise vpon the good and the euill, and the rayne, to rayne vpon the iust and the vniust. Paule also partly here expretheth it, when he sayth, that God with long suffering beareth with the wickednes of men. For in this place Paule ouerthroweth an other foundation, whereunto the vngodly leaning, perswaded themselves, that they should escape unpunished, for that God differreth to inflict his punishments. This cometh not hereof sayth he, because God neglecteth these thinges: or that he will haue them to go unpunished: but with lenity and patience he suffereth for a tyme: other wise, whē he seeth bys tyme he will surely auenge them. And this word, long suffering, is of great efficacy to moue our myndes: as though it were paynfull vnto God to suffer our iniquities. For we are not sayd to beare and tolerate, but only such thinges, which of their own nature are both odious and troublesome. Which kindes of speach we haue first in Esay the Propete, when he sayd vnto the vngodly king Achab: Is it a small matter vnto you of the house of David, that ye are greuous vnto men, but ye must be greuous also vnto God? And the same Propete bringeth in God speaking of the sacrifices and obseruations of the vngodly, that he could no longer suffer the, but that it was a payne for hym to suffer them. For they being bope of sayth and piety gaue themselves whole vnto ceremonies. And David, in his Psalm, writeth that God complayneth, that by the space of 40. yeares the generation of Israell was greuous vnto him in the wilderness: because they alwayes erred in their hart. And the patience of God, which should haue wrought in them repentance, through their owne default profited them not a whit. Which he now vpbraideth, saying:

Knowest thou not that these thinges leade thee to repentance? Augustine noteth, that this taketh place as touching the elect and predestinate: whiche by this long suffering of God do at the length obtayne saluation, although, so long as they sinne, and do not speedily repent, as touching their owne part, they heape vnto themselves the wrath of God. But he forsaeth them not: without whose

The repentance of the that fall is of God.

Why God
punisheth some and not all.

What is to brethren when they

God punisheth the vngodly

a measure of punishment as though it

once.

impulsion, spirit, and grace, his lenity and patience shoulde be in bayne. And that the repentance of them that fall, is to be ascribed vnto God, the Epistle written vnto Timothe very evidently teacheth. For there he instructeth a Bishop, to obserue such a trade of teaching, that without contention he enstrut them, with whome he hath to do, if peradventure God geue them grace to repent.

Howbeit the differring of punishments semeth of his owne nature to drawe men to returne vnto God: although in all men it hath not like efficacye. Wherefore, when we see some punished, and we our selues in the meane time spared, it is expedient that we shoulde diligently waite thys goodnes of God whereby he beareth with vs, to the ende we should correct our selues. Whiche thing Christ admonished vs of, when he sayde, when worde (was brought him of some which were killed with the fall of the tower of Syloa) Do yet thinke that they alone haue sinned? As though he woulde haue sayd. Not they alone haue deserved that punishment, but many others ought to haue suffered the like: but God will shew forth certayne particular examples of hys iudgement, whiche one day shalbe generall. In deede, the punishment of the vngodly is differred: but it shall most certaynely come to passe at the tyme appoynted. The parable of the figge tree, which the goodman of the household commaunded to be cut downe, when it bare no fruite, admonisheth vs of this selfe same thing. The husbandman obayned, that the cutting downe thereof, shoulde be a litle while differred, or that he would donge it, and prunne it, if so peradventure it would bring forth fruite. Whiche thing if it did not, then shoulde it not only be digged vp by the rootes, but also be throwen into the fyre. Here are we taught, not straght way to forsake our bretherne, when they offend, but patiently for a tyme to abyde: and that euen as God himselfe doth, so shoulde we by benefytes prouoke them vnto repentance, not omitting in the meane tyme brotherly admonitions.

But this is worthy of noting, that in thys place is mencion made, that the selfe same men, which befoze he sayd were punished (when they were deliuered vp to the lasses of their owne hart, and vnto shamefull affections, and also vnto a reprobate mynde) shall agayne be punished. Whiche therefore is done for that that fyrst kinde of punishment drew them vnto voluptuousnes, and pleasures. For he sheweth that it shall one day happen, that vengeance shall be taken vpon them, and that both great, and also most paynesfull. But how agreeth this with that, which Nabum the Prophet writeth in his first chapter: That iudgement is not geuen or punishment taken twise vpon one and the selfe same thing. Seing these men were punished once, why are they agayne punished? Undoubtly, that sentence whiche is so common, that God punisheth not twise, is not so written in the Prophet: although it be so reade in the 70. Interpreters. The wordes are thus: what do ye thinke against the Lord? He will make an ende, neyther shall tribulation arise vp the second tyme. Which wordes some of the Hebrewes (as Hierome telleth) interpret of the Assyrians: who when they had it the first tyme gotten the victorie against the kingdome of the tenne tribes, thought, that they could in like maner preuaile against the kingdome of Iuda. But that it shoulde so come to passe, the Prophet denieth, and sayth, that after the first tribulation the second shoulde not follow. This exposition may in deede be borne withall. But there is an other which is moze playne: namely, to say that these thinges are spoken agaynst Sinnecharib, which besieged Jerusalem: vnto whome God threatened a fall and through ouerthrow: I will (sayth he) so blot thee out, that I shall not neede to rise vp the second tyme agaynst thee. One plague shalbe sufficient: thou shalt be so vehemently afflicted with it. Neither dreamed the Prophet (as many meane sayne) that vnto God is prescribed a measure in punishments: as though it were not lawfull for him to punish one and the selfe same man, any moze then once. Whiche thing if we shoulde graunt, we shoulde say that the Egyptians, forasmuch as they were punished in the red sea, are now free fro hell fire. And that they which wickedly wickedly perished in Sodom & in the flood, are now at the length at rest. Which thinges without doubt are most absurd. For, as certein, in this life receaue the holy ghost and grace as an earnest peny of the felicity to come, as which shall receiue rewarde both here & in the world to come, so may it be contrariwise, that the punishments of some, begin in this life, which shalbe increased in an other world, as it is to be thought that Herode, Nero, and Saule do now fele punishments far more greuous, then those which they here tasted of.

And yet in the meane tyme I deny not, but that God as touching his elect, is content with these paynes and punishments, which he inflicteth vpon them in this life. As Paule sayd vnto the Corinthians, that one among them shoulde be deliuered by vnto Sathan, that his spirit might be saued in the day of the Lord. And agayne he saith, that some are here corrected of the Lord, lest they should be condemned with this worlde. But when God will deale after this sorte, or when he wil vse that severity to punish both here & afterward, it lyeth not in vs to know. Wherefore, according to the commaundement of Christ, he is alwayes to be feared: soasmuch, as he hath power both to kill the body, and also to cast the soule into hell fire. Howbeit this we may assuredly affirme, that they which being afflicted do perish and repent not, shal be againe more greuously tormented, & those on the other side, which being admonished with afflictions, do returne vnto Christ shall, being sufficiently chastised with the punishments of this life, obteyne eternall saluation.

Wherefore, accordyng to that whiche we haue sayde, Paule admonisheth these men, that although after a sort they were punished, yet, vnles they repented, they should in the day of iudgement, be more greuously punished. And his meaning is that the patience of God, whereby he suffereth them, doth not portende that they should escape vnpunished, but geueth them occasion to begin truly to repent.

God is set forth to be both mercifull and good, but yet in such sort, that his long sufferynge and patience haue endes & limites. And by reason of this differryng of punishments which happeneth in thys lyfe, the Apostle is compelled to make mention of the last iudgement. Otherwyse, soasmuch as in this lyfe many are passed ouer vnpunished, & others are most severely delt with all. God might be thought to deale vniustly. Wherefore he vrgeth them wpth the feare of the last iudgement and affirmeth that the differryng of vengeance byngeth more greuous punishments. Which thyng Valerius Maximus, an Ethenike writer speaketh of, that God by the greuousnes of the punishment, recompenceth the long delaying thereof. Whereby it is playne, that Paule, disputing against the Ethenikes, which knew not the holy scriptures, reprobued them by those thynges, which might be known by the lyght of nature. Wherefore there is a certayne naturall knowledge grafted in the hartes of men, touchyng the iudgement of God to come after thys lyfe: which thyng the fables also of the Poetes declare, whiche haue placed Minoes, Radamanthus, and Eacus as iudges in hel. Wherefore they shall be more greuously punished, which haue bene the longer borne withall: because the contempt of God addeth no small waight vnto theyr synnes: which contempt semeth to haue crept into them, whilest they so long tyme despised his lenitie and patience.

But thou after thyne hardnes, and hart that can not repent, heapest vnto thy selfe wrath in the day of wrath. An hard hart is that, which is not softened by the benefites of God, nor broken by hys threateninges nor feare of punishments. And this rebellion agaynst God we draw vnto vs, partly by originall sinne, and partly by custome of synnyng: so that now we are in a manner without any kynde of feyng. To beleue bysightly, soasmuch as it is a vertue, hath two extremities. On the one side, there is so great facility, that some wyll beleue euery thing, whether it be an inuention of mā, or supersticio, or the word of God: which vndoubtedly is a vyce. On the other side there is so great difficulty to beleue, that they will not admit, no not euen that which is playne by the worde of God, vnles theyr owne reason be satisfied therein. Betwene these two dangerous extremities there is a certayne meane, that we should heafely beleue those thinges which are to be beleued, whē they are godly offered vnto vs, vsing therein a diligent trial of

The punishments of the vngodly begin oftentimes in this life, & they shalbe more greuously afflicted in the world to come. The saints are afflicted with the punishments of this lyfe only.

The patience of god portendeth not vnto the vngodly that they shall escape vnpunished

The knowledge of the iudgement to come, is naturally grafted in men.

A hard hart

Whereof rebellion against God springeth.

In beleuyng, the meane is to be kept, and two extremities are to be taken heed of.

the holy scriptures. For all things are to be examined by that rule. Paul bleseth this Greke worde, ὑποτιθέν, which signifieth to lay aside, or to lay by in store. For we commonly vse to lay by in our treasures those things whiche we will not vse presently, but will afterward vse them at some other convenient tyme. And this very well fitteth with these vngodly ones. For then they felte not the anger of God, which yet afterward they shall fee: and that so muche the more abundantly, as riches are more plentifull, whiche are continually euery day heaped by together. He prudently & warily sayth, that these men heaped by vnto themselves, wrath: that they should not impute these punishmentes vnto the cruelty of God. By this kinde of speech he teacheth, that it was they themselves which brought this mischiese vpon themselves. And this woord of heaping by treasure, is oftentimes vsed in the holie scriptures. In Deut: the 32. chap: God sayth touchinge the transgressions of the Israelites, that they were sealed vp in his treasures. Jeremy also in the 50. chap: threateneth, that God will poure out the treasure of his wrath, and indignation. And that which is added:

This metaphor of heaping by treasure is oftentimes vsed in the holy scriptures. What the day of wrath is.

Three notes of the laste iudgement.

To walke before the Lord.

God hath a consideration vnto the cause and not vnto men. Moses vnderstande that the mercy of God is tempered with iustice.

In the day of wrath.] And y<sup>e</sup> happeneth somtimes in this life, when God semeth, that he will not suffer any longer, and sheweth forth some tokens of his severity: which thing we see happened in the captiuitie of Babylon, in the euersion of Sodome, and destruction of the Egyptians. And the Prophets euery where describe the most bitter punishmentes of God by this title, that they be layd by in store against the day of wrath. And wrath is here taken for vengeance, by that kinde of figure, wherby that which followeth, is expressed by that which goeth before. But it fitteth beste, to referre those things, whiche are here described, vnto the last day of iudgement: which he expresseth by three notes. Firste by wrath, secondly by reuelation, and lastly by iustice. Vengeance he ascribeth vnto God: least it should be thought a thing of smal waight: He addeth also reuelation, because here things are hidden: but there all things shall be made manifeste. He putteth thereunto also this woord δικαιοσύνη, that is, iustice: least (as Chrysostome noteth) some should perswade themselves, that the iudgemente of God should proceede from an angry minde. Vndoubtedly there shall be shewed a most grievous vengeance: but yet such a one as shall haue ioined with it iustice. Wherefore we ought to haue that iudgement continually before our eyes: neither at any time to take vpon vs, any duties or actions, but that our mind be ever turned vnto it. And this is to walke before God: whiche thinge as Abraham was commaunded to do, so is the same most oftentimes required at our handes. And to walke before God is nothing els, then to thinke, that he doth moste intentiuelye behold whatsoener things we do. But alas, it is wonderfull to see, howe this thinkinge vpon the iudgemente to come, is taken awaye from the sighte of the vngodlye.

VVho shall render vnto euery man according to his woorkes.] When he sayth, that vnto euery manne shall be rendred, it plainely signifieth, that none shall escape this iudgemente. In the iudgementes of men, it oftentimes happeneth, that one is punished, and an other, is not so muche as accused. He addeth:

According to their woorkes, to geue vs to vnderstand, that there shall be no acceptation of persons. There shall be consideration had of the causes onelye, and not of men. Of what state or condicion so euer they be, they shall be iudged accordinge to theyr woorkes and deedes. In deede the mercy of God is now large: but yet in such sort, that the severitye of iustice is not wantinge. Moses, although he had heard manye proprieties of God whiche serued to expresse his goodnes and clemency, that is, that he is mercifull, gentle, slow vnto anger, rich in mercy and truth, whiche reserueth goodnes or mercye for a thousande generacions, yet at the end added, that God wil not pronounce the wicked man an innocent: & that he visiteth the sinnes of the fathers vpon the children vnto the third and fourth generacion. But because they whiche attribute ouermuche vnto woorkes, and trust that by them to obteyne eternall life, are wont very often to alledge thys

place. I haue thought it good briefly to declare, what is to be thought concerning woorkes. But we shal afterward, more at large set forth and declare this thing, when we shall haue occasion to entreat of iustification. And those things whiche shall now be briefly spoken, we will afterward more largely discourse by partes severally. First, this is to be knowen, that we deny not that whych is here written, that vnto every man shalbe rendred accordinge to hys woorkes: But there is not so muche good in good woorkes, as eternall felicitie is good. Yea, ther is betwene these, a greater difference, then betwene heauē and earth. Moreover, there are no woorkes to be counted good, which leue not vnto faith, and haue not it for the roote, from whence they should spring forth. Therefore that which seemeth to be promised vnto woorkes, the same in very deede we obtaine by faith, which is garnished with those woorkes. And because faith taketh hold of the mercy of God, and promises in Christ, therefore through the mercy and Christ, whiche are the objectes of faith, shall we be made blessed. These are the true and chiefest causes of eternall life: the clemency (I say) of God, election, predestination and the merites of Christ. But God in the holie scriptures oftentimes addeth woorkes, thereby to stirre vs up, beinge otherwise sluggish and slothfull, to lye vprightly. And he adorneth woorkes with this kinde of honor, that he promisseth vnto them excellent rewardes. Whiche thing if we will more narrowly consider, let vs with diligence weigh, what the most high iudge shall in the last iudgemente, saye. For he will make examination of good woorkes, & will say that he was fed with meate and drinke, and visited &c. But after this commendation of woorkes, when he iudgeth vnto the sayntes the kingdome and eternall life, he expreth the principallest cause, that maketh vs happy & blessed. For he sayth, Come ye blessed of my Father, and possesse the kingdome which was prepared for you before the beginning of the worlde. These he pronounceth to be the causes of our blessednes: namely, that we are deare vnto God, and haue geuen vnto vs the blessinge of predestination and election. And therefore sayth he, that the kingdome was prepared for vs, from the beginninge of the worlde. Woorkes in deede are to be had, but not as causes. Therefore Christ admonished vs, saying, When ye haue done all these thinges, say, We are vnprofitable seruants; we haue done but those thinges, which we ought to do. Neither passe wee any thyng vpon theyr caueling which say, that therefore we are vnprofitable seruantes, because our good woorkes do bringe no commoditie vnto God: Forasmuche as God needeth none of our good woorkes. But say they, it ought not to be denied but that we are by good woorkes profitable vnto our selues. We graunt in deede that it is profitable vnto vs, that we liue well. But that vtility is not to be attributed vnto our woorkes, that they should be causes of our blessednes to come. For we haue nothing in vs, whereby we can make God obstricte and bounde vnto vs. For whatsoever we do, the same do we wholly owe vnto God, and a great deale more then we are able to performe. Wherefore as Christ admonished, The Lord geueth not thanks vnto his seruant, when he hath done his duty. And if the seruant by well doing cannot binde his Lord to geue him thanks, how shall he binde him to render vnto him great rewardes? Therefore the name of merite, if we will speake properly, oughte vtterly to be banished out of our mouthes. I know that the Fathers sometimes vled that word, but yet not properly. But that word is not found at al in the holy scriptures. For the nature of merite is, that there be a iust proportion and equall consideration betwene that which is geuen, and that which is taken. But betwene the good thinges, which we looke for, and those thinges which we eyther suffer or do, there is no proportion or agreement. For Paul sayth: That the passions, of this time are not woorthy the glory to come which shalbe reueled in vs. Further, merite hath layned vnto it debt, whych thyng Paul testifieth, when he sayth, That vnto hym which woorketh rewarde is rendred accordinge to debte, and is not imputed accordinge to grace. Which selfe same Paul yet writeth expressedly, that the grace of God is eternall life.

I.iii.

Life is a
lent.

Lastlye vnto the nature of merite there is required, that that whiche is geuen pertayne vnto the geuer, and be not due vnto hym whiche receaureth it. But woorkes are not of our selues, for they are called the giftes of God, whiche he woorketh in vs. Wherefore Augustine very wisely sayth: That God doth crowne his giftes in vs. Now if our woorkes be due vnto him (whiche thinge we cannot deny) then vndoubtedly the nature of merite is utterly taken away. Eternal life is sometimes in the holy scriptures called a reward: But then is it not that reward, which Paule writeth to be geuen according to debte: but is all one as if it shoulde be called a recompensation. Gods will and pleasure was, that there shoulde be this connexion, that after good woorkes shoulde follow blessednes: but yet not as the effecte followeth the cause, but as a thinge ioyned with them by the appointmente of God. Therefore we may not truste vnto woorkes, for they are feeble and weake, and do alwayes wauer and stagger. Wherefore the promises of God depende not of them: neither haue they in themselves, as they come from vs, that they can moue God to make vs blessed. We say therefore, that God iudgeth according to woorkes, because accordinge as they are eyther good or euill, we shall obtayne eyther eternal life or eternal damnation. But thereby it followeth not, that woorkes are the causes of our saluation. Our sense iudgeth, that these two thinges are repugnant the one to the other: that a thinge shoulde be geuen freely, and yet neuertheles woorkes shoulde be required. But yet is not this iudgement true. For they most aptlye agree together, as it shall afterward in hys place be declared. We haue nowe sufficiently spoken as touchyng this kynde of speache bled of Paule and of the Scripture. And those thinges which we haue nowe alleaged, shall in their places be more diligently examined euery one by themselves.

Vnto them which by patience in well doying seke glory and honour, and immortality: eternal life. But vnto them that are contentious, and disobey the truth, and obey vnrightheousnes: indignation and wrath. Tribulation and anguish vppon the soule of euery man that doth euill, of the Jewe first and also of the Grecian. But vnto euery one that doth good: glory, honour, and peace, vnto the Jewe first and also vnto the Grecian. For there is no respect of persons before God.

Vnto those which by patience in wel doing, seke glory, & honor, & immortality: lyfe eternall.] Ambrose readeth, that glory & honour, & immortality, shall be rendered vnto them which seke for eternal lyfe. Which thinge wycked men do not, who rather labour by all meanes to aduance themselves vnto the honours, riches and pleasures of this world, which is to liue wickedly. But godly and holy men do seke eternal lyfe, that they may redely moue themselves to knowe and to loue God, to worship hym, and to deserue well of their neighbours. Whiche selfe thing is eternal lyfe, but yet as now begon: and shall be accomplished in another world. The scripture bleseth by eternal life to signify the blessednes which we loke for. For among other thinges, life (as Aristotle writeth in hys Politikes) hath in it selfe many commodities. And therfore men suffer many and greuous thinges to retayne it still: vnlesse peradventure beyng overcome with the burthen of miseries, they wishe for death. But this is the playner readyng, to say, that God geueth eternal lyfe vnto those, whiche by patience in well doying doo seke glory, honour, and immortality. Vndoubtedly the saintes in liuyng well, do seke to be renewed vnto the image of God, after which followeth glory, honour and immortality. And immortality is set in the last place, lest they shoulde be thought to seke the glory and hono<sup>r</sup> of this world. For those things do quickly perishe: and are offered by those men, which are easely chaunged: and we which

receaue them here, haue but a short tyme to lyue here. But those thinges which we seeke for, are euerlastyng and immortall.

By patience in well doynge. This he therefore saith, because as he writeth in an other place, They which will liue godly in Christ, shall suffer persecution. And not only the deuill & our flesh, but also wicked men do withstand good workes. And soasmuch as among good workes these are the principallest, wherby we helpe our neighbours to the obteynement of true, sound, and firme good thinges, by teachyng, admonishing and correctyng them, therfore vnto them aboue other thinges we apply our selues. But they on the other side doe sometimes take it greuously, and do stirre by persecutions agaynst vs, as it happened vnto the prophetes, Apostles, and Martyrs. But we ought not for all that to cease. Augustine in his 50. epistle willed that the Donatistes, although they wickedly and cruelly raged against the Catholikes, should yet not be forsaken. And he bringeth a similitude of horses and mules, which kicke and bite, when their sores are in curing, and yet men cease not from healyng them. Which duety if it be performed vnto beastes, vndoubtedly much more ought it to be performed vnto men. It is assuredly a thing very hard, with a balaunt mynde to suffer lettes and impediments, which hinder good workes. But all thynges whiche are excellent are hard. And soasmuch as we all in a maner desire eternall lyfe, we ought to take vpo vs this patience in well doynge. And it is not from the purpose to consider, howe the saintes may clayme vnto themselves this patience, soasmuch as we dayly sinne: and if we shall say that we haue no sinne, we deceaue our selues. The answer, that there are two kinds of fallings. There are certain which are in a manner dayly, comming from a wicked lust, which is grafted in vs by reaso of original sinne: which also therfore is yet of force in the regenerate, because they are not yet fully restored, neyther do they alwayes behaue themselves accordyng to the principle and ground of regeneration. They are by reason of infirmity and indiscretenes rapt and violently drawen by the enticements of this worlde: but it alwayes greueth them, they resiste, and desire to be rid therof. Therefore they say together with Paul: Now not I worke it, but sinne which dwelleth in me. Wherfore so longe as they be so affected, and that they cease not of from endenouring themselves to fulfill the will of God, they are sayde to perseuer, and to exercise patience in well doynge. But when they fall into more heynouler sinnes, as did David and Peter, then thys longe sufferynge is somewhat interrupted: but because (soasmuch as they pertayne vnto the elect) they are called backe to repentance, they are forgivenen that which they haue committed, and God no more imputeth it vnto them. Therefore they are iudged accordyng to the good workes which they haue done before the fall, and do after the fall: so that that cutting of of the perseuerance, which is now blotted out by repentance, remaineth no more. Now we will also entreate of those, whiche in the last tyme of their life repent: which as it should seeme cannot be iudged accordyng to their good workes, whereof before they had none: neyther vnto them can be attributed patience, and long suffering in well doynge.

But it is to be noted, that sayth can neuer be without good workes. Therefore these men, if they beleue, although they repent in the last houre, yet vndoubtedly shall they not be without good workes. Which thinge the example of the thiefe declareth, who repented in a maner at the very point of death, and was saved. For he, being conuerted vnto God, confessed Christ, acknowledged his sinnes, exhorted his neighbour, and earnestly prayed for the obteynement of his owne saluation. By all which thinges we may see, how diligently & earnestly if he had had space to liue, he would haue applied himselfe vnto good workes. What shall we say to infantes, which dye in Christ. They, soasmuch as by reason of age they are as yet not able to do any thing, are to be exempted out of the number of them, vnto whome shalbe rendered accordyng to their workes. For Paul speaketh of them whiche be of full age, who mought haue brought

And that which Chrysostome writeth, that this place teacheth vs, not in any wise to put our trust in sayth only, sozasmuch as befoze þe iudgement seate of God, woꝝkes also shalbe examined, this his saying (I say) must be warily taken. For true sayth neuer wanteth iust woꝝkes. But Chrysostome in that place taketh sayth, for that credulity whiche wicked men oftentymes boast of: which is rather an opinion and bayne perswasion, then that it can be called sayth: which selfe same, Iames calleth a dead sayth. And sozasmuch as it is sayd to be deade, it can in no case be true sayth. As that man which certaynly is dead, is no moze sayd to be a man. Wherefoze Ambrose vpon thys place hath made the thing playne, saying: That we haue neede not only of profession, but also of good life. Wherefoze where men do woꝝke wickedly, and yet in the meane tyme boast of sayth, it is rather a bayne profession, then a Christian sayth.

But vnto those that are contentious, and which obey not the truth, but obey vnrighteousnes. Here is expessed the other part of iustice, namely, that whereby sinners are most woꝝthely punished. And by two signes he expresseth such as are wicked, in that as touching rules of doctrine: they are contentious: and as touching manners, they obey not the truth, but vnrighteousnes. Contention which is here ment, is when a thing without iust cause, and with a moze vehement strife then is nedefull is taken in hand to be defended. And oftentymes it happeneth, that contentious men labour to defend that, which in their mynde and conscience they beleue not to be true: but only study to get the victory. Wherefoze they do nothing with any mediocritye, but altogether with most vehemency and they are so tossed with the perturbacion of the mynde that they alwayes farther and farther depart fro the truth. Howbeit there is some kinde of contention, which is pardonable, namely that which is taken in hand for the defence of the truth. And such contention is without obstinacy, whiche thing we may behold in Paul. For he, as soone as he knew himselfe to be deceaued, abode not still stubburnely in hys purpose: but straight waye sayde, Lord, what wilt thou that I shall do? But these men whom God will thus punish, are in prosecuting their matters not a whit better then they were in rules of doctrine, because they obey not the truth which they know: yea rather they hold it captiue with themselves, as we haue befoze hard: and are obedient vnto vnrighteousnes. For truth and iust are euer present with men, to geue counsell and perswade them in intreating of matters. In the wicked the woꝝser counsellor namely lust, prevaileth: and so they are miserably deceaued. Which thing the Apostle expresseth in hys latter Epistle to the Thessalonians the second chapter: where he writeth, that Antichrist shall come with power, with signes, and lying waytes, and with all manner of deceite of vnrighteousnes in those which perishe: because that they receaued not the loue of the truth, to the ende they mought haue bene saued. Therefore shall God send vpon them the efficacy of illusion, to beleue lyes. But this vnrighteousnes, which they obey, is afterward in the 7. chapter called The law of the members, namely, because wicked luste is, from the fall of the first parentes, ingenerate in men, and is objected to our mynde by the ministry of Sathan who vseth it as a most apte instrument for his purpose.

Vnto these me(I say) shalbe indignatio, & anger, & afflictio, & anguish against every soule of man that committeth euill, of the Jew first, and also of the Grecian. Betwene θυμὸς, that is, indignation, and ὀργή, that is, anger, semeth to be a difference, for that θυμὸς, it is a moze vehementer impulsio or motion, and ὀργή, a moze easier: which differences yet haue no place in the high iudge. For God is not troubled with these affections. But the scripture vseth thys trope or figure, to set forth the vengeance whiche followeth these thinges: whiche afterward is expessed, in that he addeth, Affliction and anguish. And as touching anguish, which in Greke is called σπασμὸς, we must vnderstand, that the minde of man delighteth in liberty. Wherefoze whe we are brought to such a straight, that we can not by any meanes, eether moue our selues or els fynde a way out,

thinke we to be most greuous vnto vs. And by these wordes is described the great punishment, and a desperation of the felicity to come.

Agaynst euey soule] There are some which by this place argue, that ther-foze is mencion made of the soule, because the affliction thereof shalbe a greate deale moze greuous then the affliction of the body. But me thinketh it is moze playne to say, that after the Hebrew maner by the soule is signified, the whole man, or to speake moze vprightly, all the powers and partes of man. Neyther doth this any thing let, that here in the texte man is put in the genetive case, and because the Jew and the Grecian is here expessed. For, that tendeth to thys ende, to comprehend all mankind: whiche Paule deuiderth into two partes, so that some he calleth Iewes, and other some Grecians, namely the Gentiles, as many as were not subiect vnto the law of Moses. And here the Apostle beginneth to ioyne the Jewes to the selfe same reprehension, which he vsed agaynst the Gen- tiles, because he entendeth to reprove them also. And easely by litle and litle he turneth his speach vnto the, vnto whom hereafter by name he speaketh, whē not much afterwarde he saith, Behold thou art called a Jew, and restest in the law &c. He therefoze geueth the fyrst place vnto the Jewes, because in the knowledge and vnderstanding of God and of righteousnes they had the principalite, if they be compared with other nations. Further soasmuch as Paule came of their kin-red, he rehearseth them in the first place, least he should seeme to spare his owne, when as he had sharply reproved the Ethnikes. It was meete also that they shoulde be named before Gentiles, to the ende they mought the moze grieuously be accused, and moze sharply punished, for that they were not ignozant both of the true God, and of the religion due vnto hym.

But glory, honour and peace to euey one that worketh good, to the Jewe first and also to the Grecian.] These wordes are so playne, that they neede no exposition. Onely thys thyng let vs note, that thys repeticion of felicity which abideth the godly, tendeth to thys ende, that they being allured with the hope thereof, might the moze earnestly repent.

For there is no respect of persons before God.] As touching Pauls methode in this reprehension of the Ethnikes, it is after this maner: As concerning the the fyrst part of knowledge, which is called contemplation, he hath proued that they knew God by the creatures, but when they knew him they worshipped hym not as they ought to haue done. Therefoze when they had geuen the glory of God vnto Idols, they were deliuered vpon by him vnto the lusses of their owne hart, vnto shamefull affections, and into a reprobate mynde. Moreouer as touching the other knowledge which consisteth in the doing of workes, he sheweth, that they knew right well the iustice of God. And that he thereby proueth in that they iudged vprightly, in geuing sentence vpon other men. But that which they so well knew, they performed not at all. For both they themselves lyued wickedly, and partly they consented vnto them which sinned and partly inseuerely punishing of others, they ouerhipped themselves. Which men he terrefied, in declaring vnto them, that they shoulde not escape the iudgement of God. And because they beleued not that the iudgement of God shoulde euer come, and that the prouidence of God had no care of thinges humane, because they saw by experience, that God ceased from punishing wickednes: against the first reason he layeth, that we knowe assuredly that the iudgement of God shalbe without doubt agaynst those which do such thinges: as touching the other reason, he sayd, that this long tarping of God shalbe recompensed with sharpenes of the punishment. Whiche yet in the meane tyme is to thys ende profitiable vnto them, that they might haue space to repent. Whiche thing if they do not they shall fall into the horrible iudgement of God. Of whiche iudgement he sayth, that he shall render vnto euey man according to their workes. And he deu-ided it into partes, namely, what the godly and what the vngodly shall looke for, and added moreouer, that neyther affection nor fauour shall there be of any foze:

force: and made equal the Iewes with the Gentiles, & the Gentiles with the Iewes wherof he now bringeth a reason, for that before God, there is no respect of persons. This I thought good the more largely to repeat, that the methode of those things which are spoken, might be thoroughly vnderstanded. But now let vs see whether this be altogether true, that God accepteth not persons, which is to deale in the cause according to the worthines or unworthines thereof, not hauing regarde to the conditions or states of them which are to be iudged. It seemeth vndoubtedly that God hath a respect vnto persons, because he gaue vnto the Iewes many good thinges, and that for this cause, namely, for that they pertained vnto Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob, and because they were of their seede & stocke. Yea when the people had made a calfe, and deserued worthely all of them to be destroyed, Moses prayed vnto the Lord, and although he confesseth that the cause deserued destruction, yet he desireth pardon for them, for Abraham, Isaac, & Iacobs sake, of whose stocke they came. And so he layd before God, not the cause, but the person. Yea, and in the 89. Psalm we reade of the seede of Dauid, that although they had prophaned the testament of God, and had forsaken his lawes, he would in deede visite them with the rod: Howbeit for his seruauent Dauid sake, he would not take from them his mercy. Is not this to accept persons: and not to weigh the causes? And in the ten commaundementes we reade, that he will do good vnto a thousand generations of them that feare hym and kepe his commaundement. And God was contente to spare the Sodomites, if there had bene but ten iust men amongst them. And he gaue vnto Paule all them that were in shippe, when they were in daunger of shipwracke. Neither spared he them for the iustnes of the cause, but because they sayled in the same ship together with Paule. To the ende these thinges may be more thoroughly vnderstanded, we must first declare what is in this place vnderstanded by the name of a person. And that is nothing els, as we now speake of it, then the condition or state, or a certaine quality geuen vnto vs, either of God through nature, or receiued by election. Of the first kinde are these, to be a man, or a woman: a father or a sonne: of this nation or of that: to be borne a prince or a subiect, a free man or a bondeman, and suche other lyke, taken. But these are taken of our owne will and accord, to be a minister of the church, to be a souldier or a handicraftes man, and such other lyke. In summe, a person consisteth by comparing of a man, either vnto an other man, or els vnto certaine thinges or faculties. For if Abraham be referred vnto Isaac, he is his father: if Salomon be referred vnto the Israelites, he is their kyng, if Aristotle be compared vnto sciences, he is bothe learned, and also a philosopher: if Cresus vnto riches, he is riche: vnto which selfe same riches, if Iru be referred, he is a begger. So haue we what a person signifyeth. Now let vs see the differences of persons. There are certain persons which may vtterly be without good workes, as the person of a father, or of a brother, of a riche man, or of a poore man. But certain cannot allwayes want good workes: as are the elect, the predestinate, the members of Christ, the faithfull, the partes of the church, and such other lyke. For it is not possible, that such men, although they sometymes fall, should vtterly be without good workes.

Thirdly, there are some persons so ioyned vnto the causes, that the cause can not be iudged, vnles there be a respect had vnto the person. As when one striketh a man whyles he executeth the office of a magistrate: or if he which liueth wickedly be a minister of the church, and such lyke. As touching those persons which are not vtterly without good workes, and which are necessary for our saluation, God hath so a respect vnto them, that if without the we shall appeare before his iudgement seat, we cannot be saued. But of this kynd of persons, this sentence of Paul is not to be vnderstand. But as touching those persons, whiche haue not eyther good or euill workes of necessity ioyned with them, we answer, that if the causes be so annexed, that in iudgement they either aggrauate or extenuate the person, then of necessity there must be a respect had vnto the person. Because accordyng to the saying of the Gospell, That seruauent shall be more greuouly punished whiche knoweth the wyll of his Lord and transgresseth it, then he which sinneth ignorauntly.

Wherefore there remaineth, that this place of the Apostle be vnderstanded of such persons persons as are seloynd from causes. Farther there is to be put great difference betwene, to accept a person in iudgement, & besides iudgement to geue vnto some one man any thing freely, and not geuing to an other. For this latter parte, no man can iustlye accuse. As if a man hauyng two debtors, shoulde requyre his debte of the one, and so geue the other, he of whome the debte is required, hath no cause iustly to complaine of his creditour: So likewise God, althoughe he cal one, and calleth not an other, because no merites went before in neyther of them, cannot be called an accepter of persons. Neither, if in rewarding those which labored but one houre in the vineyard, he would geue as great a reward vnto those, and to them which had labored in it all the whole day, ought he to be repponed? Because he defrauded not these men of the hire, for which he agreed with them. And vnto the other he would geue freely, that which they deserue not. But then should there be iust cause to complayne, if a thing should be geuen vnto one man, and an other vnto whome the selfe same thing is due, should be defrauded. And after the selfe same manner, forasmuch as God is bounde vnto no man, when he distributeth sondry giftes, it is lawfull for him to do with his owne what pleaseth him. For that in geuinge vnto some freely, he defraudeth not them of any thing due, whome he omitteth. These thinges hath Augustine against the two Epistles of the Pelagians, in his seconde booke and. 7. chap: vnto Bonifacius, where he thus writeth: Acceptation of persons is there rightlye sayde to be, where he which iudgeth, leauinge the deserte of the cause, whereof he iudgeth, geueth iudgemente with the one, against the other: because he findeth some thinge in the person, which is woorthy either of honor or of compassion. And straight way, he bringeth the similitude of the two debtors, and the parable of the vineyard, whereof we haue already spoken, and addeth: Euen as therefore here is no acceptation of persons, because one is in such manner freely honored, that an other is not defrauded of that his due: so also when according to the purpose of God one is called, and an other is not called, vnto him that is called a good gift is freely geuen, of which good gift the calling is the cause, vnto him that is not called is rendred euill, because all men are guilty, for that by one man, sinne entred into the world. These are Augustines wordes, vnto which, to the ende we may ouerthrow the argumentes, which we haue before recited, this is to be added: That, whatsoener good thing God of his liberality geueth vnto menne, the same undoubtedly proceedeth of his mercy and clemencye. And althoughe sometimes he pronounceth, that he will do good vnto some, eyther for they: progenitors sake, or els for they: prayers, these thinges he therfore speaketh, to stirre vs vp to liue well. Neither are these promises to be vnderstanded of the whole kindred of the posterity, or vniuersally. For God accordinge to his secret predestination, hath his choyce in the seede of the saintes, and in hearing of prayers which are made out of other men: Which thing may be sufficiently confirmed by examples. For althoughe the seede of Abraham were blessed: yet that blessing had place in Isaac, and not in Ismael. The same promise was made vnto Isaac, but it was performed in Iacob, and not in Esau. The common wealth of the Iewes had a promise, that it shoulde be preserved: but that promise was performed in the kingdome of the house of David, and not in the kingdome of the ten tribes. Wherefore, forasmuch as this choyce, which is accordinge to predestination, is utterly vnknowne vnto vs, we oughte not to lene vnto the person. And it commeth to passe perpetually, that they which are so chosen of God, are also adozned with good works. Wherefore God hath not a respect vnto the person: but as we haue sayd, iudgeth accordinge to the woorkes. And how little a respect of persons he sometimes hath: the place in the. 14. chap: of Ezechiel declareth: where it is saide: That the earth shalbe destroyed, forasmuch as it hath bene altogether viciate and corrupte. And though there stode vp in it, Noah, Iob, & Daniell, vndoubtedly they shall not detiner it, but shall deliuer theyr owne soules onely. Farther the benefites of God are eyther but for a time, which pertaine vnto this life: or els they are eternall, which belong vnto the chief felicity, of which Paul now intreateth, Who affirmeth that without Persons free from causes. Besides iudgemente somethinge may be geuen vnto one man freely, and an other of the same state and condition omitted.

God is bound to no man.

Those thinges which God geueth vnto men he geueth of his mercy.

The choyce which consisteth in predestination is both vnknowne vnto vs, & also leaueth not vnto persons. Two kindes of the benefites of God,

Cap.2 A Commentarie vpon the

respecte of persons it shal by the iust iudgement of God be either rewarded or denied. But as touching commodities, whiche dure but for a time, we doubt not but that God vbleth sometimes, either to hasten or to slacken them, at the prayers of holy men: which selfe thinge he attributeth also vnto the seede of the saints. But in this doing, he eyther prouoketh men to repentaunce, or els by his lenitye they bringe vnto themselves greater punishment. But as touching the eternal & chief felicitie, we haue now declared, y God hath made no promise generally for the sauing of any posteritie. Therefore the Jewes deserued woorthely to be reprobated, for that they promised vnto themselves onely so greate a thinge as thoughte for that they were of the seede of Abraham, they coude not perishe: Paul in this selfe same Epistle the 9. chap: most manifestly declareth, That not all they whiche are of Israell are Israelites, neyther because they were the seede of Abraham, therefore they were straight way all sons. But by Isaac (sayth he) shall thy seede be called, That is, Not they whiche are the children of the fleshe are the children of God: but the children of the promise, are counted for the seede. This sentence of the Apostle testifieth that whiche we haue sayd, namely, that the promises of God in this kinde were singular, and not vniuersal. And it is so: certaine, that in those which are chosen to saluacion,

There is no generall promise for the sauing of any posterity as touching eternall life.

The elect if they come to full age, shall undoubtedly haue good woorkes.

What Moses and the Prophets had a regarde vnto, when in they prayers they made mention of the names of certain of the electe.

are undoubtedly found good woorkes, if they come vnto full age. Therefore these thinges nothing let this sentence, which was alleaged, namely, that before God there is no acceptation of persons. And as often as we read in the prayers of Moses, or of the Prophets, that mention is made of the Patriarkes, whereby they endeouored themselves to prouoke God vnto mercy, we muste thinke that they had a regarde to two thinges. First, forasmuch as in that nation God had some appointed vnto himselfe, they desired that for theyr sakes he woulde spare the whole multitude. Secondlye, they attributed not these thinges vnto the merites of the saintes: which, as we haue sayd, are none: but they made mencion of the promises made vnto those fathers. Hereby therefore it is manifeste by what meanes those thinges which were objected may be answered. But now we let vs retourne to the exposition of the woordes of Paul.

For as many as haue sinned without the law, shall perishe also without the law: and as many as haue sinned in the law, shalbe iudged by the law. For the hearers of the law are not righteous before God: but the doers of the law shalbe iustified.

For as many as haue sinned &c.] Paul here teacheth that God in very dede hath no respect of persons, neyther in iudgement doth iniury vnto any man. He maketh the Jewes equall with the Gentles: forasmuch as of ech nation, they which haue liued wickedly, shall perishe. And as touching the maner of iudgement, the Jewes which shalbe condemned, shalbe iudged by the law of Moses, because they shall haue it, both to accuse them and to condemne them. But the Gentiles being wicked, shall neither be accused nor condemned by that law, but by the light of nature and euen by their own cogitations. By the law in this place we must vnderstand the law of Moses. For it only is perfect, and for it began all the contencion: otherwise there were none, or very fewe nations, which were not gouerned by some institutions or lawes. Here are added two preuentions. The first is, that it mought haue seemed wonderfull vnto the Jewes, that theyr cause should not be a whit better, forasmuch as they were adorned by God with the benefite of the law. Vnto whome, Paul answereth, that thereby they were rather the more greuously to be accused, because before God, not they which heare the law shalbe iustified, but they which do it. The other preuention is, so: that it seemed a hard thing vnto the Ethnikes, that they should perishe, when as they wanted the law of God. Vnto whome he sayth, ye were not vnto without a law. And two maner of wayes he proueth, that they had a law: first in that by nature they did those thinges which are prescribed by the law: secondly, because they had within themselves their owne cogitations, mutually ually accusing them, or excusing them. As touching the Jewes, he sharply reproveheth them, as which were of so small sound iudgement, that they iudged themselves to be therefore iustified, because they had receaved the lawe. And now he beginneth by litle and litle to come vnto them: which a litle afterward he doth more openly.

For (saith he) the hearers of the law shall not be iustified before God, but the doers. He therefore saith before God, because they before me wonderfully much boasted of the law, which they had receaved. God (saith he) nothing regardeth this. For there shall not be required of you, that ye receave the law, but that ye execute the law. The discourse which now is in hand, is touching the righteousness of the law, which alone they allowed. For touching the righteousness of sayth he will afterward plainly entreate. Now he cutteth their throttes with theyr owne sword, in defining the righteousness of the law, namely, that it bygeth dedes, and requireth works to the fulfilling thereof. Whereby he calleth the backe to consider their owne life. Neither saith he in the meane time, that me can not be otherwise iustified: but only sheweth vnto the, that they haue falle away fro the righteousness of the law, wherof they so much boasted. That therefore which he now saith, hath this sence: If any man should by the righteousness of the law be iustified before God, it behoueth, that the same should fulfil the law according to that saying: Cursed be he which abideth not in all the things which are writen in the booke of the lawe. This is an easy & plaine exposition. But Augustine in his booke de Spiritu & litera ad Marcellinum, is of this minde: that the doers of the law are iustified, but yet in such sort, that righteousness goeth before the good works which the saintes do. For they are first iust, before they do iust works. But because he seeth that this word of iustifying is in the future tence, and by that meanes is signified that men shall not be iustified, vnles they first haue good works, therefore he addeth: that to be iustified in this place, is not first to receave righteousness, but to be counted righteous: so that the sence is, they shalbe counted for righteous, which shalbe doers of the law, but they ought first by sayth to haue receaved righteousness, whereby they were made iust: but afterward they shalbe made known by the effectes, & as they were before iust, so now shal they be counted for iust. And the like kinde of speach (saith he) is in this sentence when we pray, Thy name be sanctified. Where we desire not that the name of God should be made holy, as though before it were not holy: but we desire that it may be of men counted holy. This is Augustines exposition.

The righteousness of the law requireth dedes and works.

Calowed be thy name, how it is to be expounded,

For when the Gentiles which haue not the law, do by nature the thinges contayned in the law, they hauing not the lawe, are a lawe vnto themselves, whiche shewe the effect of the law in theyr hartes, their conscience also bearing witnes, and their thoughtes accusing one an other or excusing, at the day when God shall iudge the secretes of men by Iesus Christ, according to my Gospell.

For when the Gentiles &c.] Now cometh he vnto the Gentiles: which ought not to complayne, though they perished, seing they had not the lawe of Moses. For hee declareth that they were not utterly without a lawe, because they did by nature those thinges which were contayned in the law. And when hee sayth, by Nature, he doth not utterly exclude the helpe of God. For all truth that men knowe, is of God, and of the holy ghost. And nature here signifieth that knowledge, which is grafted in the myndes of men. Euen as in the eyes of the body, God hath plated the power of seinge. Neither doth Paul in this place entreate of strength, by which the Gentiles being holpe performed these things: For, that shall afterward be declared, how by the spirite and grace of Christ the power to lyue vprightly is ministred vnto the regenerate. But now he speaketh onely of certayne outward honest and vpright actions, which as touching ciuill righteousness, might by nature be performed of men. Neither sayth hee, that the Ethnikes fully performed the lawe, so that they kept it all whole, or that by cause of it they were iustified: but onely hee vnderstandeth that they performed some certaine pointes thereof. Whereof hee inferreth, that they by the light of nature could discern betwene honesty and dishonesty, betwene right and wrong. Yea if we looke vpon the lyfe and maners of Cato, Atticus, Socrates, and Aristides, we shall see that in iustice & ciuill comelynes they farre excelled a great many Christians, yea and also Iewes. Therefore they can not excuse them selues, that they had not a law. Ambrose vpon this place, for asmuch as by this sentence, to do those thinges whiche are of the law, he vnderstandeth the full and absolute accomplishment of the law, and saith not how it is possible, that any man should performe it, whiche beleueth not in Christ (for asmuch as Christ is the ende of the law) affirmeth, that Paul here speaketh of such Gentiles, as were now conuerted vnto the Gospel, and beleued in Christ. This kynd of men, without the helpe of the law of Moses did those thynges whiche are contayned in the law. Augustine in this booke De Spiritu & litera ad Marcellinum, is of the same opiniō, that by the Gentiles, are vnderstanded the Christians whiche were conuerted fro the Ethnikes: for he herein putteth the difference betwene the old Testament and the new, namely, that in the old Testament the law was described in outward tables: but in the new Testament it should be written in the hartes and bowels of men, accordyng to the Prophecie of Jeremy in hys 31. chap. Wherefore, sayng Paul here sayth, that the Gentiles, whiche by nature fulfilled the law, shewed the worke of the law written in their hartes: it could not (sayth he) but pertayne vnto the new Testament. And bycause he saw that this was agaynst hym, where it is sayd, by nature, he sayth, that by that worde is excluded the law of Moses: but not the grace and spirite of Christ, by which, nature is not ouerthrowen, but restored to hys old estate, wherfore hys mynde is that the Gentiles fulfill the lawe by nature, beyng reformed by the spirite and grace. But nowe let vs see, how those thinges whiche Augustine & Ambrose alleage agree with the sentence of the Apostle. Vndoubtedly that whiche moued Ambrose to this exposition is very weake: for asmuch as there mought haue bene many before the coming of Christ, whiche beleued in hym, and were iustified, and obserued the thynges contayned in the law, so much as the infirmitie of man will suffer. Iob was an Ethnike, who yet was not ignorant of Christ: and also at the preaching of Daniell, the kyng of Babilon, and (as it is easie to be beleued) together with hym, many of the Chaldeans were conuerted vnto God: & as it is written in Ionas the Ninuities returned into the right way. And sayng all these attayned vnto saluation, vndoubtedly they looked for the Mediator to come, and by that meanes endeavored to performe those thynges whiche pertayned vnto the law. Neither hath the reason of Augustine much force. For although it be a promise of the new Testament, that by the benefite of the holy Ghost the lawes of God should be written in the hartes of men, yet is not that so to be vnderstand, as though before the coming of Christ the same happened vnto none. For the good fathers, and holy Prophetes, whiche were both endued with the sayth of Christ, and had also geuen vnto them the holy Ghost, had the law grauen not onely in stoness, but also in theyr bowels. And although they liued, before the sonne of God tooke fleshe vpon him, yet for asmuch as they beleued in him, they pertayned vnto the Gospel. Whiche is not therefore called a new Testament, bycause the thyng is new: but onely bycause it was published abroad in the latter tymes, and was then publickely receaued. Wherefore although before the preaching of the Apostles, it was not publickely professed among the Gentiles, yet flourished it among many of the Ethnikes, in whose hartes the law of God was sealed: so that although they wanted the doctrine of Moses yet were they so much rightly instructed, that they could frame theyr actions vnto the preceptes of God. And yet the same Augustine in the booke before cited, the 7. chap. bringeth the selfe same exposition, whiche we before brought: namely, by these thinges may be vnderstanded of certeine excellent actions of the Ethnikes, whiche were notwithstanding vngodly. Their excellent workes, although as touching thyng them they were sinnes, yet of their owne nature or kynde, for asmuch as they agreed with those thynges whiche God commaunded in the law, could not be condemned by the iudgement of mā. But that they were wicked before God, therfore it is not to be doubted, bycause they were not referred to the right end. Augustine noteth the same and addeth, that therfore the worke of the law is sayd to be wrytten in the hartes of the infidels, bycause the lineamentes of the first estate still abode. Hereof we gather, that the wryting of the lawe of God in the hartes of men, is after two sortes: one is, which serueth only to knowledge and iudgement: the other is, which besides that addeth both a readines, and also strength to doe that which is iudged to be iuste and honest. And the Image of God, vnto which man is created, is not, as touching this, by hys fall utterly blotted out, but obfuscated, and for that cause hath nēde to be renued by hyū. So naturall knowledges are not fully quenched in our mindes, but much of them do still remaine: which thyng Paule now toucheth. Wherefore, the difference betwene the olde Testament and the newe, abydeth whole: although Paule so speaketh of the vngodly Ethnickes, that they had the worke of the lawe wrytten in their hartes. Neither is it sayd, that because of these thynges which they did or knewe, they attayned vnto the true righteousnes. Yea rather when Paule had shewed, that they wanted it, he styreth them by vnto Christ. Chrysostome in dede bypon thys place, wryteth: that God made man αυτάρκης, that is, sufficient of himselfe to eschewe vices, and to embrace vertue. Whiche if he vnderstande of man as he was first created, is true. But after hys fall it is not to be graunted, for asmuch as without Christ we can doe nothyng of our selues: yea, by our owne strengthes we can not so much as thinke any good thyng, much lesse to doe any thyng. Unless peraduenture he vnderstand this as touching the knowledge of iustice and byrightnes in generall, wherof we doe now speake. For the self same father in an other place more then once anoucheth, that we haue altogether nēde of the grace of Christ. That which the Apostle now maketh mention of, touching the knowledge of the Gentiles, is very apte to repell the slanderous talke of the vngodly, which vse to say: Why came not Christ before? How was mankinde prouided for before hys comming? What wrought hys prouidence then? By these thynges which are now spoken, thou now perceauest, that mankinde was then also prouided for. For as touching knowledge they had inough, whether we vnderstand that, which pertayneth vnto contemplation: or that which is directed to working and doing. Wherefore, before the coming of Christ they dyd vniuersally complaine, that they were forsaken, when as they had knowledge, and thought not them selues to want sufficient strengthes.

Theyr thoughtes accusing one an other or excusing. ] Now byngeth he an other reason, wherby he proueth that the Ethnickes had a law, because they were not without accusations & excusations of the conscience: which were most manifest testimonies of the knowledge grafted in vs by nature. And by this self same argument may probablie be inferred, that the iudgement of God shall at length come. For if our minde do iudge with it self touching those thyngs which we doe, what will God at the length doe, which hath ingrafted these iudgements in the mindes of men?

Accordyng to my Gospell. ] He calleth it hys Gospell, partly because hee toke much labour in preaching of it, and partly for the exceeding great affection that he had towarde it, & for that he was appointed to publishing of it abroad.

In the daye of the Lorde. ] Then shall our cogitations be both accusers, and also witnesses of all our doinges: and by them shall the Ethnickes be iudged. Now for that we are drawen away by the entisementes and lustes of thys lyfe, we doe consider them not: but then shall the Lorde byng them forth to light: Who (as it is wrytten in the first Epistle to the Corinthians) shall illuminate the hidden workes of darkenes. By thys place we see, that the iudgement of God is a part of the Gospell: forasmuch as it is profitable to styre by to repentance. Moreouer as touching the godly it is a glad tidings: For Christ sayd: When these thynges shall begynne to come to passe, then lift up your heades: for your redemption draweth nye.

eth nye. And although God will render vnto every man according to his workes, yet will he not render like for lyke. For we shall receaue farre much more, then our workes haue deserued. And they which shall be condemned, shall be lesse punished, then the greatnes of their sinnes requireth. And as touchyng these excusing cogitations, Augustine in hys booke which we haue now cited, writeth, that they shall not obtaine forgiveness. Howbeit they may obtaine a more easer punishment. For the paynes of the damned shall not be a lyke. And he vseth thys similitude: that euen as there are certayne veniall sinnes, which can not let but that the godly may obtaine felicitie: so are there certayne excellent workes being of their own kind good, which yet shall not deliuer the damned. And as y<sup>e</sup> lyfe of every one, be he neuer so holy, can not wante small sinnes: so the life of no mā though he be most wicked, can be so filthye, but that it may in y<sup>e</sup> meane time haue some excellent worke annexed vnto it. And after thys maner doth the Apostle close vp the accusation of the Gentiles, making mention againe of the last iudgement. And when he sayth: Beholde thou arte called a Iewe, he beginneth his accusation agaynst the Jewes: which consisteth of these principall pointes. First, he setteth forth the excellent giftes wherewith God had adorned them: afterward he addeth how they had abused them: thirdly, he expoundeth what it is to be truly a Iewe, & what true Circumcision is. Afterward he declareth, that those giftes of God bestowed vpon the Jewes, could not by thē be so contaminated, that they should not be esteemed and praysed. But yet by them the Jewes had no matter wherby to preferre them selues before the Gentiles, when as they liued wickedly. For theyr filthye life made them equal to the Gentiles: which thing in the laste place he maketh playne by testimonie of the Scriptures. He reproved the Gentiles before the Jewes, that by the former reprehension, he myght prepare hys waye to the latter. For the Jewes were haughty, neyther could they easilie abide one to reprove them. Farther, if the Apostle hadde fyrst accused them, he might haue seemed more extreme against his owne nation then was mete: especially sozasmuch as he was accused of the false Apostles, that he was an Apostata from the law, and that he had filthily fallen from the Jewish religion. The summe of the reprehension of the Jewes, is, that they by professiō and not by life measured their righteousness. First of all, he maketh mention of the giftes which were geuen vnto the Jewes, and reduceth them in a maner to thre principall pointes. The first is the dignity of the name, which came vnto them by the kinrede and holy sede of the fathers. The second is, that they knewe the will of God by the law geuen vnto their elders. The third, that they were appointed to teach other nations. These were in dede excellent things, but yet they nothing helped them: because they both degenerated from their fathers, as touching honesty and iustice: and also by their sinnes they repugned the law, which they had receaued: and mozeouer, because they neglected themselves, and much lesse did they teach other people. But herein the Apostle chiefly maketh mention of those thinges which they had frely receiued. For they were not bestowed vpon them for any merite of theirs.

Beholde thou art called a Jew, and restest in the law, and gloriest in God, and knowest hys wyll, and allowest the thynges that are excellent, in that thou art instructed by the lawe: and perswadest thy selfe that thou art a guide of the blynde, a lyghte of them which are in darkenes. An instructor of them whiche lacke discretion, a teacher of the vnlerned: which hast the forme of knowledge and of the truth in the law.

Behold thou art called a Jew. In this place there is two maner of readyngs. The Latines seme to haue read, id est, that is, and if. But in the Greke copies it is written by Id est simple, id est, that is, Behold or see. But whether of them thou readest, it skilleth not much: saue onely that to the purpose of the Apostle, & con-

nerion together of his speeches, that which is in the Greeke semeth to be more apte. The name of a Jew was no lesse set by at that tyme, then the name of a Christian is at this time. Undoubtedly, it was an honourable stocke: But Paul saith wisely, cognominaris, which signified, thou art so called: for he wil not graue vnto them, that they were in dede Jewes. Neither could he: when as afterward he sayth: That he is truly a Jew, whiche is a Jew in secret: and that that is the true Circumcision, which is marked, not in the flesh, but in the hart.

And retest in the law. This is nothing els, but wth a certayne bayne boasting to delight himselfe by reaso<sup>n</sup> of the law: wherunto perauenture, they wer moued by reason of those things which are w<sup>ri</sup>tten in Deut. the 4. chapter. Namely, That other nations should wonder at the publike wealth of the Israelites, whiche had so noble and excellent lawes. David also sayd, That it was not so done vnto other nations

And boastest in God. Because as it is w<sup>ri</sup>tten in the 17. chap. of the booke of Genesis, God had made a league with Abraham and with all his posterity. These thinges undoubtedly, had bene vnto them great honour and estimation, if they had broght forth fruit accordingly. For to come of godly elders, is a gift of God not to be despised. Moreouer, to rest in the law, so that thou wholly quietest thy selfe in it, and art so content with the commaundementes of God, that thou failest not vnto thy selfe any other, is a thyng wo<sup>r</sup>thy of prayse. And lykewyse to count the true God for God, may be ascribed vnto glory, and that to sound glory. But they onely boasted in these thinges, glorying in themselves of these bayne titles.

And knowest his will, and allowest the things that are excellent beyng instructed by the law. To know the will of God, is a great benefite of his. But that cometh by the instruction of the scripture. For no where els is the knowledge of the will of God to be sought for. Out of it we learn to allow most best thinges, so y<sup>e</sup> thereby we are able to discerne them from things filthy & vile. In Greeke is red διαπορρα, which is turned, things excellent. Augustine in his booke de spiritu & Litera readeth Distantia, that is, thinges different: because those things which are excellent, are different from meane thynges. The Latin interpreter turneth it Vtilia, that is, thinges profitable, because peraduenture (as Erasmus admonisheth) διαπορρα, in Greeke is to profite. Farther this verbe δοκιμαζαν, which is, to allow, is here taken otherwise, then it was in the first chapter. Forasmuch as here it is referred onely vnto iudgement: but there it is referred to that allowing, whereby we do in very deepe and actes declare that which we iudge.

And persuadest thy selfe that thou art a guide of the blynde, a lyghte of them whiche are in darkenesse. An instructor of them whiche lacke discretion, a teacher of the vnlearned. He sayth not that these men performed those thynges, but that they went about arrogantly to clayme them vnto themselves. For they both iudged and also spake most contemptuously of other nations: whome in comparison of themselves they counted to bee blynde and lyuers in darkenesse, vndiscrete, and vnlearned. And also they so vsurped vnto themselves the office of teaching others, that Christ saide they went about sea and land, to adioyne vnto themselves proselites, whome they made not the children of God, but the children of hell fyre. And whiche was worst of all, as Christ vpb<sup>re</sup>adeth the, they had take away the key of knowledge by clayming it vnto themselves: when as neyther they themselves would enter into the kingdom of heauen, nor yet would they suffer others to enter therein. They shewed themselves to be masters, when as yet they were blynde. Vnto whom the Lord sayd: If the blynde leade the blynde, they shall both fall into the ditch. And in Esay the 42. chapter we reade, Who is blynde but my seruant? Also in the 9. of Iohn: If ye were blynde ye should haue no sinne. But now because ye saye, we see, your sinne abideth.

Having the forme of knowledge. Chrysostome thinketh, that μωσαϊσμός, that is a forme, signifieth not here, the true maner of knowing whiche hath in it nothing that is filthy, but only a shew thereof.

Where the forme of doctrine should be had.

Hauiing the forme of knowledge, and of the truth in the lawe.] We should vndoubtedly haue the forme of our doctrine in our selues, and not in the law, or in bookes, as Chrysostome here noteth. For as they are not very well learned, which are wise only by reading commentaries: so they are not to be counted iust, which put they; righteousness in lawes or in decrees. For Iohn sayth, Hereby we know, that we loue God, if we obserue his commaundementes.

Thou therefore which teachest an other, teachest thou not thy selfe: thou that preachest, a man should not steale, doost thou steale?
Thou that sayest a man should not commit adultery, doost thou commit adultery: thou that abhorrest Idols, committest thou sacridedge: Thou that gloziest in the law, through breaking the law dishonorest thou God: For the name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles through you, as it is written.

The figure of interrogation.

How Paule here speaketh of the Jewes.

Thou therefore vvhich teachest an other, teachest thou not thy selfe:] This figure of interrogation is of great efficacy in reproofing. But were all the Je-wes such? No vndoubtedly but Paule here speaketh of them, Christ being excluded: as the Gospel is set agaynst the lawe. There were some of the fathers very holy, which so liued in the Jewische religion, that yet neuertheless they most perfectly beleued in Christ. But they were not such as Paule here describeth.
They were blessed vndoubtedly, not because they had receaued the law, but because they were occupied in it both day & night. But these me, of whom is now intreated, knew the law in deede, but they knew it not as they ought to haue done. The summe of Pauls reason is this, that to receaue the law, iustifyeth not. For if it should iustifye, then vndoubtedly all the Jewes should be both iust and holy: when as they all had receaued the law, and professed the same.
And that they were not holy and iust, it is partly alreedy declared, and partly shall now more largely be shewed: wherefore to haue receaued the lawe iustifyeth not.

In explication of Pauls reason as gaynst the Jewes.

The Jewes
could not abide to be taught of others.

Thou vvhich teachest an other, teachest thou not thy selfe.] They coulde not abyde to be taught of others, as it appeareth by the words which they spake to hym that was borne blynd: Art thou altogether borne in sinne: and teachest thou vs? They ought at the least to haue taught them selues: which thing so much as they did not, but regarded only how to instruct other men what they should do, they were like the figge tree, which had leaues without fruite, and by the curse of Christ withered away. That which he before spake of the Gentiles:
Thou condemnest an other, and doost the selfe same thinges whiche thou condemnest:
now he pronounceth of the Jewes, that they taught others, and ouerhipped themselves. Without doubt in thinges pertayning vnto this world, we are not of that disposition. For you shall not see one, that will so distribute almes, but that he will first prouide of his goodes for himselfe. How commeth it then, that we inculcate our doctrine to others, whiche we our selues receaue not? Chryso-stome compareth this kinde of men with a paynter, whiche hath before his eyes an excellent table, whiche hee perpetually beholdeth, and yet neuer taketh any thyng out of it. Paul had sayd before, that not the hearers of the lawe but the doers shalbe iustified. But now hee reproveth the preachers, whiche performe not the thynges that they teache. Wherefore we may conclude, that it is not enough either to preache, or to heare sounde doctrine, vnles the same bee put in execution.

A similis-
tude.

It is not enough to heare or to preach the word of God.

What thest
is,

Thou that preachest, A man should not steale, doost thou steale?] Hee obte-cteth vnto the Jewes those thynges, whiche were commonly committed of them.
And to reprove them he bleth that parte of the law, wherof none was ignorant, namely, the x. commaundementes. And as touching thest, thest is, when we withhold

hold that which is an other mans agaynst the owners will: or whē we by iniury draw vnto vs other mens goodes: or whē we distribute not that which is ours whē neede requireth. And there are also many other kindes of theft. But in the Decaloge, or x. commaūdemēts, the chief purpose is onely to set forth the chiefe somme, & that but rudely & grossely, vnder which we ought to vnderstand all the partes therof. The ground & somme of all theft is concouensnes: eue as in filchy pleasures is exprested onely adultery: vnder which are comprehended all kindes of vnclea-nes. And as touching idolatry, there is forbidden al kinde of false woozshipping: when yet onely is exprested, that which is most grosse. For there is forbidden vs any straunge God, and there are forbidden also grauen images, and sondye formes. Wherefore it is our part, when anye of the ten commaūdemētes of God forbideth vs any thinge, well to consider, what things are comprehended vnder that vice. And afterward to secke out the roote, agaynst which we muste to our power resist. Couetousnes, or theste herebence springeth, for that we distrust in God, and are allwayes afrayde, least we should wante. But adultery & all vncleannes of the fleshe springeth of the desire of voluptuous pleasures: as Christ exprested, when he sayd, If any man shall see a woman to lust after her, he hath already committed adultery in his harte. And agaynst this concupiscence or luste ought we to strue. And as touching murthor, Christ hath likewise admonished vs, that we should cutte of anger, as the roote therof. Now resteth as touching sacriledge to see what the Apostle complaineth therof. Sacriledge is rashely to touch or to vsurpe vnto himselfe holy thinges which are dedicated vnto God, eue either by the name of a vow, or els of a curse. The Jewes had a commaūdement geuen them, that they should not spare idols. For theyr duety was to o-uerthrow and destroy all thinges pertaining vnto them. But they being led by couetousnes, reserved those thinges vnto themselves, and turned them to theyr owne proper commodities. So sinned Aham, and also Saule, when he had ouer-come Amalech. Contrariwise Moses gaue an excellent example of vertue, when he not onely brake the golden calfe, but also did beate it into poulder, and threwe it into the riuer. For if the reliques of the idole had remained stil, peraduenture the Israelites, as they were outragious, would haue woozshipped them. Indede the pub: wealth, and our magistrates may take away those thinges which are superstitious, and conuert the prizes of them to good and godlye bles. But this thing is not permitted vnto priuate men. But the Hebrewes were generally for-bidden, that they should not saue such thinges, especially as wer bowed by a curse.

Thou abhorrest idols, and committest sacriledge.] He noteth them to be infected with so great couetousnes, that they tooke away and vsurped vnto themselues euen those thinges that pertained vnto the woozshipping of idols, so that they were any thinge precious. Although this may also be vnderstanded of things consecrated vnto the true God. Of the sons of Hele we reade, y they toke away from the offerers raw flesh dedicated vnto God, befoze they were made a sweete smell befoze the Lorde. Yea and the matter came to that point also, that the degrees of the ministry and of the high priest were boughte and sold for money. I know that Origene and Ambrose do interprete these things allegorically: that the Jewes steale Christ out of the holy scriptures, do counterfeit the old testamēt, and with greates sacriledge do deny Christe. But the playner sentence delighteth me best.

Thou boastest in the law, and by the transgression of the law dishonourest God. This vndoubtedly is repugnant to the ende of our condiction. For we are created, to sanctify the name of God. And Paule affirmeth, that we are therfore created, to liue to the prayse of his glory & grace. Christe also sayde: Let your light so shine before men, that they maye see your good woorkes, and glorifye your Father which is in heauen. They mocke with God, which boast of him & in theyr woorkes continually resist his will.

Cap.2 A Commentarie vpon the

These things fitte with the Christians and especially with those that professe the Gospel.

Whether doctrine ought to be iudged by the maners & life of the teachers.

written. Men vse to measure doctrine by the maners and life of the teacher: and by the meanes of the euill life of the Christians, the Jewes and Turkes curse Christ. And for the selfe same cause the Papistes at this daye are enemies to the Gospel. For if they see vs no lesse apply our selues vnto filthy lusts, then they do, to be greedy of lucre, to seeke auengement, to be fearefull to dye, to be desirous of life, to contend and strue to muche earnestly amonge our selues for the commodities of the flesh, straightway they say, that our doctrine is worse then that which they professe. And without doubt those things which are here spoken, fitte rather with the Christians then with the Jewes: when as we are endued with more excellent giftes then they were. Christ sayde, Beholde a greater then Salomon here, and a greater then Ionas. We boaste of the knowledge of Christ, we reffe in the Gospel, and we haue the forme of doctrine out of the articles of fayth, and we contende that all thynges are more perfecte in the Gospel, then they were in the Jewish religion: we haue  $\bar{h}$  fructio of  $\bar{h}$  liberty of the spirite, when as they were greuously oppressed with the yoke of ceremonies: yet though we be indued with so many and so excellent gifts, we leade our liues in such sorte, that the Gospel of Christ is euill spoken of through vs. But if any man will say, that the truth and dignitie of the doctrine dependeth not of the dignitie, maners, and life of the teacher, because Christ sayd of them which satte vpon the chaire of Moyses: The things which they say, doe ye: but the things which they doe, doe ye not. This I know to be true. But in the meane time, let vs marke, that Christ sayd of the false prophetes and deceauers: By their fruites ye shall know them. Wherefore we must put a difference, that of men there are some already instructed in religion, and other some are to be instructed. Wherefore, they which are instructed in sound doctrine, do acknowledge it to be true, and do count it for the worde of God, though he which teacheth it and deliuereth it, be not so pure. But they which are to be instructed, and are not yet come to the vnderstandyng of it, doe iudge of it accordyng to the maners and life of the teachers. Not that in very dede the doctrine is by the maners of the ministers made eyther true or false: but because the vnlearned sorte are wont so to iudge. And in summe, God will not be honoured with outward titles and ceremonies. This is the wilie subtiltie of the deuill, that the giftes of God, which ought to be fruitfull, shoulde be made both of no force, and also shoulde more aggrauate our cause. It is a great infelicitie, to deforme those thynges, wherby we ought to be honoured. And it is no small ingratitude to dishonour God, which hath so honoured vs. Paule accuseth these men, that they dyd not onely them selues transgresse the lawes, but also allured others to the same, and caused them to blasphemie  $\bar{h}$  name of the Lord. And by an antithesis or contrary position, he exagerateth or amplifieth that which he before sayd: Thou that teachest an other, teachest thou not thy selfe? But  $\bar{h}$  place which he citeth, is in Esaie the 52. Chapter. And in the Greke edition the place is thus written: Δι' ὑμᾶς δια παντός τὸ ὄνομα μου βλασφημεῖται ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσι. That is: Through you my name is euery where euill spoken of among the Gentiles. But in Hebze we it is written: Ve tamid col haiom schemi meuoats: That is: And alwayes euery daye my name is ill spoken of. Wherby appeareth, that betwene the Hebze veritie and the Greke edition, there is not much difference. But Paule vsed the Greke edition, partly because it was in their handes vnto whom he wrote, and partly because it serued well for his purpose. For the Greke hath, among the Gentiles, which the Hebze hath not. But here is no small doubt objected vnto vs, for that the Prophet seemeth to laye the whole cause of the blasphemie vpon the straungers: namely, for that when they had lead away the Israelites captiues, they railed vpon their God, as though he had not bene able to deliuer the. Which thing is more expessedly read in Ezechiel the 36. chap. from whence it may seeme that these thynges were taken: for there it is apertly written, that they in mockage sayd: Beholde the people of thys God. But we must consider, what was the cause and occasion of the captiuitie of  $\bar{h}$  *Hebze*wes: and we shall finde, that it was nothyng els, but theyr wicked actes, and transgressions of the the lawe: by which they in a maner compelled God, to deliuer them into those calamities: wherof folloved the blasphemies of the Ethnickes. God was byged two wayes: for on the one side vnlesse he had chastised them, when they liued wickedly, other nations would haue spoken euill of hym, for that he so much bare with wicked men. On the other side, if he should correcte them in forsaking and deliuering the to outward nations, he should be euill spoken of, as a weake and feeble God. And the fountaine and originall of these euills, was the wicked lyfe of the Hebrewes. Wherefore in Ezechiell there is added, that he being touched with the compassion of hys name, had decreed to deliuer them at the length: both that he himselfe myght afterward bee set forth as a mightie God, and that they, by amendment of lyfe, myght behaue them selues the better. By thys place we may gather, that the Jewes greuously fell. For the greater their dignitie was, the more greuouser were those thinges which they committed: so that by euery mans iudgement, they could no way be defended. Therefore in Esaie the Lorde sayd, when he had reckened by all the ornaments which he had bestowed vpon hys vineyarde: Judge thou house of Israell betwene me and my vineyarde. Which parable Christ also vsed in the Gospel.

The cause of the blasphemy was not in the Gentiles but in the Jewes.

Note that the glory of God is two manner of wayes endangered.

For Circumcision verily is profitable, if thou doe the lawe: but if thou be a transgressor of the lawe, thy circumcision is made vncircumcision. Therefore if the vncircumcision keepe the iustifications of the lawe, shall not hys vncircumcision bee counted for circumcision? And shall not vncircumcision which is by nature (if it keepe the lawe) iudge thee, which by the letter and circumcision arte a transgressor of the lawe?

For circumcision in deede is profitable. ] When he had hetherto reckened by the benefites bestowed vpon the Jewes, and had shewed how they had abused them: now by the way he setteth forth a manifest exposition of the true circumcision, and of the true Jewishnes. By reason of circumcision, they arrogantly puffed by them selues. Vpon whiche occasion Paule sheweth by preuention, that it made them not a whitte better then the Gentiles, when as they liued so filthy. It was a great thyng in deede to be circumcised: so that the vncircumcision were cutte of in the hart also. Otherwise, how litle the circumcision of the body, profited them vnto righteousness, their vices sufficiently declare, which a litle before he hath expressed. They often alleaged, that Moyse through the helpe of circumcision, was deliuered from the daunger of death. For the Angel would haue killed hym, if hys wife had not circumcised hys sonne. And after the generall Circumcision celebrated by Iosua, the people were brought into the promised land, and that not without a wonderfull miracle. For the waters of Jordane were compelled to go backe to their spring. And in the booke of Genesis the 17. chap. it is manifest, with what waight and seriousness this Sacrament was instituted of God. Whereunto as he added excellent promises, so also added he horrible threatnynges: that the soule of hym which was not the right day Circumcised should be destroyed. Whereupon it semeth that the Jewes reasoned a contrariis, that is, from contraries: If Circumcision being intermitted, destroyeth a man, then contrarywise where it is had, it saueh a man. But thys kynd of argument is not of necessitie. It is in deede probable, but it doth not alwayes conclud well: as many instances teache vs, and Augustine oftentimes affirmeth. And those thynges whiche are here spoken, are not so to be vnderstanded, as though the dignitie of the Sacramentes should depende of our fayth or goodnes. For as much as here is not entreated of the nature or excellency of the Sacrament, but of the fruite and vtilitie therof. Whiche we must nedes graunt dependeth both of the fayth and godlines of the receauers. And by this place we learne, that outward thynges of them selues nothing profite vnto saluation, vnlesse there be a mutation or chaunge made by the holy Ghost in our hartes, either before, or els whylest they are put in vse. Neither is this to be objected, that the

the Baptisme of children is an outward thyng, and yet bringeth saluation vnto to infantes. For the infantes haue no commoditie by the force of the outwarde washtyng, vnles there come with all some spiritual thyng, and such as pertaineth to the soule. Augustine thinketh that saluation cometh vnto them, by the sayth of them whiche offer them (whom we call Godfathers and Godmothers) or by the sayth of the Church. I know in dede, that the sayth of godly men may vnto some obtaine grace, conuersion, and excellent spirituall giftes. But saluation hap-neth not vnto them that are of full age, but only by their owne faith, and vnto in-fantes by the spirit, and grace, which secretly worketh in them regeneration: of which regeneration baptisme is the outward sealyng. Wherefore it is apparant, how miserably the Iewes erred in attributyng so much to their circumcision.
And there were some (if we will geue credite vnto Augustine in his booke De ciuitate Dei.) which affirmed as much of Baptisme. Namely, that a man being once baptised, although he liued wickedly, should not vtterly perishe. He shall in dede (said they) suffer many thinges, but at the last he shall be saned, peraduen-ture by fire. But this error both Augustine hath confuted, & we haue subscribed vnto hym in our exposition of the first epistle to the Corinthians. The purpose of the Apostle in this place is, to shew, that God will haue no regard to the outward circumcision, if there want piety and holines: and agayne on the other side, that vncircumcision shall not be a let vnto the Gentiles, so that they meane wel, and liue godly. Let vs note, as I began to say, how little is to be attributed vnto outward things, if they be taken by themselves. And yet so great is the error in our dayes, that men make prayers recited in a strange & vnknown tongue, pilgrimages, & certayne fastes rashly taken in hand, as the chief anker holde of their saluation. Yea they are now at the length come to this point, that sometimes they attribute remission of sinnes vnto these trifles. The prophets cry out euery where, that God despiseth, hateth, and detesteth worshippinges without sayth and god-lines. Howbeit we must vnderstand (as we may gather by the wordes of the A-postle) that if they which receiue the sacramentes, haue faith and pietie, then outward things haue they certain vtilities. For soasmuch as they are instituted by God, we must nedes graunt that they are good, vnles it happen that through our fault they be made hurtfull. But they are good and profitable vnto the iust, in whō through faith, iustification goeth before. For sacramentes (to speake in general) are visibill signes: which signifie, & by which the holy ghost exhibiteth vnto those, which beleuyng receaue them, both grace and coniunction with Christ, and also seale vnto vs the promises of saluation. And to touch somewhat of circumcision, it was a signe, or to speake more apertly, a sealyng of the promise & league made w God through Christ. And they were marked in the partes apointed to generatio & to geue vs to vnderstand, that Christ as touching his manhode, should be bozne of the seede of man. And by that signe they were continually put in minde of the league made with God: and thereby they professed the obseruation of the law.
Wherefore to the Galathians it is sayd, that he which is circumcised is debter to kepe the whole law. It was also in stede of a marke or cognisance, whereby that people was discerned from other nations. Wherefore, whilst they iorneyed in the desert, they were not circumcised, because there were no other nations there, from whō they might by that signe be discerned: as the commentaries which are ascribed vnto Ierome alledge: although of that thyng there may an other cause more probable be assigned. By this sacrament also was noted the mortifying of y<sup>e</sup> flesh and filthy lustes, and that all superfluous thinges should be cut of from the godly. And superfluous thinges are whatsoever displease God. This rite was to the old men in stede of baptisme, & was counted for y<sup>e</sup> sacrament of regeneration. Whereby it appeareth that our infantes ought to be baptised, soasmuch as their lotte is no worse then the lotte of the chyldren of the Iewes: yea rather it is in many partes more happy. For our baptisme (somewhat to speake thereof now) is not bound to the eight day, as was the circumcision of the Iewes in the olde time: for we are by Christ deliuered from circumstaunces of tyme and place. And sacred rites are certayne outward professions of piety. And such not onely the Iewes

had, but also those which in the first state of nature, liued godly. Therfore the simboles or outward signes of rites, are in dede by reason of the diuersity of tymes oftentymes chaunged: but the thinges remayne the selfe same. Moreouer by the wordes of Paule is gathered, that Circumcision profiteth, so that the law be obserued. For it is very profitable, to obteyne regeneration, to haue the signe of the couenaunt, and a perpetuall admonition of the mortification of the flesh, and an obsequiation or seale of the promise of God, and of the heauenly giste bestowed vpon vs.

The godly had holp rites also before the law.

If thou be a transgressor of the law. ] Here he vnderstandeth none but those which of purpose transgresse: and not those which fall of infirmitie, and are drawne either vnawares or vnwillingly, and do sigh and grone, saying together wyth Paule, who shall deliuer me from the body of this death?

Thy circumcision is made vncircumcision. ] To be made vncircumcision in this place, is to be counted vncircumcision, as it shall afterward be declared, when he sayth, Shall not his circumcision be counted vncircumcision? And to kepe the law, is to be taken in the same sence that we before declared. Ambrose vpon this place sayth, He then kepeth the law, which beleueth in Christ. But if he beleue not, he is a transgressor of the law. Which wordes although they serue not much to the exposition of this place, yet are they very profitable. Because thereby we perceiue that he which beleueth in Christ kepeth the law: for that by faith is geuen vnto vs the power and facultie of the spirite, wherby to obey the law. And if there want any thing to the obseruation thereof, as in very dede there alway wanteth, the same is holpen by the imputation of the righteousness of Christ. Moreouer in that he affirmeth, that he which beleueth not in Christ, is a transgressor of the law, he manifestly sheweth, that the workes of them which beleue not in Christ, are sinnes and transgressions of the law. The Jewes boasted exceeding much of circumcision as though it had bene geuen them for their merites, and as though it had ben an assured testimony of a iust and holpe lyfe: whiche thyng is declared to be vntreue. Chrysostome vpon this place vseth a very trim order, both as touching the law & also as touching circumcision. There is (sayth he) an outward law, there is also a law in the hart, and in the middle place are set good workes which procede from the law of the hart & are agreable with the outward law. Likewise, there is circumcision in the flesh, & circumcision in the harte. In the midst is placed a iust and holy life. For it proceedeth from the circumcision of the harte, and agreeth with the circumcision of the flesh. Paule putteth a double comparison of circumcision. The first is, whereby it is contrarie vnto vncircumcision, & is, vnto the condicio of the Ethnicks. And of this he speaketh now presently: and sheweth, that it was nothinge prejudiciall vnto men as touching saluation. The other is whereby circumcision is compared with faith and thereof shall afterward be entreated, when the Apostle sheweth, that Abraham first beleued, and therefore obteyned righteousness: and afterwarde that righteousness was sealed with circumcision. Wherefore the circumcision of the flesh is of lesse dignity then faith, and cometh after it.

Therefore if vncircumcision do kepe the iustifications of the law, shall not his vncircumcision be counted for circumcision. ] In ciuile iudgements when any is to be condemned, which is in any dignity or Magistrateship, he is first depriued of his dignity or office, and then afterward condemned. So the Apostle first depriueth the Jewes of the true Jewishnes, and of the true circumcision, and then afterward condemneth them, because they liued filthely. This similitude in a manner vseth Chrysostome. Wherunto we may moreouer adde, that like as in a publike wealth they which shalbe preferred to honour, if they be of a base and obscure stocke, are first adorned with some noble Magistrateship, or publike dignity: so Paule minding to bring to honour the Gentles, which seemed abjecte, attributeth vnto them the true circumcision, and true religion of the Jewes, when he sayth, that they? vncircumcision is counted for circumcision, which they haue in they? hart. For by those signes is signified the state and condicion of the Jewes and Gentils.

The iustifications of the lawe.] In Greeke is red διαίματα, which many take to be ceremonies called of the Hebrewes Chocoth. But I do not easily see, how the Ethnickes kept the ceremonies of the law: vntiles we wil say that the Hebrewes in theyr captiuities taught the Gentils the ceremonies of Moses: which is not easy to be beleued: especially, forasmuch as they were not to be obserued, but in the land of promise. Peradventure they meane y these iustifications do signify those rites, which the Ethnickes counted in the law of nature godlye and good. For we speake not of idolatrous rites: but of those whiche some obserued by the traditions of theyr fathers, which hoped in the Mediator to come. For by suche ceremonies they both professed God, & also accused themselves as sinners: after which folowed y practise of byt light liuyng. And we deny not, but ther were many such men. Yet can we not therfore affirme, that either Socrates, or Phocion, or Aristides, were of the number of these men: when as we haue nothing that is certayne of theyr pietie and sayth, but rather by histories they appeare Idolaters. Neuer thelesse, the Scriptures commend Iob, vnto whom (no doubt) there were many like. But by our iudgement (as we haue sayd) they can not be declared or defined. But the Apostle speaketh not of those rites of the lawe of nature: when as by the lawe, he here vnderstandeth the lawe of Moses. For he hath to do against the Jewes. And that the Ethnickes obserued not the rites of Moses, hereby it is manifest, because they were uncircumcised, & are called uncircumcision. Wherefore, it is more truly sayd, that the iustifications of the lawe, signifie here the morall part of the lawe, of which the Gentiles by the light of nature, were not ignorant. The scope of the Apostle is, to shewe, that righteousness is not of necessity toynded with the rites and ceremonies of the lawe: and that it was no let vnto the Gentiles touching saluation, that they wer not circumcised, so that they had pietie. And contrarywise, that the Jewes, being destitute of sayth and holy lyfe, are not holpen by circumcision, to bee thereby preferred before the Gentiles. And where as we haue in our reading, λογισθησεται, that is, shall be counted, or imputed: Chrysostome readeth περιτραπήσεται, or μετατραπήσεται, that is, shall be turned. Neither doth hee onely read it so, but also interpreteth it so: so that he sayth, that the Apostle sayd not λογισθησεται. And he sayth plainly, that Paule here so speaketh as before, when he sayd: Thy circumcision is made uncircumcision. He would (sayth he) speake that which is of more waight and greater, to the end to speake with more efficacie. Whys diuersitie of readyng, Erasmus weighed not: neyther will we contende therfore, for that the sense eyther way remayneth sounde.

And vncircumcision which is by nature (if it kepe the lawe) shall iudge thee, which by the letter and circumcision, art a transgressor of the lawe.]

To iudge, may be taken thre maner of wayes: eyther that the Ethnickes shall pronounce sentence agaynst the Jewes: as Paule sayd to the Corinthians: Knowe ye not, that we shall iudge the Angells also: or by comparison, as the Lorde sayd of the Sodomites, and of the Ninuites, and of the Quene of Saba, that they should iudge the Israelites: or to iudge, is to reprove, to accuse, and to beare witnes agaynst a man. For euen as before were alleaged the cogitations, which shall accuse one an other: (for the godd shall accuse the euill, for that they corrupted the man: and agayne, the euill shall accuse the god, because they helped not:) so the holy and iuste Ethnickes shall accuse the wicked Jewes, for that they being adorned with so many gistes and spirituall graces, serued not God. He calleth it vncircumcision by nature, because we are naturally so borne. And they whiche are Ethnickes, purpose not in their minde to circumcise them selues. Or to speake more rightly, as I thinke, vncircumcision by nature, is an Ethnick man, which is led onely by the light of nature. By the letter hee vnderstandeth what soener is outward, and is not grafted in the hart, to moue hym to doe well. Augustine in hys 3. booke and 5. chap. De Doctrina Christiana, writeth: that they sticke in the

the letter, which take the signes for the thynges, and that which is figuratiuely spoken in the holpe Scriptures, they take it so, as if it were spoken properly: and so lowe creepe they on the grounde, that when they heare the name of the Sabbath, they remember nothing but the seventh day, which was obserued of the Iewes. Also, when they heare of a Sacrifice, they thinke vpon nothing but vpon the sacrifices which were killed. And though there be some seruitude tolerable, yet he calleth that a miserable seruitude, when we take the signes for the thynges. Wherin there is great offence committed in these dayes, in the Sacrament of the Eucharist. For how many shall a man finde, which, beholding the outward signes of this Sacrament, calleth to memoize the death and passion of Christ, wherof it is most certayne that they are signes: or which thincketh with him selfe, that the body and blood of Christ is a spirituall meate of the soule through faith, euen as bread and wine are nourishmentes of the body: or which weigheth with hym self the coniunction of the members of Christ betwene themselves, and with the head: These thynges are not regarded, and they cleane only to the sight of the signes. And men thinke it is enough, if they haue looked vpon, bowed their knee, and worshipped. This is to embrace the letter, and not to geue care vnto the sayd Augustine, who in the place which we haue now cited, and a litle afterward most apertly affirmeth, that to eate the body of Christ, & to drinke his blood, are figuratiue kinds of speeches. So are the Iewes accused, because they cleane only to the letter & circumcision, were transgressours of the law.

For he is not a Iewe, which is one outward: neyther is that circumcision which is outward in the fleshe. But he is a Iewe, which is one within, and the circumcision is of the hart in the spirite, not in the letter, whose prayse is not of men, but of God.

For he is not a Iewe, which is one outward. Here he more apertly sheweth, what is the true Jewishnes, & what the true circumcision. And he doeth it by antithesis or contrary positions: Outward & inward: the fleshe & the hart: the spirite & the letter: the prayse of men, and the prayse of God. But this is to be marked, that where as he sayth, That he is not a Iewe, which is a Iewe outwardly: neyther is that circumcision, whyche is in the fleshe, these thynges oughte to be vnderstanded by exclusion (as they call it) so that, this woorde, onely, or alone be added. For that circumcision whyche is onely in the fleshe, is not circumcision. And he which is a Iewe onely outwardly, is not a Iewe. But Paul seemeth to deny that simply, which should be denied but partly: because to exaggrate or amplify his matter he speaketh hyperbolically. Such as is that saying, when he sayth, that he was not sent to baptise. Neyther ought we any other wise to vnderstand the Fathers, when they say that the Eucharist is not bread. They speake hyperbolically, and vnderstand that it is not bread onely, or alone, or common bread: because vnto the bread, is added, the woorde of God, whereby it receaueth the nature of a sacrament. And this is a stronge reason against the Anabaptistes, which haue euer in theyr mouth that saying of Paul vnto the Corinthians: Circumcision and vncircumcision are nothing: but the obseruation of the commandements of God. So they say that Baptisme, and the Eucharist, and the Ecclesiasticall ministry are nothing, but pretend onely the obseruing of the commandementes of God. But we answer them, as we haue now sayde of Paul, that other thynges are nothing, if they be alone without faith, and piety, and a holy life. But what it is to consist of the spirite and not of the letter, is thus declared, that by the spirite we vnderstand the renning of the minde: whereby it willingly embraceth, and despyeth that which is contained in the outward commandement of the law. For the spirite sometimes is taken for the excellenter part of the minde, and sometimes for the power and faculty, whereby God chaungeth and regenerateth a man. But we here by the spirite vnderstand the mynd of man compacte of them both, being renued by the holy Ghost. But the letter signifyeth, whatsoever is outwardly set before vs, be it neuer so spirituall, when it cleaueth not to our minde, or bygeth not.

It is a seruitude most miserable to count the signes for the thynges. An error concerning the Eucharist.

To eate the body of Christ, & to drinke his blood are figuratiue speeches.

Wherefore the circumcision of the flesh, is the signe of the circumcision of the harte and of the mind. Therefore great care was to be had, that it should not be bayn or superfluous. This phrase touching the circumcision of the harte, Paul borrowed out of the olde Testament. In the 10. chap: of Deut: commaundement was geuen, that they should circumcise the foreskins of theyr hartes: and in the selfe same booke the 30. chapter, Moses promisseth, that God will one day circumcise the foreskin of theyr hartes: to declare that either is true, namely, that God woorketh in vs the things that are good, and that we also woork the selfe same: forasmuch as God bleth our ministry to bring forth good woorkes. Wherefore so longe as our minde resisteth the woorde of God whiche is set forth vnto vs, althoughe outwardly it make a shewe of somewhat, yet is it occupied in the letter. But when it is made prone vnto the commaundementes of God, then is it gouerned by the spirite. Wherefore as touching the thinge whiche is set forth and red, there is no difference betwene the spirite and the letter, but as touching the affect of the minde. Which thinge Paule hath declared in his latter Epistle to the Corinthians the 3. cap: wher he saith: Ye are the Epistle of Christ wrought by our ministry and written not wyth inke, but with the spirite of the liuing God, not in tables of stone, but in tables of flesh. Where he manifestly teacheth, that this is the ministry of the spirite, wher in the tables of our harte are imprinted those things which God commaundeth, and will haue to be of vs belened and done. Neyther let vs meruaile, that Paule sayth, that such an Epistle was written by him, wher as it is the woork of God: for he meaneth that he wrote it, onely as an instrument toynd with the woorking of God. Wherefore they are to be counted ministers of the spirite, which do not onely expounde the woordes of God, but also do impinte the into the hartes of the hearers. Which thinge such as do not, althoughe they speake good and healthfull thinges, yet are they but ministers of the letter: neither of theyr woork followeth any thinge els, then the death of the hearers. For they which vnderstand the will of the Lord, and do it not, shalbe punished with many stripes. And therefore Paule sayde, that the letter killeth, but the spirite quickeneth. Wherefore it is the duty of pastors, and of them that teache, to pray vnto God moste earnestly, to make them ministers not of the letter, but of the spirite. Paule also vnto the Philippians declared what is the true circumcision, when he sayth: We are the circumcision, which serue God in the spirite, we glory in Christ, and haue not confidence in flesh. By these thre notes he expressed the spirituall circumcision. And vnto the Colossians after he had said, that we are circumcised in Christ, but yet with a circumcision not made by bandes, he declareth by very many circumstances, what that circumcision is: namely, that we haue put of the body of the sins of the fleshe: that through Baptisme we are buried together with Christ: that we haue forgiuenes of synners: that the hand writing is put out, which was agaynst vs by reason of ordinances: and the principalityes & powers which were agaynst vs, are by Christ vanquished & overcome. In which place this is not to be passed ouer, that baptisme is called the true circumcision, so that it be in the spirite and the harte, and not in the letter and the fleshe. Wherefore these sentences a lewe inward and outward, the circumcision in the flesh and in the harte, are to be taken in respect as they are opposite one to the other: that is, a part, and disuened one from the other. For to yoyne them together, and then the sentence of Paule pertapneth not vnto them. For it is not to be doubted, but that there were very many Jewes in the olde tyme, which were Jewes both outward and inward: and were circumcised not only in the fleshe, but also in the harte. These thinges may be taken three maner of wayes: so that there is one circumcision of the fleshe, an other of the spirite, and the thyrde toynd together of them both. For it is not to be thought, that the olde Testament was so seperated from the Gospell, that they which liued in it, could not also therewithall haue the Gospell. These two thinges are indeede seperated the one from the other: but yet in such sorte, that they may be toynd together in one and the selfe same man. Maccibens so reiected the olde Testament, as though though it were bitterly vnprofitable vnto vs. And vsed this kynde of reason: Forasmuch as that inheritance of the land of Chanaan pertayneth not vnto me, I do reject also both the Testament and the writinge whereby the bequest was made. Yea also though it should bring vnto me the possession of that land, yet Christ hath so exalted vs to better thinges, that I regard not these thinges. These wordes objected Faustus, and they are red in the 4. booke of that worke whiche Augustine wrote against him. In which place he thus answereth him: Those thinges which are written in the olde Testament are types of our thinges. Forasmuch as Paule in his latter Epistle to the Corinthyans sayth: These thinges happened vnto them in a figure: but they are written for our correction, vpon whome are come the endes of the world. And vnto the Romanes we reade whatsoeuer thinges are written, are written for our erudition and learning. And in the oracles of the olde Testament is promise made of Christ. Wherefore he being raysed from the dead, and disputing with his two disciples of himselfe, cited testimonies out of Moses, and out of the whole scripture. And the same Christ sayd, that the good father of the household brought forth of his treasure both new thinges and olde. Wherefore the olde Testament is not so contrary vnto the new, as the Manichies sayned it was. And therefore Paule when he seemeth to speake any thinge ill of the law, that doth he not, but in respect as it is taken by it selfe, a parte from Christ.

VVhose prayse is not of men, but of God. Paule reiecteth not the prayse which cometh of men, but so far forth as it is seperated from the praise which cometh of God. In summe, although the sacramentes were not only professions of faith, but also outward seales of the promises, and of the giftes of God: yet was not perfect righteousness, to be put in their outward simboles. Hereby we gather that no man ought to boast of his outward thinges. So much let every man esteeme of himselfe, how much he seeth himselfe to be in the sight of God, who marketh not only the thinges whiche are seene, but is also the searcher of the hartes. Hereby we learne also, that both the wordes of God, and the sacramentes, if they be receaued only as thinges outward, do pertayne vnto the letter, which quickneth not, but killeth. And by these thinges, hath the Apostle made the Gentiles equall with the Jewes. For that they also mought no les then the Jewes, be Jewes inwardly, and haue circumcision in the hart: which God chiefly regardeth.

The olde Testament pertayneth vnto vs also.

Paule whē he seemeth to diminish any thing fro the law, condemneth not the olde testament. How we shall iudge rightly of the sacramentes. So much let every man esteeme himselfe, how much he seeth himselfe to be in the sight of God.

The third Chapter.

What is then the preferment of the Jewe: or what is the profite of circumcision? Much every maner of way: For first, because vnto them were committed the wordes of God. For what though some did not beleue, shall their vbeliefe make the fayth of God without effect: God forbid. Let God be true, and every man a lyar, as it is written: That thou mightest be iustified in thy words, and overcome when thou art iudged.

The Apostle continueth still in that which he intended, namely, to accuse the Jewes. And now entreateth he of the fourth thing, which we tooke in hand to make declaration of: that is, that their noughty living was no let, but that the giftes which were geuen vnto them, were both excellent, and also to be had in great estimation. He had before much detected the for their corrupt life. But because it could not be denyed, but that God exceedingly loved their nation (when as we reade in the Psalmes, He hath not done thus vnto every nation) he seemeth to put a distinction: wherein, if we haue a respect vnto God, he graunteth, that he was very louing vnto them, when as he gaue vnto them these thinges, which he gaue not vnto other nations: but if we consider them by themselves, then those excellent giftes, nothing profiteth them, vnles peradventure to theyr farther iudgement, and condemnation, and that through theyr owne default, and not through any faulte of the giftes. And whē he setteth forth the dignity of the Hebrewes, he declareth that it chiefly consisteth in this, for that vnto them were committed the wordes of God. Which wordes, although they comprehended in them many thinges, yet aboue all thinges they offered vnto them the promise of Christ, and of saluation. Which thinges the Jewes neglecting, wholly endeuored theselues to the setting forth and extolling of circumcision, and outward rites. Euen as do our men also now in our dayes: who, when the sacramentes are set before them, and especially the supper of the Lord, haue a regard only vnto the outward symbols and signes, which are but the scales of the promises and giftes of God: but the thinges themselues they consider not, and much les haue they them in estimation.

Much euery maner of way.] This is not to be referred vnto this worde profite, which went next before. For then he shoulde haue sayd, multam in the feminine gender. Therefore it is to be referred vnto that, which he put first, when he sayd: VVhat preferment hath the Jew aboue the Gentile? He attributeth both vnto the Jewishe religion, and also vnto the sacramentes thereof, so much dignity, as he myght do by the word of God. And this hath a great emphasis or force, that he answereth, Much euery maner of vway.

For vwhat though some did not beleue, shall their vnbeleife make the faith of God vwithout effect? God forbid.] These thinges he putteth by the figure Antipophora, as though there were Gentiles, which went about to deface this dignity of the Jewes, for that they beleued not the wordes of God committed vnto them. But against them Paul writeth, that their noughtines was no hindrance at all vnto the truth of God. For, soasmuch as he is truth it selfe, whiche gaue them his word, and promised them that he would be their God, and that they shoulde be his people, their sinnes could nothing let, but that that whiche was promised, shoulde take successe: because among that people there were alwayes some good men, which both beleued the promises of God, and also lyued vncorruptly. Therefore in them, although not in all, was performed that which was promised. And so far is it of, that their noughtines of life was any derogation vnto the truth of the wordes of God, that by it rather it was illustrated, and appeared more bright. Which thing he proueth by a sentence of Dauid, as it shal afterward appeare. And as touching the wordes, where as the Apostle saith, First, he hath not a respect vnto order, as though he went to rehearse a greates many other benefytes of God geuen vnto the Jewes: But it is in a maner an entrance or beginning of that which he entendeth to speake. Or els it signifyeth the chiefest or principallest of those thinges which were geuen. Andoubtedly the wordes of God were as a most rich treasure, which was long tyme hidden and layd vp among the Hebrewes only, and not communicated vnto the Gentiles, vntill the Apostles tyme. For this was the function committed vnto them, namely, to sow abrode this treasure among the Gentiles. It is certayne, that Ptolemeus Philadelphus was desirous to haue the lawes of the Hebrewes converted by the 70. interpreters into the Greke tonge. But yet for all that, knew not he, that those thinges which were therein contayned, pertayned vnto the Gentiles also. The Apostles only began to make manifest vnto the whole world, that the promises of Christ, & eternall saluatio, were common also vnto the Gentiles. And marke in this place, that those prerogatives only are mentioned of, which were geuen freely, and depended not of any vertue of the receauers. And this particle God forbid, which he most oftentymes useth, is euery where toynd vnto those thinges in a maner, of which it is not lawfull for vs once to thinke: soasmuch as whosoener is a professour of godly religion, ought to abhorre them.

of God are a most riche treasure.

Man many wayes a lyar.

Let God be true and euery man a lyer.] Man is many wayes a lyar: partly, because by reason of inconstancy he doth not alwayes abyde still in one and the the selfe same purpose: partly, because he performeth not those thinges which he promisseth: and partly, because he oftentimes bringeth forth a lye, and that ether of infirmity, whilst he is not able to attayne vnto the truth, or els of an euill purpose to vse deceite. This sentence is read in the 116. Psalme In my hart I sayd, every man is a lyar. And certayne interpreters of the Hebrewes affirme, that Dauid had then a respect vnto Sannell. For when he was on every side enclosed in by the host of Saule, & was in a maner past all hope to escape, such cogitations were offered vnto him through the infirmity of the flesh: as though the Prophet had made a lye touching those thinges, which he had promised him concerning the kingdome. Or els, he mought speake these thinges against himselfe: for that when according to mans reason he had cast awaye all hope of escaping, and thought himselfe to be in a maner forsaken of God, as sone as he came agayne into the right way, he brake into this sentence, Every man is a lyer, because he also had deceaued himselfe touching the goodnes of God. And by the antithesis or contrary position it is playne, that a liar here signifieth an vnconstant person. For before he sayde, Let God be true. Wherefore we maye conclude that the dignity of the scripture or of the sacramentes, dependeth not of our sayth or misbeliefe. For whether we beleue God or mistrust him, they are to be esteemed according to their dignitie: because they depend of the institution of God, who is most true: neither is hys truth chaunged through our defaultes: as Dauid writeth:

A place of Psalme.

The word of God and the sacramentes depend not of

That thou mightest be iustified in thy wordes, and ouercome when thou arte iudged. Thus the 70. interpreters haue turned it, whom Paule now folloiweth: when as in the Hebrewes it is thus written: Lemaan titdek be dhob recha tizkeh beschoatecha. And that which the 70. haue turned, That thou mightest be iustified, maye accordyng to the Hebrewes be: Therefore shalt thou be iustified. And where as it is written, agaynst thee onely haue I sinned, Rabbi Dauid Chimchi expoundeth it thus: I haue proude and in secret, transgressed: and therefore agaynst thee onely. But thou art iustified, and in iudgement ouercomest: which hath by Nathan the Prophet shewed y<sup>e</sup> thou knowest these thinges. But thys exposition fitteth not very well with the wordes of Paule: Wherefore we omitte it. Others interpret it: Although Dauid sinned agaynst Urias, and agaynst Bersabe, and agaynst the hoste of Israell: yet these were not sinnes, but in respecte that they were prohibited by God in the lawe. For there hence dependeth the iuste consideration of sinne. But it is better to say, that Dauid was so much greued, because he sawe, that God, by reason of hys sinne was blasphemed, and had in derision, which bare fauour vnto such a kyng, who to satisfie hys owne filthy luste, permitted hys enemyes to haue the vpperhand. These thinges (I say) so much vexed hym, that in that seruencie of minde, he had a regarde vnto these thynges onely. And therefore by the figure Hyperbole, he sayth: Against thee onely haue I sinned. As we, when we are oppressed with many troubles at one tyme, are accustomed to say of the chiefest and greatest trouble which afflicteth vs most: This one thyng greueth me very much. But afterward he comforteth hym selfe, hauing conceaued a firme hope, and sayth: That thou mightest be iustified in thy wordes, as if he shoulde say: Undoubtedly I haue greuoulye sinned: but such is thy goodnes, that hereby I see it to bee more poured out: so that alwaies, when thou contendest in iudgement, thou wilt in the cause, haue the vpperhand. Neyther is it to be thought, that Dauid when he sinned, had thys consideration in hys minde, to illustrate the goodnes of God. For there he sought onely to satisfie hys owne desire and luste. Wherefore, thys particle, That, hath a respecte, not vnto Dauid, but vnto God, by whose benefite it commeth to passe, that of that which is euill, shoulde come some good vnto them which loue hym. Forasmuch as vnto them, all thynges turne to good. Wherefore, the good thinges, which followe after sinnes committed, are to be ascribed, not vnto our sinnes, but to the mercy of God. Neyther let vs maruaile, that God is iudged as Paul saith. For oftentimes it happeneth, that men when they thinke them selues to be euill handled of hym, they reason concerning hys iudgementes, and although not in

wordes, yet in thoughtes they strive against hym. But then if they shoulde call to memoꝛy, how many & how greuous sinnes they haue committed, they shoulde alwayes perceaue, that God is in hys cause iustified, and ouercometh. Thys worde, wordes, which in Hebrewe is bedhobrechah, may signifie iudiciall actions: and in that sense haue I interpreted it. Although other take that worde for the wordes of the promises, and especially touchyng Christ. For David when he considered, that he had greuouslye fallen, desired God to make him cleane, and that he woulde not, by reason of the wicked acte which he had committed, cease to accomplishe the promise, which was, that of hys seede shoulde Christ be borne. Which interpretation Ambrose hath. But besides the expositions now alleaged of these wordes, there are two other expositions also: Of which, the one is thys: For that David was a kyng, and was the chiefest in authoritie amongst the people of God, he had no iudges ouer hym, whose tribunall seate, or iudgement, or sentence, he shoulde neede to be afrayde of. But he saw, that onely the wrath of God byd hange ouer hys head. Therefore he sayd: Unto thee onely am I guilty, although men can not punish me. The other exposition is: Urias, Bersabe, and part of the hoste haue bene ill belte withall through my meanes: but they undoubtedly, as they were men, had sinnes, for which they deserued those thynges which they suffered: yea, and thynges farre more greuous then them. But thou O God, hast nothing in thee for which I ought so to offend thee, whom thou hast adorned with so many great benefites, and exalted to so high a dignitie. There were some also which thought, that thys addition, That thou myghtest be iustified in thy sayynges, is to be referred vnto that, which went before: Haue mercy vpon me O God: Washe me, and cleanse me: that being receaued into grace, I may obtayne those thynges which thou hast promised me: and so thou mayest be iustified and ouercome, euen by the iudgement of men. Here we see, that thys worde iustifying, signifieth not to obtayne any newe righteousness, which thyng we can not ascribe vnto God, but to be counted or pronounced iuste. For euery man doth not, when he is afflicted, acknowledge God to be good. Of that minde was Dauid, when he sayd: Unto thee belongeth righteousness, but vnto vs confusion of face. God suffered Peter the Apostle, Dauid the kyng, and Moses to sinne: that calling them backe agayne vnto hym, and geuing vnto them the thynges which hee had promised them, he might the more declare hys goodnes. But because some men myght thinke, that by those wordes may be gathered, that men which professesse pietie, although they liue wickedly, yet shall notwithstanding obtayne the promises of God, if thys be generally true, that our incredulitie or noughtines, are no hinderance vnto the promises of God: we must therfore make a distinction betwene the promises of God. For there are some onely touchyng outward thynges, and tend onely to temporall good thynges: as that their publicke wealth should be preserved: that the kingdome shoulde continue in the stocke of Dauid: and that Christ should take fleshe of hys seede. The sinnes and unbeliefe of men, could nothyng hinder the byying to passe of these thynges. In daide in y meane tyme, came captiuities and afflictions, howbeit at the length the promise of God, as touchyng all these thynges, toke place. There is an other kinde of promises touchyng those thynges, which pertaine vnto our saluation. And vnto these in daide, the vngodly do not attayne. And yet can we not therfore inferre, that by our wicked doinges, the promises of God are frustrated. For they pertaine not generally vnto all men, but onely vnto those which be called by the predestinati- on of God, according to election: as it is writt in this Epistle the 9. chap. where it is sayd: Not as though the worde of God hath fallen awaye: And straight way is added: Are the children of the fleshe the children of God? And aunswere is made: They which are the children of promise are counted for the seede. Wherefore they vnto whome the promises pertaine, if they haue fallen, shall be called backe agayne to repentance. And so they: synnes which they haue before committed, shall not make voyd the promises of God. And eue as touchyng the, they deserued to haue them made frustrate. For they hauing once broken couenauent, it wer conueni- ent ent, that God toward them; should not stand to his promises according to this common sentence, Qui frangit fidem, fides frangitur eidem. That is, he whiche breaketh promise, let promise againe be broken vnto hym. But God so dealeth not to the end his goodnes might be the better declared. And those things which Paul now speaketh of the Iewes pertain vnto vs also. For, most excellent are these benefites of God towardes vs: namely, that the Gospell is committed vnto vs; that we haue baptisme, the holy Eucharist, and such other like: which thinges undoubtedly the Turkes and infidels haue not. But a man might object, what do these thinges profite, when as in the meane tyme very many are a great deale the worse, and the most part abuse them. We answer with Paul, that by this is the goodnes of God to be gathered, that he will suffer many naughty men and hypocrites for a few good mens sakes, whiche vse these giftes well: and will rather very long beare with many wicked men, then that his church should come to ruine. Thou wilt say peradventure, then he willethe their sinnes if he suffer them. What els, after a certaine maner he willethe them: Otherwise he would not suffer them, vnles he willed them, for God suffereth nothing against his will. But hereby canst thou not gather any excuse for me, or for we also must alwayes beare with sinnes. For God hath no law prescribed vnto him. Therefore when he of his goodnes doth whatsoeuer thinges he will, he is not to be accused. But vnto vs is a law geuen, wherein we are commaunded to admonish our neighbor, whom we see to offend: and that not once, or alone, but twice, and the third tyme, & to take witness with vs: so that if at the length he will not heare vs, let him be brought before the congregation, which if he also neglect, let him be counted for a publicane and an Ethenike. These thinges are prescribed vnto vs, and therefore ought to be done of vs, so that the sinnes be manifest, and that it may be done without a schisme. Otherwise, if by plucking vp the tares, shoulde also be rooted vp the wheat, it must be deferred vntill the end, as Augustines iudgement is. But in the meane time, some wicked men vse to say, I woulde to God, we had neuer had either the word of God, or Baptisme, or the Eucharist. For, soasmuche as these thinges profite vs not, they are to our greater and more bitter iudgemente. But these menne ought to consider, that this euell cometh not of God, but of themselves. Those thinges whiche are geuen by God, are good: let them ascribe vnto themselves, whatsoeuer euell cometh of them: and let them knowe that those thinges are alwayes profitable vnto some: although very oftentimes to the greater parte they serue vnto condemnation. Wherefore a good pastor ought not to forsake his ministry to cease of, either from preaching, or from ministering the sacraments, vnder this pretence, because he seeth his labour to profite but a little. yea rather that men become a great deale worse. Forasmuche as the truth of this place abideth vnshaken: namely, that these thinges haue great profite. Neither is there any cause why he should feare that he is not sent of God, so that his calling be as touching other circumstances iust and lawfull. For the prophets without doubt were sent by the Lord, when the captivity of Babilon was at hand. And when of theyr sermons they had none, or at the least, very little fruit, & their wordes as touching the greater parte, were both to iudgement & condemnation: yet ceased they not from the charge committed vnto them. The Lord hath assigned one cause onely, for which it is lawfull for the ministers of the worde, to holde theyr peace: namely, when men will no more geue eare, and openly deride and mocke at those thynges which are spoken. Then undoubtedly, must they shake of the dust of theyr feete and go theyr wayes. But so long as they will abyde to heare, although they strine agaynst it, yet are they to be do:ne wyth all. Neyther doth the worde of God by and by bring forth his frutes: as the seede cast into the ground both not straight way springing vp. And there are many tymes some, which whet they haue heard the word of the Lord, do not at that tyme bring forth fruit. But after ward being both chastised by God, and more vehemently stirred vp, with fruite they repeate with themselves those thinges which otherwise they had without profite. Which selfe thyng happeneth in the sacrament of Baptisme. For a man shall spyde an infinite number, which haue had it by them a long tyme wyth out any

the papistes haue the promise of the holy ghost.

The church hath the holy ghost, but not the congregation of the aduer-saries of the Gospel.

We bring nothing of our owne vnto God
but sinnes.

We must speake well of the giftes
of God and enueigh against the abuses.

But afterward being conuerted vnto God, they do not onely much esteeme it, but also thereby they profite much. Here also the Papistes object an other doute vnto vs. The promises of God (say they) are not made boyde (as Paule sayeth) thorough our sinnes and vnbeliefe. Therefore seeing we haue the promise of God, that by the holy ghost he will alwayes be present with vs to gouerne his church: he fully performeth the same. Wherefore ye do ill in departing fro our rules and our communion. But these men are exceedingly deceiued: when as the promise of the holy ghost was made vnto the disciples of the Lord and not vnto them.

First, let them proue that they are the disciples of Christ, and then will we beleue the. They which are the disciples of Christ, adde nothing vnto his wordes, neither appoint any thing contrary to the holy scriptures: which thing these men vndoubtedly do. They cry out that the holy ghost is geuen vnto the church. We graunt that. But what manner of church is that church? A counsell of bishops? or a synode of mitred prelates? The holy ghost hath alwayes bene in the church, and hath inspired some good men to cry out against these men, when as they ordeined their decrees contrary to the worde of God. In summe, the Apostles meaning is, that the performing of the promises of God, dependeth not of our merites, but of the goodnes of God. And, as it is manifest by the wordes of Dauid when he sayth, Against thee onely haue I sinned, We, when we praye vnto God, doe bring nothing vnto hym but sinnes. Therefore we desire hym to heare vs, that he might be iustified in his sayings. Hypocrites will be heard for they merites & good workes sake: for they acknowledge not their sinnes. But they which vnderstand them, do thereby take great consolation, because their trust is, that they shalbe heard euē through the goodnes of God. For so much as they see that in themselves all thinges are full of vncleannes, they woulde neuer presume to lifte vp eyther they eyes or prayers vnto God. Farther let vs marke, that the Apostle reuerenceth the giftes of God, and onely inueigheth against the which abuse them. For he saw that it followeth not, that if men beinge by God aduanced vnto great honours, and they in the meane time are ingrate towards hym, that therefore those honours shoulde not be had in estimation. The husbando men of the Lords vineyard were vndoubtedly noughty men. But they noughtines caused not, that the ornaments of the vineyard, whiche Christ and Esay make mention of, were not wonderfull excellent and profitable.

Now if our vnrightheousnes commendeth the rightheousnes of God, what shall we saye? Is God vnrightheous whiche bringeth in wrath? (I speake as a man) God forbid. Els howe shall God iudge the world? For if the verity of God hath more abounded through my lie vnto his glorie, why am I yet condemned as a sinner? And (as we are blamed, and as some affirme that we saye) why do we not euell, that good may come thereof: whose damnation is iust.

Now if our vnrightheousnes commendeth the rightheousnes of God, what shall we saye? Here Paule turneth somewhat from his purpose, but it is not a digression strange from the cause, which is entreated of. He before very much extolled the mercy of God: and declared, that the promises of God were not made of none effect through the vnbeliefe of men: yea rather that by our sinnes the goodnes of God is more illustrated. Hereby he saw, there mighte be objected vnto him (as the wisdom of the flesh, is alwayes redy to speake ill of the wordes of God, and to wrest them to a corrupt sence) both that God is vniust, which punisheth our sinnes, when as by them he is made more illustrious: and also, that we, without hauing any regarde, oughte to committe synne, seeing God, by our wicked actes, is more iustified, and so, hath alway the victorie, and his cause is thereby made the better. Commendeth, sayth he: which in the Greeke is outrivai, which signifyeth also, to confyrm, and to establish. Which thinge very well agrees gree with commendatio. Which forme of speaking the Apostle afterward bleth, when he sayth, that God hath commended vnto vs, his loue, for that when we were yet sinners, he gaue his owne sonne for vs. But in this kinde of objection is committed a false argument taken of the accident. For that it is not the office of sinnes properly and of themselves, to illustrate the glory of God. Which selfe thinge may also be sayd of that which is writte in this selfe same epistle, That of the fall of the Jewes, followed the saluation of the Gentiles: For we must not thinke, that they fall was the true and proper cause of the saluation of the Gentiles. For it came of the determination of God. For God had appoynted, that the preaching of the Gospell, beinge reiecte of the Jewes, shoulde be transferred vnto the Ethnikes. And they whiche let loose the bridle vnto sinne vnder this pretence, for that they would thereby make God to haue the victorie, & insulte him, are muche like vnto them, which hauing bene payned with a most greuous sickenes, and then being restored to health by the Physicion, haue made his arte more famous, will a gayne endenour them selues, to fall againe into the selfe same kinde of disease, that thereby the Physicion maye be the more renowned: or if poore men & beggers shoulde determine, that therfore they would eyther wante or begge, thereby more and more to shew forth the liberality of riche men. That which of it selfe conduceth to the setting forth of the glory of God, oughte not to be blame woorthy, or filthy. Vertues whiche are toynd with true prayse, do of themselves aduance the glory of God. We ought not to meruaile, that our doctrine is sometimes oppressed with sclanders, when as we see, that this selfe same thing hapened vnto the Apostles. They preached true things, & yet the vngodly through theyr sophisticall subtelties, inferred of theyr woordes most pernicious conclusions. Paule preached those thinges which we now read, and had oftentimes incultated, that grace is ther abundant, where sinne hath abounded: and taught, that the law therfore entred in, that sinne shoulde be increased. Of these thinges the vngodly sayd it folloiweth, that men shoulde sinne freely, because to the attainment of grace and the promises of God, we haue neede of synnes. All menne doubtles are sorry when they heare theyr name or fame to be euell spoken of. For they vnderstande, that the prayse of a good name, and of a good fame, is an excellent good giste of God. But aboute other, the pastozs and ministers of the word of God, are most greuously troubled with this kind of discommoditie. Because they rightwell perceauie that theyr infamye, and especially as touchinge doctrine, redoundeth not onely againste the truth of God, but also bringeth no small hurt vnto the people committed vnto theyr charge. Therfore the Apostles did evermore put away suche slaunders from themselves. And that the fathers also did the like, theyr writings do testefye. But Paule in this place doth not playnely absolue that which he objected vnto himselfe, but afterward in the 6. chapter the matter shalbe more at large discussed. Onely at this presente he doth pelleth from his doctrine false slaunders. And those thinges the vngodly are therfore wont to object, because when they are accused, they are alwayes ready to lay vpon God the cause and blame of theyr sinnes, not in deede manifestly, but by circumstances. Some whē they are accused, say, that they are driuen by the starres to commit those thinges, which they do. But who made the starres? God. Why, then God is accused: So came it to passe in our fyrste parente, when God reprimed hym. The woman (sayde he) whiche thou gauest me, she hath deceaued me. And by these woordes he wrested the cause of his sinne vnto God. After the selfe same manner do these men deale, whome Paule now speaketh of. We sinne, say they, but the doctrine of the Apostle hath declared vnto vs, that our sinnes are no let vnto the glory of God, but rather pertayne vnto the settinge forth of his truth, sayth, and constancy of promises. And what other thinge els is this, then to accuse the word of God: As touching the first objection Paule sayth.

Is God vnrighteous, vvhich bringeth in anger? As though he shoulde haue sayd: that which ye sayne vnto your selues, that synners are vniustly punished,

if by their occasion the goodnes of God be set forth, is absurde. For then God should iudge vniustly. But no good bypyght reason can once imagine, that he which is iudge of all men, should be vniust. Therfore he addeth.

[I speake as a man.] That is, these thinges I spake, not that I thinke so in very deede: but I speake those thinges, which men both ostentymes thinke, and do also not very selde obiect vnto vs. But as touching the wordes, it shalbe good to note, that whereas it is sayde: If our vnrightheousnes commend the rightheousnes of God, by the rightheousnes of God is vnderstanded his goodnes and mercy. For that word which is in the Hebrue Tsedek, our men haue turned iustice or rightheousnes: when as in very deede it signifieth mercy. He also vseth this word the truth of God, which signifieth nothing els then his sayth or fidelity. For befoze he sayde, Shall our vnbeliefe make the sayth of God, without effect? sayth, in that place, and truth, in this place is nothing els then a constancy in promises and couenantes. And when we reade, I speake as a man, we are taught, what maner of thinges those are which we thinke vpon, so long as we are not regenerate but are strangers from God. Origen in this place followeth an other reading. For he hath, Kar' avp'p'ra. And this particle he ioyneth with those thinges which went befoze, so that thereof this sentence he gathereth. Is God vniust, which bringeth in anger agaynst man: God forbid. But the common reading, is both playne, and also serueth well to the purpose. The maner which the Apostle vseth in answering, when he sayth, God forbid, teacheth vs, how redy we ought to be to repell from our thoughtes and cogitations, whatsoever absurd thing, reaso inferreth out of the scriptures agaynst God. We ought straight way to answer. These thinges are after the maner of men, and therefore are they not to be harkened vnto. It ostentymes happeneth that our sense thinketh, that God is cruell, and forgetfull of his, an acceptor of persons, and such lyke. But then must we call to memory, that the doinges of God, are not to be measured according to the law of man, for he is aboue all lawes, neyther ought to be iudged of any other. This thinges haue the flatterers attributed vnto the bishop of Rome, bearing him in hand, that he hath the fulnes of power, whereby he can dispence both with the lawes of man, and also with the lawes of God: so that he himselte can be iudged of no man. Which fulnes of power, one Baldus a lawyer not the worst of his time, writeth to be the fulnes of time, as which inuerteth and turneth vpside downe all rightes and lawes. These thinges are agreeable vnto God only. Wherefore it is blasphemy to attribute them vnto any man. Only touching thinges of God, it is wickednes to search out the causes and reasons: but whatsoever Philosophers or any other kinde of men do set forth vnto vs, it must be exactly examined by the word of God.

And (as we are blamed, and as some affirme that we say) why do we not euill thinges that good may ensue: whose damnation is iust.] Now withstandeth he the other objection, wherein the aduersaries sayde, that we shoulde sinne, that thereof myght foliow some excellent good thing, namely, the iustification of God, and commendation of his mercy. Whereunto with one word he answereth this, when he sayth, that the damnation of these men is iust. For by that meanes he confelleth, that that so greuous an error is farre strange fro his doctrine, when as he condemneith it together with the, although some expound it, in the passive signification, as though the condemnation, whereby they are condemned, were so: that they had so euill an opinion of the Gospell. Their objections are answered, when they are brought to these absurdities which coulde not be concluded of these thinges which are spoken of Paule, but of the false surmising of these men: whereby they thought that sinnes were the true cause that God should be made iust. For the Apostle also sayth together with them, that euill thinges are not to be committed, that good shoulde come thereof. Wherefore let no man pretende for their sinne a good entent as they vse to say. There is of God a law set forth vnto vs, it is our part to be obedient vnto it. Let vs not folloꝝe the reasoninges of man, thinking with our selues, if I shall obey the commaundements of the Lord, this discomodity or that inconuenience will folloꝝ. This were for a man to pferre himselfe before God: as though he had not foresene what might happen vnto vs by the obseruing of his commaundemēts. Augustine oftentimes citeth this place, when he writeth to Consentius against lieng. And assuredly we also at this time haue much contentiō with them, which defend many euill things vnder the pretence of a good ende. They haue presumed to mainie and to dismember the Sacramente of the Eucharist, because they suspected, that the wine might be spilled out of the cuppe, if it should be distributēd vnto the laye men. They will haue the people also to praye in an unknowne tongue, whiche is forbidden by the woorde of God: and they say, that a laudable entente and good ende is sufficient. And so presume they vpon infinite moe other thinges, not weighing, what the holy Ghost sayth in this place. Yea, and they lay the selfe same thinges vnto our charge, which are now objected vnto Paule. For when we preache iustification freely, and without woorkes, they saye, that we open an entrance, and way vnto loosenes of life, & that we condemne good woorkes: when as yet we teach not these thinges. God indeede forgeneth sinnes freely: but he doth not therefore geue vnto his, licence to sinne: but together with iustification, is geuen the holy Ghost, and an innouation of life: whereof springeth no small endeuour to good woorkes. But if agaynst them we would bryge such kinde of cauellations, peraduenture they shoulde be founde to geue farre moe greater occasion to loosenes of life: forasmuch as they teach, that if a manne confesse his sinnes, and receaue the Ecclesiasticall absolution, althoughe he haue in his mind no good and holy motions, yet is iustificatiō offred, so that he lay not a let agaynst it, as they vse to speake. But this is a very easy matter to do, and openeth a way vnto sinnes, which thing also no lesse doth they: purgatory. But we promise not iustification, but where as is a true and perfect sayth, after which continually do folloꝝe good woorkes. Wherefore seinge vnto vs are objected the selfe same thinges, that were objected vnto Paule, it is manifest, that both he and we haue one and the selfe same cause. But we muste not geue place to these humane reasoninges. So fell the Nouatians: who pretending that they would not minister any occasions to sinne, at length denied repentance. And other many suche examples might be brought forth.

What thē, are we more excellent then they? No, in no wise: for we haue alredy proued, that all, both Jewes and Gentiles, are vnder sinne. As it is written, There is none righteous, no, not one. There is none that vnderstandeth: there is none y seeketh after God. They haue al gone out of y way: they haue ben made altogether vnprofitable: there is none that doth good, no not one. Their throte is an open sepulchre: they haue vsed theyr tongues to deceite: the poyson of aspes is vnder theyr lippes. whose mouth is full of cursinge and bitternes. Theyr feete are swifte to shed bloude. Destruction and calamitie, are in theyr wayes, And the way of peace haue they not knowne. The feare of God, is not before theyr eyes.

What then, do we excell them? No by no meanes. Now returneth he to his purpose, from whence he had before somewhat diuerted. And although he seeme to ascribe many great thinges vnto the Jewes at this present, yet meaneth he not, that therby shoulde be concluded, that they excel the Ethnikes. But this rather is his entente to make them equall with the Ethnikes. Neyther doth that which he now writeth repugne with that which he before spake: although at the first sight there seemeth to be in woords some contradiction. For before he wrote that the state of the Jewes was very excellent, and that circumcision brought vnto them great vtility. But here he seemeth to deny those thinges, whiche he then spake. But the distinction which we before made mencion of, doth easily conciliate ate these things. For if we looke vpon God, vndoubtedly he hath bestowed vpon the Jewes a greate many things, which he hath not geuen vnto other nations. But if we haue a respect vnto the Iewes, they so abused those good things that they had nothing wherein they excelled other nations. Whereby commeth to passe, that either sentence is true. The Greeke Scholies do admonithe vs, that this sentence may be red two manner of wayes. For the Ethnikes, hearinge those things, which the Hebrewes had peculiarly obtained of God to be so much extolled, demaund, What then? Are we overcome, or haue they the victory over vs? So that this word ὑπερβόλῃ, which we haue englished, do vve excell: may be taken passiuely. The other reading is, to take this verbe in the active signification, as though these things shoulde be spoken vnder the person of the Jewes. For when as they had now hearde, they? giftes to be so extolled, they inferre. What then, do we not in dignity excell the Gentils? Vnto whome Paule by negation answereth: No by no meanes. And this answer hath a great Emphasis, or force: as though he shoulde haue sayd. The things which I haue before made mention of, pertaine vnto the person geuen you of God: and they are none of yours. And in that he putteth in himselfe amongst them, in saying: do vve excell: he maketh his reprehension moze gentle, and moze tollerable. Neyther yet in the meane time maketh he a lye, soasmuche as he himselfe also was a parte of the people of Israel as touching the fleshe. There is in the Church so greate a conuexion of those which are in it conuersant together, that euen as the euill, which are amongst the good are in certaine things partakers of they? prayes and benefites (for, for the good sake doth God the longer beare with them, and they haue the vse of good things aswell spirituall as tempozall.) So contrariwise for the euill sake no small discommodities rebounde vnto the sayntes: soasmuche as they haue a feeling of they? punishments, and are oftentimes wapped in the same miseries that they are: neyther haue they anye thinge wherof iustlye to complaine, when as vnto them pertaine after a sort the offences of others. For they haue not eyther admonished, or reposed, or blamed them so much as they ought to haue done. Neyther haue they alwayes shewed them selues an example of good life as it became the: neyther praid they for the so much as they ought to haue done. Wherefore the holy prophets acknowledging in themselves such a communion of sinnes, sayd with others: We haue sinned, we haue done iniquity. Vnto thee belongeth righteousness, vnto vs confusion of face. Now he redyeth a reason, why the Jewes haue nothing wherein they excell the Gentils.

good and the euill.

The sinnes of the wicked pertaine
after a sorte
good.

Because, sayth he, vve haue already proued, and shewed causes, that alvwell the Iewes as the Gentils are vnder sinne. And now besides his accusations, he alledgeth testimonies also of the scriptures, in which were most manifestly comprehended the Iewes. For it is not likely, that the prophets and the scriptures, would reprove the sinnes of other nations, and speake nothing of they? sinnes vnto whome they chiefly pertaine. Whensoeuer the Gentils are reposed in the scriptures, thou shalt see them expresse by name. The burthen of Damascus (sayth Esay) The burthen of Egypt, the burthen of Tyrus, and such like.

There is none iust, no not one. This testimony is written in the 14. psal. and in the Hebrew is redde, En esah tob, non faciēs bonum, not doinge good. The Greeke interpreters haue turned it ποῦν χρηστότητα, which is to do a good dede, or a thinge profitable to our neyghbour. Therin he playnely sheweth, that they were without loue and charitie. It followeth:

There is none that vnderstandeth, ther is none that seeketh after God. These wordes are red in the 53. psal. And it is a generall oracle, as well against the Gentils as against the Iewes. For before these wordes it is there writte: The Lord looked down from heauen vpon the sonnes of Adam, to see whether there were any that hadde vnderstanding, and sought after God. Which thinges are spoken per Anthropopathian as though God were affected with the selfe same properties as men are wont to be. And this serueth to dyne an efficacy into those thinges, which are spoken otherwise.

otherwise God seeth all thinges, neyther needeth he either to beholde, or to serche out any thinge. By this kinde of figure in the booke of Genesis, he is sayd to haue descended vnto the Tower, when it was in buildinge: and in the same booke he sayth, that he woulde go to Sodom, to se whether the thinge were so, as the cry & same had declared vnto him. Although Augustine entreatinge vpon this place writeth that God beholdeth and looketh vpon menne, when he stirreth by those whom he hath inspired with his holy spirite to do any thinge: according to those prophesies of speache whereby he is sayd to tempte or trye, to knowe whether he be beloued or no. For he knoweth also with out any trials: but yet by them he bringeth to passe that we are admonished, and do know that which before we knew not. So Paul sayth, that the spirite searcheth out the profound thinges of God. For, so much as the holy Ghost is God, he needeth no searching out for the knowledge of any thing. But the Apostle so speaketh, because by his impulsion we are stirred vp to serch out those things which pertaine to God. But because there is added.

How God is sayd to looke vpon men.

From heauen, least that should be a let, Augustine affirmeth, that no man can vnderstand this corruption of men, vnlesse his mind be conuersaunte in heauen, and inspired with the spirite of God. But the first interpretation is both easier & redier. And in that men are said, not to vnderstand God, it is not ment of the simple and vulgare knowledge, but of the mighty knowledge and which is of efficacy: so that to vnderstand is as much to say as to feele and to sauour God.

How the spirite searcheth out the profound thinges of God.

Nor seeking after God.] Although all thinges are full of God, yet is he to be sought for of godly men, by reason of the darkenes which compasseth our myndes through originall sinne. For both the fleshe, and the senses, and earthly affections, do let vs from knowing of hym, yea though he be present. And by this second testimony all men are proued to be without sayth. It followeth.

Whether men are truly said not to vnderstand God. If God be euery where, why is it sayd that he must be sought for. Faith is not natural in men.

All haue gone out of the way, and are made altogether vnprofitable. There is none that doth good, no not one.] Those thinges are spoken as it were out of the mouth of God, after that he had beheld from heauen the maners of men. And this vndoubtedly is a consequent, that they which are destitute of sayth and charity, do go backward, and do depart from God. For so soundeth this word in the Hebrie, which is here sayd, They haue gone out of the way. And that which is here written, They are become vnprofitable, is in the Hebrie, they are become rotten, and haue brought forth a stinking sanoe: which cometh to passe when sinnes are publikely, and dayly committed.

There is none, no not one.] Some by this word one, vnderstand Christ: because he alone was free from sinne. Which sentence although it be true, yet is not their interpretation agreeable with these wordes, when as in the Hebrie it is Engamched, that is, no not one. And by that meanes, this sentence is of great force to eraggerate and amplify the custonable wickednes of men. For adventure this seemeth strange, why the holy prophetes, as David and such other like are not excepted. Some answer, that herein is vbled the figure hyperbole, because the greater parte of men was so infected. But in my iudgement this seemeth to be more agreeable with the truth, that the holy ghost speaketh of the nature of men, as it is of it selfe. For they which were comprehended in Christ, were exempted out of this number, which thing yet was geuen them, not by their owne strengthes, or in respect that they were men, but because they were regenerate and renned by Christ.

Their throte is an open sepulchre, They haue vled their tongues to deceite.] These wordes are read in the 6. Psal. Hetherto he hath shewed that they were not profitable to their neighbours, neither sought they after God. But now he declareth, that both in tongue, and also in deedes, they were hurtfull toward their neighbours. He compareth their mouth to a sepulchre, because it spake filthy thinges, and stanke as a sepulchre doth. A sepulchre also sendeth not agayne the deade, whome it hath once swallowed by. So these men, with their tongues and vncleane mouth bere men without measure & ende. Further a sepulchre is sayd never to be satisfied. So these men are not content wth the destruction of one or two: but are ready, if it lay in them, to devour all men. In some, he affirmeth them to be such manner of men, that whosoever is once wrapped with the nettes of their words, is as utterly cast away, as they are which are already layd in the sepulch<sup>r</sup>, or grave. Neither wanteth this word, Open, an emphasis. Because sepulchres being shut receive not those things which are brought in: but being open they refuse nothing. To use their tongues to disceate, is among the Hebrewes leholi ko, which word is derived of this verbe Halak, which is to part, & to distribute. And that vice is here described, whereby a man speaketh, not as the thing is in dede, but frameth his speech to get favour, and for his commodities sake. For wth one man they talke farre otherwise, then they did with an other man. A man may call them double tonged folkes. James reprehendeth them, for that out of one and the selfe same mouth, they bring forth both sweete and bitter things.

The metaphor of a sepulchre.

The poyson of aspes is vnder their lippes.] This is written in the 140th Psal. These mens wordes he compareth with the most present poyson of serpents.

Whose mouth is full of cursing & bitternes.] This word bitternes, is in Greke Ap<sup>er</sup>s. This may be applied vnto those which by reason of anger are so import<sup>er</sup>, & they are not able to speke a word, but they must curse & banne & fare like mad men. Their wordes are as sharpe as speares, and they seme to speake swordes.

Their feete are swift to shed blood.] This is writte in Esay ch<sup>ap</sup>. 59. After cruel wordes follow murders. And these wordes seme chiefly to be spoken, because of the death of the Prophets, who were miserably slayne of the vngodly.

Contrition and calamity are in their vvayes.] Some by contrition and calamity, vnderstand finnes. But it semeth rather to be a phrase, whereby by their wayes may be vnderstanded whatsoever they go about, take in hand, and attempt. And that is nothing els, but the affliction and oppression of other men.

The vvay of peace haue they not knowen.] For they take nothing in hand to do, which may serue for the commodity and health of their neighbours.

The feare of the Lord is not before their eyes.] This is read in the 36th Psal. In these wordes is touched the summe and head of all evils: which is, not to feare God. Paule might haue brought other most euident testimonies also agaynst the Jewes. As are those which are written in the first chapter of Esay, where the prophet calleth them a wicked seede, naughty children, their Princes, Princes of Sodom, and their people, the people of Gomorrah. And there are infinite sentences whiche serue for this purpose. But the Apostle thoughte these sentences onely sufficiente. Whereby we learne, what is the state and condition of a man, which lieth without Christ. First he wanteth God, yea rather the wrath of God abideth vpon him: farther he is a bondslane of Satan, and an instrument framed to all manner of wicked workes.

But we know that whatsoever things the law speaketh, it speaketh vnto those which are vnder the law. That euery mouth might be stopped, and the whole world might be made guilty before God.

But we know, &c.] The Apostle writeth this, to the ende the Hebrewes should not cauell, that these scriptures pertayned not vnto them. Neither could the Jewes deny, but that they were vnder the law, when as vnto them chiefly was it geuen, and they in the conuaince promised, that they would do all thinges which God had commaunded. Farther in their circumcision they declared a profession to obserue the law. Yea and we also are after a sorte vnder the law. For the morall precepts, so far as much as they are known by the light of nature, do continually hold their strength. In ceremonies also something is alwayes to be considered as chiefe, which a man may call the kernell, sappe, & sinnow, & that continually abideth: only the circumstances are oftentimes altered. Also the iudicial lawes contain thinges honest & iust, which are also obserued of vs: although the manner of punishment, & certayne other singular thinges are with liberty changed. And how far the law vnder which we are subiect extendeth it self, & epistle vnto the Phil. declareth, wherein it is writen, That

Which remaineth brethren, whatsoeuer things are true, whatsoeuer profitable, whatsoeuer of good name, if there be any vertue, and if there be any praise, upon these things thinke ye: the things which ye haue learned & receiued, & hard, and sene in me, these things (I say) do ye. Whereby is manifest how they are deceiued, which of preceptes make counsels, & by that meanes do sinne more greuously, in that they put works (as they call them) of supererogation. Therefore those things which are here spoken, do touch vs also, if we fall away from Christ. These notes of vniuersality, are diligently to be weighed, which Paule vseth when he saith:

We must not of preceptes make counsels. Works of supererogation are excluded.

Euery mouth, and the whole world. For they are of no small force to attayne to the right definitiō of iustificatiō. He would not without a cause y our mouth should be stopped, soasmuch as we are all to much prone to excuses, & there is none which thinketh not to much of himselfe. With the Apostle hath proued his matter by testimonies of the scriptures, they are much to be repproued, which wil haue the holy scriptures banished out of the hands of the faithfull. Whereby easely appeareth the vtility of the, when as they both pertaine vnto all mē, and also set before our eyes our sinnes. Chrysostome in his homely of Lazarus & the riche man, exhorteth all mē in general to reade the, and those men by name, which are geue to the lawe, which occupie merchaundise, & kepe families. And he affirmeth, that it is impossible, that they should attayne to saluatiō, vnles they occupy theselues day & night in readeyng of the holy scriptures. Yea & he addeth also, that they haue greater nede of readeyng the holy scriptures, then haue holier men, for that they are continually in greater daunger. This worde ὁ νόμος, that is, guilty, the same Chrysostome expoundeth of him, which of himselfe hath nothing to bring for his owne defence, but hath nede of an other. They are guilty before God, which haue nothyng whereof to glory. And the cōfession of our sinnes doth chiefly make vs such. The Apostle hath hitherto to this place laboured much in accusing of sinnes, to the ende he might impell & driue mē vnto Christ. Whom we also to our power ought to imitate, when we haue to do with our neighbours. There are some which wil not heare of their pastors and preachers, but only treatises of things deuine, and debatements of subtile questions. But they are farre deceiued. For first it is expedient, that they haue a thorow consideration vnto theyr owne sinnes. As a phisition vseth in a rottē soze, first to cut of the corrupt flesh, before he wil geue any plasters to heale it withall. And so cometh it to passe, that the law openeth the way vnto the Gospel. Neither is this to be maruelled at, that in this place, by the law, are vnderstanded the Prophets and Psalmes. For what soeuer is found in the whole scripture, serueth to the institution of lyfe, which is peculiar and proper vnto the law.

The scriptures necessary for all men.

Pastors ought aboue all thinges to repproue sinnes. A similitude

But now is y righteousness of God made manifest wout the law, hauing witnes of the law & of the Prophets. Namely, the righteousness of God by the faith of Iesus Christ vnto all, and vpon all that beleue. For there is no difference: for all haue sinned, & are deprived of the glory of God: And are iustified frely by his grace, thorough the redemption that is in Christ Iesu, whome God hath set forth to be a reconciliation thorough fayth in his blood, to declare his righteousness by the remission of the sinnes that are passed thorough the patience of God, to shew at this present tyme his righteousness, y he might be iust, and a iustifier of hym which is of the fayth of Iesus Christ.

Because by the workes of the law shall no flesh be iustified in his sight. Whereto Paule hath by good argumentes proued, that iustification is not to be looked for by those thinges, which whē we haue obtayned, yet not withstanding we lyne wickedly. That philosophy and the law were such, he hath manifestly declared: forasmuch as by them were accused both the Gentles and the Iewes, that they were exceedingly contaminated with wicked actes. Wherby is concluded, that y mouth as well of the Iewes as of y Gentiles is stopped, so that the whole world is made culpable before God. And in that he lastly chiefly inueighed by sundry testimonies of the holy Scripture, it was because he should haue a sharpe conflict agaynst the Heb2ues. For the Ethnikes were easely overcome. For they openly liued filthily, neither could they out of philosophy bring any thing but the inuentions and opinions of men. But the Heb2ues pretended the law and the ceremonies, which they had receiued at the handes of God: and therefore it seemed, that they might lawfully put confidence in them. And peraduenture they mought haue sayd, y those thinges which were brought against them out of the holy scriptures, pertayned vnto they2 elders, and vnto them which filthily liued in the tyme of the Prophetes, and not to they2 whole kinred. Therefore the Apostle bringeth in a generall sentence, wherby utterly to repress them, and affirmeth, that no man can be iustified before God by the workes of the law. Where he taketh away the power of iustifying, not onely from men or persons, but also from the workes of the law, so that it followeth of necessity, that we must not put any confidence in them. For as they were comanded by the law, no man was able to performe them. For soasmuch as two thinges were required by the law: First, that workes should procede from faith, grace, and charity: Secondly, that throughout and exactly they should agree with the law, and sithen the law ministred not strengthes to do these thinges, there remained onely outward obseruations and ceremonies, of which the Apostle sayth, that they had not the power to iustifie. Afterward by a firme reason he concludeth, that we must not thinke that iustification is receined by the law, because by it commeth y knowledge of sinne. Seyng therefore the law condemneth & accuseth, it absolveth not, nor iustifieth. For these two offices are contrary and repugnaunt the one to the other, And these thyngs being thus ordered, he gathereth his chiefe proposition, of which he will in this epistle dispute: namely, that righteousness commeth wythout the law. Wherby commeth to passe, that it dependeth not of it. Afterward he affirmeth that the righteousness of God which hath his testimony out of the law and the prophetes, commeth by the sayth of Jesus Christ. And this is all one wyth that which he proposed at the beginning: that the Gospell is the power of God to saluation, to every one that beleueth: and that in it is reueled the righteousness of God fro faith to faith, and that the iust man (as Abacuck saith) liueth by faith. Thus much as touching the disposition, now let vs diligently examine every thing by it selfe. In that he saith, That by the workes of the law no flesh shalbe iustified in the sight of God: It is necessary that we know of what workes of the lawe, the Apostle here intreateth. And here we affirme, that he speaketh vniuersally of all workes: so y those thinges which are here spoken, ought not peticularly to be drawen vnto ceremonies, whē as they include y whole law. We graunt in dede y the controuersy sprōg by reaso of ceremonies. For y false Apostles went about to obtrude the, as necessary vnto the which beleued in Christ. As though Christ could not without the bring saluation to y beleuers. Which was blasphemous, neither was it any lesse irreligious, then to deny Christ to be Christ: which thing they must nedes graunt, that affirme that he cannot saue men without the workes of the law. But as touching mo2all commaundementes they contended not. For as well the Apostles as the deceiuers brged them. Neither was there any controuersie about ciuill or (as they call them) iudiciall lawes, for they pertayned vnto the publike wealth. Which soasmuch as it had maiestates, the church and the Apostles toke no care of those thinges. But although the contention sprōg by reason of ceremonies, yet by the benefite of the holy ghost it came to passe, that Paule reuoked the question from the species or partes vnto the vniuersall genus or generall worde. For if the generall worde be by negation ouerthrowen, it followeth that the species also & every parte be clene destroyed. For if generally the law iustify not, neither vndoubtedly shall ceremonies iustify: soasmuch as they are a certaine species and a part of the lawe. And that the discention began by reason of ceremonies, the Actes of the Apostles do testifie in the 15. chapter. And not much afterwarde in this selfe same epistle, the A-postle when he would proue that Abraham was not iustified by the lawe, bring-geth a reason taken from Circumcission. And also to the Galathians where he rehearseth

heareth this selfe same sentence, and in a maner with the selfe same wordes that they are here, when he saith: *We are by nature Iewes, and not sinners of the Gentiles: Because we know that man is not iustified by the workes of the lawe, but by the fayth of Iesus Christ. Also, we haue beleued in Christ Iesus: that we mighte be iustified by the fayth of Christ, and not by the workes of the lawe. For no fleshe shall be iustified by the workes of the lawe. And undoubtedly, Paule reproued not Peter, but onely touchyng ceremonies. And in the same place in y third chapiter he writeth, Haue ye receiued the spirite by the workes of the law, or by preaching of fayth? Are ye so foolish, that hauing begonne in the spirite, ye should now make an ende in the fleshe? where by y workes of the law, seing he expoundeth them by the fleshe, he manifestly understandeth the ceremonies of Moses. But although therebence sprang the controuersie, yet was it most commodiously done for Paule to reuoke it to the genus or generall worde of workes of the law. Forasmuch, as the tyme should come, that ceremonies being banished, many would in successe of tyme, attribute iustificatio to morall workes: which is most manifestly confuted by this so pithy a reason of Paule. And this is to be noted, that this is an argument that may be turned. For euen as we may inferre that no workes of the law do iustifie: therfore neither do ceremonies iustifie: so contrariwise may we conclude: if ceremonies iustifie not, therfore neither any other part of the law: forasmuch, as they were the principall part of the lawe. For they are the offices of the first and greatest commaundement. I am (sayth the Lord) thy God. Wherfore it is mete, that I be worshipped of thee, bothe in spirite and in outward confession, not only by voyce, but also by rites apointed by me. Nei ther did those ceremonies any lesse bynde the olde fathers, then do Baptisme and the Eucharist in these dayes binde vs. Wherfore euen as they most greuously sinned, when they were not content with the worshipping prescribed them by God, but sought new ceremonies and rites inuented by men (for that was to go aboute to adde vnto the wisdom of God: and that the worshipping instituted by God was the chiefe wisdom, we rede in Deut. the iij. chapter) so our men do most greuously sinne, when besides Baptisme and the Eucharist, and those thinges which we haue deliuered vs by Christ, they appoint other thinges which me haue inuented, as worshippings of God, and, as necessary vnto saluation. As are the masse, the inuocation of saintes, and such other like. And that by the workes of the lawe are vnderstanded also morall workes, Paule teacheth by that which followeth.*

For by the law is the knowledge of sinne. For although other partes also of the law do after a sort declare sinne, yet is that chiefly the office of the morall part. Which thing is expessedly declared in the vii. chap. where he writeth. For I should not haue knownen what lust had bene, if the law had not sayd, Thou shalt not lust. And this is furthermore to be noted, that the workes of the law as I before said, when they are taken properly haue ioynd with them fayth and charity, and therfore are they not without iustification. For wheresoever is true fayth there iustificatio followeth. But the Apostle by workes of the law vnderstandeth, as they were done of them beyng vnprofitable, and proceeding also of hipocrisie. Otherwise the law in dede is spirituall, wherfore the workes thereof must nedes be good, if they be considered as they are whole and perfect. And by this meanes may we conciliate those places, which as touching this thing seme in the holy scriptures to be repugnant. Moses said, that he did set before the Iewes, life, when he spake of the lawe. And in the 119. psalme David prayeth oftentimes, that God would quicken him with his commaundements, and with his law. And in this selfe same epistle, the law is called both good and spirituall, and the commaundement holy and good. But on the contrary side Paule calleth it the ministry of death: in the next chapter he saith, that it worketh anger: and againe, that it sheweth sinne: and therfore condemneth and accuseth. So must we vnderstand the fathers also, when they ascribe so excellent thinges vnto workes. For they take them ioynd with fayth, grace, and the holy ghoist. And so they ascribe vnto them eternall life, and other suche like thinges which are vnderstanded to be geuen vnto them by reason of fayth and the spirite. And to declare the same this is a very apt similitude. We say that man is reasonable, vnto whome yet we ascribe reason, not because of the body, but because of the

If ceremonies iustify not, neither doth the morall part iustify.

If the fathers at any tyme attribute righte onnes vnto good workes, that is to be vnderstand by reason of fayth which they haue as a roote.

Cap. 2 A Commentarie vpon the

By faith alone we are justified, which yet is neuer alone.

The fathers spake hyperbolically of woꝝkes. Faith as it is a woꝝke iustifieth not.

The power of iustifying is to be referred to his object. A similitude.

Woꝝkes iustify not, because they proceede of iustification.

Why Paule calleth those woꝝkes the woꝝkes of the lawe which are maintained and vnperfect.

A similitude.

soule which is included in the body. So when iustification seemeth to be ascribed vnto woꝝkes, we must vnderstand y<sup>e</sup> that is done by reason of faith, wherunto woꝝkes, which are in very deede good, do chiefly lene. But we, when we wil speake of iustification, ought to bring forth our sentence p<sup>ro</sup>speriously & exp<sup>re</sup>ssedly. Wherefore we say, y<sup>e</sup> iustification cometh by faith only: which faith yet we confesse is neuer alone. For if it be a true faith, it ought alwaies to haue good woꝝkes ioyned with it. But the holy fathers spake hyperbolically of woꝝkes, to the ende to stirre by men more and more to vse them. But they are so to be vnderstanded as I haue sayd, vnles we will leaue them without Christ. But some object, that sayth also it selfe is a woꝝke of the lawe. Therefore we answer, that as it is our woꝝke comming out of our will and vnderstanding, it iustifieth not. Because it is feeble and weake. For none beleueth so much as he ought, neyther so strongly cleaueth vnto God, as he should do. But when sayth is sayd to iustifie, it is taken for his object, namely, Christ, and the promises of God. Neyerther is sayth that thing which iustifieth: but the instrument whereby iustification is receaued. Neyer must we thinke, that by the woꝝthynes thereof it is of it selfe sufficient to iustifie a man. A most euident similitude may be brought as touching a begger, which with his weake hand, or peraduenture with his hand infected with leprosy receaueth almes. And that benefite is not weighed according to the weakenes or disease of the hand which receaueth it, but according to the quantity of the monye which is geuen. Wherefore when we are demaunded, whether the woꝝkes of the lawe iustify, we answer: if a man vnderstandeth as they are vnperfect and mayned, they haue no strength to iustify. But if a man vnderstand the woꝝkes of the lawe, as they are whole and perfect, so are they not strange from iustification, because they haue faith ioyned with them: wherewith they cleaue as vnto the roote. Yet will we not graunt that good woꝝkes being taken euen after this maner do iustify: for that they proceede of iustification, & do of necessity require iustification to go before them: and therefore are they not strange from it, because they depend of it. Thou wilt say peraduenture, why both Paule by the woꝝkes of the lawe vnderstand those mayned and vnperfecte woꝝkes? Because he taketh them as the aduersaries did: which had a respect only vnto them: and were strangers both from Christ and also from sayth in him. And that Paule did not thinke those to be in very deede the woꝝkes of the lawe, it manifestly appeareth by that which is before written: He is not a Jew, which is only a Jew outward, neyther is that circumcision which is in the flesh only. Where a man may manifestly see, that he taketh away the nature of the Jewish religion and of circumcision from the obseruation which is only outward. And vndoubtedly the Images of good thinges, if they haue only a shewe, be in themselves vayne, and ought to be counted among thinges woꝝthy of dispayse. As the art of Sophistry, forasmuch as it hath a shewe of knowledge and wanteth it in very deede, is condemned. Hypocrisy also is to be detested: which although it set forth a shewe of holynes, yet is it most farre of from it. Wherefore if a man should, agaynst the proper and true woꝝkes of the lawe, vse those testimonies which Paule now alleageth, and which to the like purpose he writeth in an other place, vndoubtedly he should abuse them. As if a man should impute vnto true nobility those reproches, which are iustly imputed vnto them, which hauing had excellent noble p<sup>re</sup>genitors, haue degenerated from them into most filthy vices. Or if a man should reprove eloquence after the selfe same maner, that we are wont iustly to reprove those, which only with fine and eloquent woꝝdes do poynt out foolish matter, when as they are bitterly ignorant of the sound truth. But as touching this matter let this suffice at this present. Now is this to be expounded, why he addeth this particule. Before God. Vndoubtedly therefore, that by the contrary we myght know, that certayne may sometymes be iustified before men by the woꝝkes of the lawe. Because forasmuch as the sight of man can not perce into the inward partes partes of the hart, men do geue sentence by the woꝝkes. But God as Augustine writeth in his booke De spiritu & litera, beholdeth the hart: and sometymes beholdeth them, which outwardly kepe the lawe, and inwardly desire rather to do otherwise: were not eyther that punishmentes hang ouer theyr heds, or that they thinke that they shoulde thereby lose their estimation: when as in very dede they want both fayth and charity. Neyther is this to be passed ouer, that by the name of fleshe is vnderstand the whole man. Which phrase of speach is much vsed in the scriptures. The word was made fleshe. All fleshe had corrupted his way. All fleshe shall see the saluation of God. And a greates many other such lyke. And therefore is man so called, that he might be continually admonished of his miserable and weake estate: and that he shoulde vnderstand, that vnles the spirite of God shoulde resist it, he shoulde bitterly be caried away with the appetite of the fleshe. To iustify, as we haue before said, is taken thre maner of wayes. Sometymes it is to obtayne a righteousnes which sticketh and abideth in our minds. But such righteousnes Paule meaneth not in this place. Otherwise we deny not, but that of true woꝝkes of the lawe, by continuall exercise of them, are ingenerated good and holy habites or qualities. To be iustified also is to be pronounced or to be counted iust. Which thinges also may be gotten by woꝝkes. For so one is sayd to iustifye an other, when he beholdeth his good dedes. God also in the last iudgement shall geue sentence according to woꝝkes, and shall pronounce good men iust by those thinges, which they vprightly haue done. Thirdly to iustifye, is as much to say as to forgiue sinnes, to absolue a man, and to impute vnto him the righteousnes of Christ, which thing woꝝkes by their deserte can not obtayne. And in this sense are those thinges to be taken, which the Apostle here writeth. It followeth:

For by the lawe, is the knowledge of sinne. This is the reason why we are not iustified by the woꝝkes of the lawe. Because the office of the lawe is farre other, then to iustifie. There are some which thinke that these woꝝdes are spoken by pꝛeuentio[n], as though the Iewes shoulde object and say: If the lawe iustifye not, why then was it geuen? Haue we in bayne receaued it? We haue not in bayne receaued it, sayth Paule: the office thereof is to shew sinnes. If a man demand of what lawe these thinges are spoken, we answer that Paule doth pꝛiuately entreate of the lawe of Moses: but the propriety which he bringeth is common to all lawes, to the lawe of nature, the lawe of Moses, & to ciuill lawes, which we vse in our publike wealthes. As touching the lawe of Moses, and ours, there is no doubt to be put. As concerning the lawe of nature, the booke of Genesis, doth most manifestly teach that by it was sinne knowen. Which thing Ambrose vpon this place alleadgeth out of the hystory of Ioseph. And Paule also wyll afterward declare the same, when he sayth: For euen vnto the lawe, sinne was in the world: but it was not so counted, namely, because, the lawe of nature was dayly moze and moze obfuscated. Wherefore it was necessary that by the lawe of Moses and other lawes, it shoulde be agayne illustrated. And that syn was before Moses time, he thereby declareth, because death reigned all that time ouer all mankind. And in this place in the Greke is ἐν νόμῳ, which in latine a man may call Agnitio, that is, an acknowledging: which is, when a thinge being already knowen, is againe called to knowledge. But after what sorte the lawe is sayd to woꝝke the acknowledginge of sinnes, he hath before taughte, whē as by many testimonies of the scriptures he accused all mankind. Wherefore seinge by those woꝝdes and such like we are accused of the lawe, the knowledge of sinne must needs follow. Which thing also happeneth an other waye, namely, when we beholde the lawe of God: For if them it commaundeth thinges vpright, and prohibiteth thinges vnhonnest, it sufficiently declareth vnto vs, howe and when we sinne in our dooings. The scriptures also containeth the threateninges soꝛspoken by the Prophetes: and the punishmentes which God hath euer moze inflicted vpon transgressors. All which thinges not a little conduce to the acknowledging of sinne. But this is to be meruailed at, that seeing the lawe doth set before our eyes not onely our sinnes, but also thinges honeste and iuste (For those thinges also doth it commaunde, and therefore they pertaine to one and the selfe same knowledge: euen as it belongeth to one artificer, as to a Geometrician to declare what is a right line and what is a crooked line) it is to be meruailed at (I say) what moued the Apostle, to make mention onely of sinne. Whereunto may be answered, that Paul so wrote, partly because the Iewes whiche had refused Christ and his sayth, had no more any parte with the righteousness and brightness of the law: partly also, (which is most likely) because that other parte pertained not vnto the purpose of Paul. For his purpose was to proue, that the woordes of the law iustify not. Because so much as it both accuseth and condemneth, it is not to be looked for, that it should iustify, when as these thinges are both contrary and also muche repugnaunte one to the other: Neither commeth it to the law by chaunce, to declare sinne: but it is such a propriety, so annexed vnto it, which cannot be plucked away fro it. But here ariseth a doubt: for lawgeuers seme not when they geue lawes to haue a regard to this thing onely to make vs to vnderstand offences, or thinges well done: but this rather entend they, by theyr lawes to make theyr citezens good. Which thing if it be ascribed vnto men, much more oughte it to be attributed vnto God: But we answer that there is a difference betwene the lawes of God and the lawes of man: because mans lawes require nothinge of vs, but that whiche lieth in our power to do. For as touching the affections of the minde, they are not carefull they correct onely outward thinges. But the lawes of God do commaunde those thinges also, which we being as we are weake, are not able to performe. Wherefore the similitude which they bring concludeth nothinge. Farther this is to be considered, that humane lawes also, by declaring what thinges are to be done, by promising, and by threatening, may inuite and stirre by men vnto righteousness. But to change the mind, they cannot. Wherefore we ought not to attribute more vnto them, then vnto the lawes of God. And that whiche is sayde of the intent and purpose of the humane lawgeuer, we graunte of God also, that his entente also in geuinge his law was, to save men by it: namely, as wherein he did not onely shew sinnes, but also Christe whiche is the ende thereof. And therefore we deny not, but that the lawe is profitable to men vnto saluatiō. And yet can it not iustify: because the office thereof is not to poure into our harts either faith or charite. Wherefore the wonderfull wiliness of Sathan is to be taken heede of: whereby he goeth about to plucke away from men the frutes of the lawe. And vndoubtedly besides the knowledge of sinne, it brought two other excellent good thinges: First it shewed vnto vs our sauour: farther it prescribed vnto vs what was best to be done. As touching the first the deuill hath obscured the hartes of men, that they should not behold Christ, whiche is the ende of the law puttinge a bayle before theyr hartes. And as touching the execution of good woordes, he hath hindered them by triedinge questions, genealogies, and vayne bablinges so that they beinge bent vnto them onely, and vnto outward ceremonies, had no farther regard. In wordes forsooth they confessed that they knew God, but in deedes they denied him. Farther so much as by the law sinne is known, it followeth that by it sinnes are after a sorte aggrauated: Whiche thing the Apostle declared, when he wrote, that the law is the power of synne. And in this Epistle the vii. chapter it is written. That synne mighte be out of measure synfull throughe the commandemente.

By the law (sayth he) is the knowledge of sinne. This is to certaine, that the deuine minde is the beginning and ground of all lawes. For in any decrees whatsoeuer is found either iust or honest, that altogether thereence proceedeth. So that we may rightly say that all lawes are nothing els but the ordinances of the deuine minde. Whereby is concluded, that such lawes which are not iust ought not to be counted for lawes. The knowledge of sinne which is had by the law law, is of two sortes: one, whiche is utterly of no efficacy, and weake, whereby mens mindes are not made astrayd, nor the consciences detected: as sometimes we se by onhardes, which euen in the middell of theyr cuppes condemne the vice of byonhennes. The Poets also in theyr verses and meeters most openly repro- ued sinnes: but yet they themselves refrayned not from them, any more then o- thers. But that knowledge of sin which terrefieth, doth not alwayes bringe sal- uation. Because if it be frustrated of hope of remedye, it is hurtfull, as it hap- pened in Judas, Esau, and Cain: who when they knewe theyr wickednes, fell into dyspayre. But as touchinge the electe, vnto the knowledge of sinnes is alwayes ioyned as a companion, hope of obteyning saluation by Christ. The sins whiche are knowne by the lawe, if we rehearse them by theyr partes, are these, firste the sinne which from our birth cleaueth vnto vs, which is called originall sinne, and it is the vice and corruption of our whole nature: of whiche we are taught in the psalme: In iniquity was I conceived, and in sinnes hath my mother conceived me: secondly, the motions and vehement impulsions which the Grecians call opwds: do continually flowe out of that corruption, and resist the lawe of God. Of which Paul writeth, that he felt an other law in his members repugnant vnto the law of his minde, and leading hym a way captyue into the law of sinne. Then thirdely commeth the consent of the will, and by that meanes is sinne made more grie- uous. And of this we reade: Let not sinne raigne in youre mortall body. After that followeth custome: and by the bonds thereof are we more streightly bound vnder the rule of sinne: so that it is in a maner impossible, to overcome an vlc now inueterated: for as Esay sayth, An Ethiopian can not change his skynne. Last- ly the vngodly are sometymes brought to that poynthe, that they sinne agaynst the holy ghost: vnto which sinne forgiveness is utterly denied, as Christ hath taught vs in the Gospell. And Jeremy was commaunded, not to pray any more for the people. Sinne also might be deuised into thoughts, wordes, and deedes agaynst the law of God. And of all these the law instructeth vs. And sinne gene- rally is, to stray from the commaundement of the lawe: as archers when they hit not the marke, which way so euer it be, do fayne and misse: wherefore, seeing man was made vnto the Image of God, in his life and maners to expresse the nature and disposition of hym, whensoever he misseth of that, he sinneth. But this benefite, to be admonished, and accused of our wicked actes, bringeth not with it an absolute profite: when as of our selues we are not able to auoide those thinges, whereof we be accused, nor to perforce those thinges, whereof we be admonished. Therefore we must see, that we haue a regard vnto Christ, vnto whome we are by the law brought. And this is to be marked, that these thinges are chiefly written of the lawe by an antithesis, or comparison vnto sayth. For if the lawe be taken by it selfe, it is so farre of from geuing vnto vs righteousness and honour, that it maketh vs naked and layeth open whatso- euer filthynes we haue committed: so that by it we get nothing but confusion. Which thing yet happeneth not through the default of the lawe, but through the default of our mynde: because the lawe lighteth vpon it being corrupt and bent to euill thinges. For we are prone to do all thinges which are repugnant vnto the law of God. For it commaundeth, that we should put our trust in god, but we trust to our selues. It commaundeth, that we should be seruisable vnto our neighbour: but our desire is, that all men might be our seruantes. And when with vnbzdeled lust we rushe vpon these and such like sinnes, the law of God setteth it selfe agaynst vs, as both a stoppe against a strong streame, a- gainst which when the water commeth, it swelleth, and is made more violent: For as the saying is, Nititur in vetitum, & cupimus negata, that is, we inde- nour our selues to that which is forbidden vs, and couet the thinges that are denyed vs. All which thinges notwithstanding, yet is it an excellent benefite of God, which is geuen vnto vs by it, namely, to know our selues. Neyther must we thinke, that we want that benefite, for that we are sayde in the holy tures, to be by Christ deliuered from the lawe. For, that is not to be understand-ed simplye. For the abrogation of the lawe is two maner of wayes: One is whereby we are not bound to performe those thinges which are commaunded: As we see is of iudiciall commaundementes, and ceremonies. Which thing is not to be understood of the morall commaundementes. Christ sayth, that he came not to breake the lawe, but rather to fulfill it. And Paule sayth: What then, do we by sayth abolishe the lawe? God forbid. Yea rather we establishe the lawe. There is an other abrogation of the law, whereby the law is letted, that it can not accuse vs as guiltye. And so is the morall part also understood to be abolished.

But if we will speake more vprightly, the law is not abrogated: but the domination or power, which followeth it: so that we must thinke, that the stringe rather thereof is plucked out, then that it is all whole taken away. That is true indeede, which is written vnto Timothee, that vnto the iust man the law is not geue:

Because, as Augustine writeth in his booke De spiritu & littera, Who would prescribe a lawe vnto hym, whiche of his owne wyll and accorde dothe and executeth those thynges, whiche pertaine vnto ryghteousnesse? Wherefore his iudgement is, that iust men vse the lawe towarde others, whome they instruct, in dviuing it into theyr hebes, and diligently setting it befoze them, to stirre them by to repentance: And soasmuch as the Apostle seemeth to haue spoken thinges repugnant, (for on the one syde he affirmeth, that the lawe is not set vnto the iust mā: and on the other side, he sayth it is good, so that a man vse it lawfully: But none vse it lawfully, but only the iust man) Augustine conciliateth them after this maner: that a man may haue the good vse of the lawe being not yet iusti-fied, but by the helpe thereof tendeth to iustification: which thing he laboureth by two similitudes to proue. It happeneth (sayth he) that a man goyng to a place, is caried in a chariot: and when he is once come to the place, he leaueth the chariot. And children that are yong beginners, haue a scholemaister appointed them: but when they are once perfect, the scholemaister is taken away from them. So (sayth he) whilest a man is called backe from sinnes, and goeth forward vnto righteounesse, the lawe is profitable vnto hym. But when he hath once attayned vnto righteounesse, he is deliuered from it, and extendeth the vse thereof towarde others. But yet ought we not to deny, but that they also whiche are conuerted vnto Christ, are by the lawe dayly more and more instructed. There still remayneth muche of the fleshe: and ouermuch darknes ouer couereth our senses and vnderstandyng, so long as we lyue here. Wherefore the vse of the lawe is not superfluous towarde them also, whiche are iustified. And soasmuch as we are not fullpe renued, in that there still remayneth some parte of the olde man, and dayly falle do still scale vpon vs, bothe vntowares vnto vs and also agaynst our willes, the lawe fin-deth in vs matter both to reprove and also to accuse: althoughe by the benefite of Christe it can not reach to condemnation. Which vndoubtedly it shoulde doe as touching his owne nature, if we were not now by sayth iustified. By this place let vs note, what it is with fruite to reade the Scriptures, especialle those places, wherein the lawe is written. For it is not sufficient diligently and curiously to read them: vnles we do in them as it were in a glasse behold with how many and how great sinnes we are oppressed. Otherwise it shall bee all one to bee occupied in them, as to marke what Lini, Aristotle, Salust, Plutarke, and other writers haue left in writing.

But now without the law is the righteounesse of God made manifest, beyng confirmed by the testimony of the law, and of the prophetes. Here is expressedly put forth the question, wherof he will after ward entreat. And thereof he putteth two partes. Of which the one is, that the righteounesse of God is without the law made manifest. The other is, that it is obtained by the faith of Iesus Christ. And Paule affirmeth, that this righteounesse of God hath the testimony both of the law and of the prophetes. This is it which he proposed at the beginning that by the Gospell is reueled the righteounesse of God from faith to faith. And in that he writeth, that this manifestation is done without the law, he understandeth, without helpe of the law being obserued: but onely by the hearing of faith. Which selfe thing he affirmed vnto the Galatians when he said: Haue ye receiued the holy ghost by the workes of the law, or by the hearing of faith? The righteousness of God (as I haue in an other place declared) is threefold. The first is, wherby we are through Christ receiued into fauour, and our sinnes are forgiven vs, and the righteousness of Christ is imputed vnto vs. And the second kind of righteousness followeth this, namely, that thorough helpe of the holy ghost our minde is reformed, and we all whole are inwardly renewed by grace. Thirdly, follow holy and godly workes, for they which are once come thus far, are most zelous and desirous of working well. Now then Paule entreateth of the first righteousness whiche he saith, is declared in vs without the law. And he calleth it the righteousness of God, because it is gotten thorough his power and goodnes, and not thorough our owne workes. And if a man do more narrowly consider it, it is the mercy of God which he bestoweth vpon vs thorough Christ. And I haue in an other place admonished, that that which the Hebrewes call Tsedech, and our men haue turned righteousness, signifieth rather goodnes and mercy. And therefore to this day the Jewes call almes by that name. And Ambrose vpon this place is of the selfe same mynde. For he sayth: Therefore is that called the righteousness of God, which semeth to be the mercy of God, because it hath his originall beginning of Gods promise: and when that promise is performed, it is called the righteousness of God. For therefore is it the righteousness of God, because that is rendered which was promised. Also when he receiveth those which fly vnto him, it is called righteousness. For, one not to receiue him that flieth vnto him, it is iniquity. Thus much Ambrose. But we must not harken vnto them, which in this place do interpret these wordes, Without the law, for, without the ceremonies of the lawe. For we haue before shewed, that althoughe the question was moued by reason of them, yet hath Paule, entreated of the lawe generally, so that it comprehendeth all the partes of the law. They seme not much to overthrote themselves, which by the righteousness of God vnderstande Christ: for whatsoever pertayneth to iustification, that same cometh from him vnto vs, when we beleue in hym. Betwene the righteousness of God and ours, Paule plainly putteth a difference, when he saith in this selfe same Epistle: Being ignorant of the righteousness of God, and seeking to establishe theyr owne, they are not subiecte vnto the righteousness of God. But that we may the better vnderstand, what this manifestation of the righteousness of God is, which then happened chiefly when Paule wrote these thinges, it must thus be vnderstanded, that we must haue a regarde what manner of preaching the Apostles used. As farre as we can gather out of the sermons of the Apostles, as they are set forth in the Actes of the Apostles: First, they preached repentance, setting before mens eyes their sinnes, and condemnation wherin men were wrapped: then they gathered together the proprieties and conditions of Christ, which should heale these euils, and that out of the holy scriptures: Thirdly, they applied the same proprieties and conditions vnto Iesus of Nazareth, to allure men vnto his sayth. And suche as hearing these thinges beleued the same, obteyned of God remission of their sinnes. Inwardly they were made new, and outwardly they liued moste holily, resembling the image of God, to which mankynde was made. With perseuerance they called vpon God, communicating together in prayers, breaking of bread, & all holye workes. They stedfastly did put their trust in God, as they which were utterly destitute of all other helpe. They nothing regarded worldly riches, laying the price of their thinges and money, at the fete of the Apostles. They stoutely bare a good testimonie vnto Christ, reioycing that they suffered greuous thinges for his names sake. Lastly, in this quarell they cherefully shed theyr blood & bestowed theyr life. And the world seeing those thinges, could not but be moued, and acknowledge, that a new kynde of righteousness appeared on the earth. And because amongst them were Ethnikes, which had no knowledge at all of the law, therefore the Apostle sayth Without the law. Also many of the Hebrewes were called, who although they knew the law, law, yet they nothing at all regarded it. And it was all one, as if they had not had the law. There came some also, which liued very byrightly, and were most zealous in the study of the law: as Nathaniell, whome Christ pronounced to be a true Israelite, in whom there was no guile. And these were iustified without the law: for that obseruation of the law which they performed, was not the cause why they were iustified. The lawe in deede may be a helpe vnto iustification, because it admonisheth vs, and accuseth vs, by whiche meanes we are dyuen vnto Christe. But for as muche, as it hath not the strengthe to forgiue synnes, to geue the holye Ghoste, to suggest faythe into the hartes of the hearers, therefore Paule saythe righte well, That we are iustified wythout the lawe. Augustine in his booke de spiritu & litera, sayth, that the Apostle seemeth to speake thynges repugnant. For he affirmeth that the righteousnes of God, whereof he now speake, had his testimonye of the lawe and the Prophetes: and yet he saythe, that it was made manifeste without the lawe. But he answereth, that there is here in very deede no contradiction, if a man rightly distinct those thynges which are here spoken. For therefore Paule excludeth the law, because it poureth not in grace, neither is the cause of iustification: although this righteousnes, whereof he speaketh hath his testimony of it. Wherefore in his first booke and 8. chapt (De gratia Christi, contra Coelestium & Pelagium), he sheweth that this sentence is thus to be pronounced, namely, The righteousnes, of God without the law. and then to adde seuerally by it selfe, as now we made manifeste. So that this particle, without the law, is referred vnto righteousnes, and not vnto these wordes, made manifest. But this doth not verie well agree with the wordes of Paule: although that which he sayth be most true. But this is worthy of noting, that Augustine in the same place sayth, that this aduerbe of time now, is not so to be taken, as though the olde fathers in the lawe of nature, and in the law of Moses, had not saluation by Christ, and obteyned not this righteousnes without the law. The Pelagians vndoubtedly were of this opinion, that many had saluation before Moses time by the lawe of nature, whiche shined moste byghtly in theyr hartes: which being after ward obscured, the law of Moses succeeded, like vnto the Mone: because it brought light, but not altogether absolute. Last of all came Christ, whose light shyneth as bright as the sunne. And so they affirmed, that the olde fathers wer saued without Christ, and without his grace: because Christ was not as yet come. But they were muche deceaued: for that they thought, that the sayth of a thinge to come, serueth not to saluation: when as yet we at this day beleue the resurrection of the dead, the last iudgement, and life eternall, which are thinges to come, and by this sayth are we holpen. So the elders by theyr sayth in Christ to come, receaued as much benefite, as touching iustification, as we now do which are born after his comming. For the merites of the crosse of Christ, and of his bloude, are not thinges duringe but for a time. Wherefore Christ sayd of Abraham, that he desired to see his day, and saw it, and reioysed. Farther Paule sayth, As in Adam all men dye, so in Christ all men are made on lyue. And he most plainly writeth vnto Timothe, that Christ is the onely mediator betwene God and men. Therefore then also before his comming into the fleshe, he gaue righteousnes without the law vnto men whiche beleued in him. And this word, now, which the Apostle here hath, is to be referred vnto the manifestatiō. For indeede this righteousnes was before, but it lay hidde, and very few had it. But now is it publicly and openly knowne vnto the whole world. And this is it, that at the death of Christ the vaille of the Temple did rente, and was made open, so that those thinges which before were hidde, were now made manifest. The Apostle, hauing in this place put forth a question most largely to be entered of, useth therein great perspicuity. And that whiche he purposeth, is denided into two partes. For in the one he denieth, that by the lawe cometh our righteousnes: And in the other he affirmeth, that it is geuen vs by the sayth of Iesus Christ. Wherefore his meaning is, that sayth is the instrument, whereby this righteousnes is apprehended. And he excludeth the law, from which sentence the world exceedingly abhorreth: for that the world knoweth of none other righteousnes nes, but of that which commeth by good woorkes. But men ought to consider, from whence those good woorkes do procede, which they would so sayne haue to iustify. They wilt say, from reason, and the will. But if these twayne be bittated and corrupted, by whom shall they be corrected? They haue nothing to say, but by God. But before he will correct it, it is necessary, that he be merciful, and pacified towards vs. But he is not pacified, but by the death & blood of Christ. Of which things, when we through sayth take hold, we are truly said (as Paul affirmeth) to be iustified by sayth without the law. Commonly it is thought, & that Christ is a lawgiver, which hath by his appointed, and decreed thinges of most excellency, and most profitable. And how excellent the thinges are which he hath commaunded, they gather out of the 5. 6. and 7. chapters of Mathe: where is red, that not onely murder is prohibited, but also wrath, and anger against our neighbour, And commaundement is there geue, that he which hath any offence agaynst an other, should leue his gift at the altar, and go and reconcile him selfe vnto his brother. He commaundeth also, that we should in the way be at a greemet wth our aduersary. Neither forbiddeth he perjury onely, but also any othe. And although in the law be permitted, An eye for an eye. A tooth for a tooth, yet Christ commaundeth that we should not resist euell. Also in the law, adulter-ry is prohibited: but Christ hath also forbidden the lustfull lookinge vpon a wo-mā. And he restrayned those, which would for every slight cause, put away theyr wyues. Of these thinges they inferre, that Christe in his lawes hath commaunded thinges more perfect, then the law of Moses commaunded. And that his lawes were more commodious then the lawes of Moses, hereby they proue, because he abrogated ceremonies, which were very hard to be obserued, neither could they easely be obserued of all nations. We graunt indeede, that by the comminge of Christ ceremonies were taken away, because the signification of them is now fulfilled. But that Christe gaue new lawes, we vtruly deny. He indeede did interpryte the law of Moses, and reponed the error of the Scribes and of the Pharisees: which thought, that none but the greater kind of sinnes, were repugnant vnto the law: & he teacheth & the commaundements of God as far otherwise to be vnderstanded, then they either vnderstood the cheslues, or expounded the vnto others. Wherefore he left the law as he found it, and executed that which belongeth vnto his office, which was, to be made an oblation, and sacrifice for sinnes, and to geue remission of sinnes: and righteousness by imputatio: and the holy ghost, and grace. Wherefore Iohn Baptiste declaring the office of Christ, when he shewed hym with his synger, sayed: Behold the lambe of God, which taketh away the sinnes of the world. These things make against the Anabaptistes, whiche make the Gospel to be nothing but good woorkes, and a most absolute conuersation. These men know not the chief and principall benefite of Christ, neyther make they any difference betwene the law and the Gospel. The law in deede commaundeth: but the Gospel ministrerth strengths to accomplishe those thinges whiche are commaunded. The law accused the: The Gospel absoluerth: The law maketh a sound outwardly: The Gospel is grauen in the bowells: The law woorketh anger: The Gospel maketh God pacified, and reconciled vnto vs: The lawe by making askear, deiecteth the mind: The Gospel by comforting, erecteth it: The law is the ministry of death: The gospel, of life: The law, is a schoolemaster: The gospel, is a perfect instruction: The whole lawe consisteth in this, that we should woork: The Gospel herein chiefly consisteth, that we should beleue: The law bringeth a curse vnto the which-lyue vnder it: The Gospel bringeth blessing: The law bringeth bondage: The Gospel, spirituall liberty: The lawe, is the letter: The Gospel, is the spirite: The lawe hath promises, but with this condition, if ye shall doo all those thinges: The promises of the Gospel, are free, and therefore firme. There mought be reherfed also other differences, whereby these two differ very much, a sunder. But at this tyme we thinke these to be sufficient. Whiche thinges yet are not iudged true by humaine reason. Neither is it any maruayle, for as Plato sayd in his second booke:

De legibus. What soeuer we behold a farre of, we know it not thoroughly. For there cometh betwene our sight and it, a dissimile, and by farre distace of place, darknes shadoweth our sights. But when we come, and behold them more nighly, then we iudge of every thing aright. These things spake he, because voluptuous and corrupt men could not be perswaded, that a good and innocent life is pleasauntest. For they iudge of it farre otherwise: for that they are very much distant from it. But if they would drawe nere vnto it, and make a triall therof, they should then iudge vp rightly. So do we at this present pronounce of these men. For as much as they a farre of looke vpon the holie scriptures, neither do with any diligent heade taking, consider the Gospell and the lawe, thereof it cometh to passe, that they iudge so ill of them. The Apostle addeth of this righteousness, which he speaketh of, that it hath the testimonie of the law and of the Prophets. Which he therfore addeth, because that doctrine whiche he set forth, mought haue seemed new and strange. But in the Gospell, newnes is in any wise to be auoyded. Therfore he euery where testifieth of the Gospell, that it is of antiquity, and instituted by God, before all worldes. And in the beginning of this Epistle he wrote, that God promised it by his Prophets in the holie Scriptures. At this day also there is a strife betwene vs and the aduersaries, about doctrine, whilest they contend, that we bring in new things, but they abyde stil by the old doctrine. But now by the Apostle we learne, how this controuersy may be ended. That doctrine vndoubtedly is old and auncient, which hath his testimonie by the lawe and the prophets: that is, by the holie scriptures. And that is to be iudged new, wherof there is no mention made in them. They haue set by the Pisse, wherin one alone both communicate for others whiche are standers by. This hath no testimonie thorough al the scriptures. We affirme, that the supper of the Lord ought to be common vnto all the saythfull: which thing is most playnely declared by the institution therof, as it is set forth in the Gospels, and in Paul. They geue vnto the lay men the sacrament of the Eucharist mayned: which is, not only not in the scriptures, but also is playnly agaynst the scriptures. They defend the inuocations of the dead: for the confirmation wherof they haue nothing out of the holie scriptures. They compel the Clergie fro matrimony, they defend purgatory, they maintayne Images, they vse a strange tongue in their holie seruices, they obtrude the choise of meats, garments, shawings, unctions, and a thousand such like trumperies, as things necessary vnto the worshippinge of God: and that utterly without any testimonie of the scriptures. Let them learne of Paul, who endeavouring to teache righteousness to come by Christ, sayeth, that it hath testimonie of the law and of the prophets, and not that he made it of his owne head. But the doctrines of these men do aduance impietye. For they obtrude the sayned inuentions of men, as necessary worshippinges of God. And forasmuch as they haue no testimonie out of the scriptures, it must followe of necessity, that they are new. But the reason, why newnes ought to be auoyded in religion, is because the Lord commaunded in Deuteronomy, that from his commaundements and rytes they should nether take away any thing, nor adde therunto. Euen Plato also in his lawes and Pub. welth forbiddeth, that there should be any inuention in thinges pertayning vnto religion. In deed mens lawes may sometymes be changed, for that the forme of the Pub. welth is sometymes altered. Neyther do those lawes which serue for a kingdome, serue for that gouernemente, which is executed by the noble men, or a Pub. welth, that is ruled by the people. Farther the lawgeuers, forasmuch as they are men, can not se all things. And there happen daily many cases, for which they are sayne both to correct, and to change lawes. And eue as in actes through the continuance of tyme, some what is found wherby they are made more perfect, so lawes also, in successe of tyme, are oftentimes amended, and brought into a better forme. But none of al these cases taketh place in the lawes of God. For as touching the Church, it chaungech not his forme, it is alwaies one and the self same Pub. welth: and there is nothing hidden from the vnderstanding of God, which is the author of these lawes. He seeth all thinges, neyther is his knowledge increased by successe of tyme.

Wherefore it is not mete, that men should attempt to alter any thing in his lawes. But now let vs see, what testimonies there are of this righteousness in the lawe and the Prophets, which Paul asserteth. And although Christ sayd generally, that Moses wrote of him, and Luke declareth, that Christ being apparelled like a stranger, and talking by the way with the two Disciples, began at Moses, and then taught them by the prophets and psalmes: yet is there no certayne place brought forth, wherein is expessedly made mention of the Messias. And yet neuertheless, if we will speake peculiarly of Christ: we haue in Genesis, that the seed of the woman should treade vnder foote the head of the serpent. And to Abraham it was sayd: In thy seed shall all nations be blessed. And of the same Abraham it is written: He beleued God, and it was imputed vnto him for righteousness. Moreover Paul citeth, Say not in thine hart, who shall ascend vp into heauen, or who shall descend downe into hell? The woorde is nigh at hand, in thy mouth, and in thy harte. Paul also addeth: And this is the woord of fayth, which we preach, If thou beleue with thy hart, and confesse with thy mouth, Again: The Scepter shal not be taken away from the tribe of Iuda, neyther a captayne out of his loynes, tyll he be come, whiche shalbe sent: and he shalbe the expectation of the Gentles. Jeremy writeth of Christ: He shalbe called God our righteousness. And in the same prophet we reade, that God appoynted to geue a new Testament: not according to that which he made with the Fathers, but in describing his law in their harts & bowells. Abacuk saith: The iust shall liue by fayth. Esai saith: I am found of them, that sought me not. Also, God hath layed vpon hym all our iniquities. Dauid also: Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are couered. Blessed is the man, vnto whome the Lord hath not imputed sinne. An other kind of testimonies also is had out of the dedes of the old fathers, whiche were certayne forshewinges, that Christe should come to redeme mankinde. For as he is sayd to lyue in vs (for that we are his members) so also both was he, and liued he in the old fathers. Wherefore they were no les his members then are we. But how the head suffereth, and is recreated in his members, it is most apertly declared in Paul, whē it was sayd, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? And in the last iudgement, Christ will pronouce, that whatsoever hath bene geue vnto the least of his, was geuen vnto him: wherefore, so often as we reade, that the elders were overcome, brought into captiuitie, oppressed with calamities, we must vnderstand, that Christ in them suffered these self same things. And agayne whē we heare, that they got the victorie, & were restored and deliuered, let vs thinke that Christ also was in like sort affected in them. And in the one we haue a shew of his death begon, and in the other, a shadow and beginning of hys resurrection. And that this thing is so, we are taught by that whiche Christ sayd, that he should be in the hart of the earth thre dayes, and thre nights, lyke as was Iona the prophet. He likened himselfe also vnto the brasen serpente, which Moses set vp, vpon which whosoever looked they obteyned health, be inge otherwise in daunger to dye of the venemous stinging. And in Osee the prophet we reade: Out of Egypt haue I called my sonne. Which oracle the Hebrews contend to wreste vnto Pharaο, which was destroyed, and vnto the people of Israell deliuered from his tyrannie. Which thing if we should in the meane time graunt the, yet would I aske of them, of whence that nation had the preeminence, to be called by the name of the Children of God. That vndoubtedly coulde not be proued to come by any other meanes, then by Christ, which is the Sonne of God, being the first begotten amongst many brethren. By whom others also, as many as are nombred to be the children of God, haue aspired to suche a deuine adoption. Wherefore the Apostle sayth, that Christ was the first fruite, and pronounceth that he hath the principalitie ouer all thinges. Wherefore not without cause hath our Euangelist cited this place of the Prophet touching the Lord, forsomuch as he also was, by the admonishment of the Angell, called backe out of Egypt. Lastly the sacrifices, oblations, and ceremonies of the Elders, bare witnes of this kinde of righteousness. For in those beastes which were slayne, the death of Christ was manifested vnto the fayth of the Elders. For euen as the thing sacrificed, which otherwise had nothing offered, was slaine for y sin of an other, which escaped frae, so was thereby the iudg, that Christ should be slayne for vs, which were guiltie of death, that by the pacifieng of the heauenly Father, we might escape the punish- ments which we had deserued. Neither let any man say, that the sacraments of the Elders had not saluation ioyned with them. For, that thing will we also graunt, as touching the outward woork, which commonly is called the woork brought. But the sayth, which in those rites embraced Christ, brought saluation vnto the Elders: euen as at this day also the outward exercises of the sacraments, or commaundementes doo nothing profite: but onely sayth bringeth saluation, which seeth that vnder the infoldinges of sensible signes, are set forth vnto vs hea- uenly giftes. And if at any time the Apostle, vnto the Hebrews, or in anye other place, seeme to affirme otherwise, wee must thyncke that hee hath to doo a- gainste the Jewes, which seperated Christe and hys sayth, both from the lawe, and also from ceremonies. Which two things being seperated, he firmly and strongly concludeth, that they haue not saluation by such rites and sacrifices.

The righteousnes of God by the sayth of Iesus Christ.] Now is it meete to tell what sayth is: Sayth therefore is an assente, and that a firme assente to the wordes of God, obteyned not by reason, or by naturall demonstration, but by the authority of the speaker, and by the power of the holy Ghost. And this definition disagreeeth not from that, which Paule putteth in the xi. to the Hebrews. Hereby we may see, about what thinges faith is occupied, namely, about the wordes of God. And it is manifest, what is the chiefe principle & ground, vnto whiche all thinges pertayning to God are referred: and that is, The Lord hath sayd. But the authority of the speaker cannot be of force with vs so much as it ought, vn- lesse the perswasion of the holy Ghost be therunto adioyned. In Greeke it is called πίστις: which word is deriued of πίπισται: for we are not accustomed to beleue, but that which we are fully perswaded of. Basilus, as touching sayth, when he ex- poundeth this place of the Psalm, I haue beleued, and therefore haue I spoken, writ- teth, Do not contend to see those thinges which are layd vp a farre of, neither make those thinges doubtfull which are hoped for. In which wordes he sheweth, that two prin- cipal thinges are to be auoyded: The one is, that we be not with to much cu- riositie stirred vp to seeke out the prooffe of thinges, which we ought to beleue, which prooffe, so long as we lyue here, cannot be had: the other is, that though they be obscure, we shoulde not yet doubt of the truth of them. And the same writer, entreating of the confessio of sayth, thus writeth: *It is manifest a falling a- way from the sayth, and a poynt of pride, either to refuse anye of those thinges which are written, or to bring in anye thing, that is not written: forasmuche as our Lorde Iesus Christ sayd, My sheepe heare my voyce: and before that he sayde, but a straunger they will not follo w, but wyll flee from him, because they haue not knowen his voyce. The A- postle also hath, by an humaine example, straightly forbidden, either to adde, or to dimi- nishe any thing in the holy scriptures, when he sayth: And yet no man disanulleth the Testament of a man, when it is confirmed, neither addeth any thing thereunto. In which place a man may perceiue, how warely this man affirmeth, that as touching sayth, nothing ought either to be added, or diminished in the holy scriptures. Which maketh chiefly against those, which obtrude inuencions and traditi- ons of men, as necessary to be beleued. Farther, the same writer plainely set- teth forth the certaintie of sayth, when he declareth the proprietie thereof in Moralibus the. 80. Summe, and, 22. chapter. Where he writeth, *What is the pro- pertie of sayth? He answereth, An vnseperable certaintie of the truth of the wordes of God, which is not attayned to by any kinde of reasoning, nor any naturall necessitye, neyther, being framed to pietie, can euer be shaken. And he addeth, That it is the duty of one that beleueth, to be in such a certaintie affected, according to the power of the woord spoken, and not to presume, either to dissanull, or to adde any thing. For, if whatsoeuer is not of sayth, is sinne, as sayth the Apostle, and sayth commeth of hearing, and hearing by the word of God: then whatsoeuer is not of sayth, being not containd in the scripture, inspired by the spirite of God, the same is sinne. This Father confirmeth together with vs, the certaintie of sayth: and sheweth wherehence it dependeth, when he calleth he calleth it inſeuerable: for that when we beleue, we doo not examine by our owne reaſons, what is poſſible, or what is not poſſible to be done. And he ſemet to allude to thoſe wordes which Paul ſpeaketh of the ſayth of Abraham, that he doubted not through incredulitie, where he uſed this verbe διαπίστευται. Wherefore, certaintie, is contrarie to doubting, which commeth of the examination of humane reaſon. Moreover, that which in an other ſentence he had ſpoken, he againe playnly repeateth, namely, that thoſe things, which are out of the ſcriptures, are not to be beleued. And this place of Paul: What ſoever is not of ſayth, is ſinne, he uſeth in his native and proper ſenſe, as we alſo uſe it: which thing our aduerſaries can not abide. Faith differeth from opinion: for opinion, although it make vs leane vnto one part, yet it doth that, both wth reaſon, and alſo not without feare of the truth of the other partie. And ſuſpicion doth engender yet a weaker aſſent, then opinion doth: for that it both wanteth reaſon, and alſo leaueth men doubtfull of the truth of the other part. It is true in deede, that ſcience engendzeth a firme aſſent: but that is brought to paſſe by adding of demonstrations. Seeing now we ſee playnly, both what ſayth is, and alſo howe it differeth from opinion, ſcience, and ſuſpicion, let vs ſee, howe manye wayes ſayth is taken. For there is one kinde of ſayth which is mightie, perfect, and of efficacie, whereby we are iuſtified: there is an other which is voyde without fruite, during but for a time, & vayne, which bringeth not iuſtification. Which thing is manifeſt by the parable of the Goſpell, where the ſeede, the woorde of God (I ſay) is wiſtten, to fall ſometymes vpon good ground: and ſometimes vpon ſtony ground, vpon thornes, and by the high way ſide, where it is loſt, and bringeth forth no fruite. Agayne, that ſayth which is good and profitable, is not in all men alike: for according to the greater or leſſer infirmities of the fleſhe, it hath degrees. Wherefore Paul ſaith: Euen as God hath deuised vnto euery man the meaſure of ſayth. And in the ſelfe ſame parable, the ſeede falling on the good ground, bringeth forth fruite alke in all partes. For in ſome place it bringeth forth thirty fold, in other ſome place, ly. folde, and in other ſome an hundred fold. In ſumme, the intent of Paul in this place is, to make the righteouſnes of God (whereof he entreateth in this place) proper vnto ſayth, to the ende he myght utterly take it away as well from our merites, as from our woorkes. But I meruaile, that ſo much as this is his ſcope, howe the Greke Scholes affirme, that we are not ſo iuſtified, that vnto the obtaynment of righteouſnes, we bring nothing our ſelues. Faith (ſay they) is brought of vs: for that to beleue, it behooueth vs to haue a valiant mynde. And this ſelfe thinge ſignifieth Chriſoſtome. Theſe thinges muſt be vnderſtanded warily, neyther can they be admitted in that ſenſe, as though ſayth proceeded from vs: when as vnto the Ephesians it is playnly declared, that it is the giſt of God: neyther if it were of our ſelues could all boaiſting be excluded. For we ſhould bring much, if out of our ſelues ſhould come the power to beleue. And this place playnly teacheth, that it is not ſo to be vnderſtanded: for the Apoſtle addeth: Being iuſtified freely. But it ſhould not be freely, if ſayth, as it is our woork, ſhould bring righteouſnes. I graunt in deede, that our vnderſtanding and will, do aſſent vnto the promiſes of God. But that it doth, or maye do the ſame, it muſt of neceſſity come of God.

Vnto all and vpon all that beleue.] There are three thinges now put in this propoſition, which the Apoſtle entendeth playnly to declare. The firſt is this. That the righteouſnes of God is made manifeſt: the ſecond, that it is without the law: the third, that it is by ſayth. As touching the firſt he ſayth, that thys righteouſnes of God is declared vnto all, and vpon all. Which is not ſo to be vnderſtanded as generally ſpoken: when as in all men there nether is, nor appeareth any ſuch righteouſnes. But his wordes are contracted vnto thoſe which beleue, vnto the elect (I ſay) and ſanctified: Which thing the wordes of the Apoſtle ſufficiently declare. If this ſentence ſhould be vnderſtanded altogether vni-uerally, then this manifestation could not be referred but vnto the preaching, which is set forth vnto all men, hauing no respect either of persons or estates: for so Christ warned the Apostles to preach the Gospel to all creatures: and generally addeth whofoener beleueth and is baptised shalbe saved. But the first sense, is both true, and also moze perspicuous. He afterward addeth a reason, why this righteousness is made manifest vnto all, & vpon all that beleue. Because sayth he.

All haue sinned, and are destitute of the glory of God.] That forasmuch as they want righteousness of their owne, they might receaue it at the handes of God. There are none so holy, but that as sayth Ambrose, this place conuinceth them to be sinners: forasmuche as this righteousness geuen of God hath place in all, and vpon all. But this phrase is to be noted.

The glory of god som-
times signifieh, his dwelling in vs.

Are destitute of the glory of God.] By it, some thinke is to be vnderstāded, the dwelling of God in vs: because men were seperated from him, nether had they him ioyned vnto them by grace. And that the glory of God expreſſeth this manner of dwelling, hereby it is manifest, for that the Arke of the covenant is called the glory of God. Wherefore when it was taken by the Philistians, the glorye of God was sayd to be taken away. Others thinke that Paule, by the glorye of God vnderstandeth the perfect and true righteousness: which comming from God, is iudged glory, or that whereby we glorifye God. And forasmuch as glory is nothing els, but a prayse most abundantly published, Paule by a figuratiue kinde of speech calleth the most singular giftes of God, the glory of God for which giftes we both prayse and celebrate his name: so that the thing hath (by the figure Metonomia) the name of the propriety which followeth it. But in my iudgement it semeth, that Paule would declare by these wordes, that all men in theyr corrupt nature were reſected: and that he chiefly reſponeth rites, sacrifices and workes of the lawe, in which they thought the glory of God chiefly to consist. For he sheweth, that they in very deepe were destitute of the glory of God, although they were altogether full of their ceremonyes.

ry is.

And are iustified freely by his grace.] Here we haue what that meaneth, the righteousness of God to be made manifest without the lawe, namely, to be geuen freely. And Paule laboring to shew that in iustification is no consideration had of our workes, semeth to shew that he neuer satisfieth hymselfe. So many wordes heapeth he by which signifieth one, and the selfe same thing. For he saith what a hard thing it is to be beleued of vs, which will our selues do nothing freely, and by our owne measure do measure the righteousness of God, as though he also would not geue his righteousness freely. Out of this kinde of speech ought to be gathered this common sentence, that, by sayth only we are iustified. And although this word only be not found in the holy scriptures, yet is it necessarily inferred of those things, which we there reade: as Ambrose most playnly noteth in this place, writing vpon these wordes, saying: We do nothing, we recompence not, by sayth only are we iustified, which is the gift of God. He was not content to say that we are iustified by sayth only, but he addeth also other clauses whereby he might moze playnly declare the same. The selfe same thing writeth Basilus also in his booke De confessione fidei. We (sayth he) haue nothing whereof we may make our boast concerning righteousness, forasmuch as we are iustified only by sayth in Christ. Which wordes are not so to be vnderstanded, as though the sayth whereby we are iustified, were alone, that is not adozned with good & holy workes: but because our workes though they be neuer so holy, are not causes of the true righteousness. The like similitude is shewed in water, wherein moistnes and coldnes are ioyned together but to washe away blots and spots, properly belongeth to moistnes and not to coldnes. Wherefore this is a false argument ab accidente, whē as two things being ioyned together, that which belongeth to the one is ascribed vnto the other. But as touching this word δικαιοῦμενοι, that is, being iustified, being a participle of the nominatiue case, it is to be referred vnto that which was a little before spoken. For all haue sinned and are destitute rule of the glory of God: as though he should haue sayd, they which were such, are iustified freely.

By his grace, by the redemption, which is in Christ Iesus, whome God hath set forth a propitiator by fayth.] Here Paule expresseth those thinges, which by sayth we embrace, when we are iustified, and sheweth, that by sayth he vnderstandeth the objectes, which by it are apprehended. And when he sayth by grace, he sheweth, that he entreateth of a farre other maner of righteousness, then is that which is gotten by woorkes: and he most manifestly excludeth the conditions of the lawe. And when we heare, that we are iustified freely, and by grace, we must not thinke that the same is done rashely or by chance: soasmuch as it is tempered by the rule of the election of God. The causes and reasons whereof, although they be vnknown vnto vs, yet are they known vnto God. And seeing that in respect of hym the same is not done by chaunce, we ought not to as firme, that men are iustified by chance. And euē as chaunce is to be take away so also ought we to banishe necessitye, least we should seeme to admytte fate or destiny. For God is not compelled, to chuse this man, more then that man. But whatsoeuer he geneth, he geneth it freely and without compulsion.

We are not
rashely or by chaunce.

By the redemption.] Hereby appeareth, that we are manumitted by Christ and made his free men. For we were bond men cast into the prison of sinne, death, and the deuill. But Christ hath fully payd the price for vs: and that no small price, for he hath shed his owne blood for vs, and geuen his life. That is sayd to be redeemed, which before was both free, and also pertayned vnto vs. We were the peculiar people of God, and through our owne default we were sold vnder sinne. This phrase here of the Apostle manifestly declareth, how little we ought to ascribe vnto free will before we be, by the redemption of Christ set at liberty. And soasmuch as so great a price is payd for our saluation, we ought not to suffer, so great a benefite lightly to slippe out of our memory. For the anoyding whereof, we are holpen not only by doctrine and the scriptures, but also by sacramentes. For euē as among the elders, the often sacrifices shadowed Christ to come: so now the often vse of the misteries, bringeth to memory his death and blood shed for vs. And by this price of redemption may we perceane the greuousnes of sinne: soasmuch as the waight thereof was so great that it kindled agaynst vs the iust wrath of God, and such a wrath as was not rashely conceaued: which wrath being an appetite or desire of vengeance, by a most iust consideration, required a most excellent sacrifice, vpon which might be transferred all our sinnes. And soasmuch as the same wrath is by no other thing asswaged, but by the blood and death of Christ, they are to be couēted most greuous blasphemers, which dare attribute the same either to our woorkes, or to outward rites.

By the vse of the sacraments we are put in minde
of the benefite receaued.

The
waight of sinne is to

by the price of our redemption.

VVhorne God hath set forth a propitiator.] In that Christ is sayd to be set forth vnto vs by God, thereby is shewed, that the doctrine of the Gospel is no new thing, nor inuented by men. But in what sort Christ is set forth vnto vs, is declared by two principall pointes. First, because God by reuelation setteth forth vnto vs thinges to be beleued, vnto the knowledge whereof, by the light of nature we could neuer attayne. Secondly in that he causeth vs to haue a pleasure in thinges shewed vnto vs, and to geue our assent vnto them, and moueth and stirreth by our mynd, inspiring vs with sayth. This may also be referred vnto the good pleasure, and blessed predestination of God, wherehence dependeth the merite of the death of Christ. Otherwise God mought by any other thing haue redeemed vs, and deliuered vs from sinnes. Wherefore we must count that by his determination and purpose only, haue we receaued that he would vouchsafe to accept the death of Iesus Christ his sonne, and by it reconcile vnto him the sayntes. Of this purpose and good pleasure, is mencion made vnto the Ephes. in the first chapter. Where it is thus writte. times, that he might set vp all thinges perfectly by Christ (both the thinges which are in heauen, and the thinges which are in earth) in whome euen we also are by lot called, being predestinate according to his purpose, which worketh all thinges according to the counsell of his wil, that we (which before hoped in Christ) should be to the prayse of his glory, in whom also we hope, forasmuch as we haue hard the word of truth, and the Gospell of your salvation. &c. And in an other place oftentimes, and in this selfe same epistle is mencion made of the purpose of God. Although this reason of the will and counsell of God is not to be contēned, yet as I thinke this reason may be assigned, that by him it was mete the world should be restored to his olde estate, by whome all thinges were created. This word ἰλασμός, which is here put, may signifye these three thinges, a propitiator, propitiation, and propitiatorye. I rather allow the latter signification, because Paul seemeth to allude vnto the oracle of the olde Testament, and couering of the arke, which is there called the propitiatorye, or mercy seate. For vpon the arke of the couenaunt, there was layd a board or table for the oracle of the arke, at whose endes stood two Cherubims: but the middle place was empty out of which were answeres geuen vnto them that asked, and God was made fauorable vnto the people, and was sayd to dwell there. It is playne and manifest, and not to be doubted, but that all these thinges may aptly be referred vnto Christ, as in whom dwelleth the whole fulnes of the godhead corporally (as Paul sayth vnto Colossians) and therefore are most certayne oracles geuen of the will of God, as touching our salvation. And that by hym God is pacified and reconciled vnto vs, there is no doubt: we may also interprete it, a propitiator, as though that word were put in the masculine gender, that euen as we call Christ, σοτήριον, that is a saviour, so we may call him ἰλαστήριον, that is, a pacifier. Neyther parauenture is this farre from the true and proper sence, if we vnderstand Christ to be our pacification. For Iohn in his epistle the 2. chapter calleth Christ ἰλασμός, that is, our pacification, where he thus writeth, My little children, these thynges I write vnto you, that ye sinne not. But and if any man sinne, we haue an aduocate with the father, Iesus Christ the iust, and he is the propitiatio for our sinnes: and not for our sinnes only, but also for the sinnes of the whole world. But as I haue sayd the first exposition please me best, and that for this cause chiefly, because a little after ward is sayd,

By his blood.] For the maner of the high priest of the Hebrewes was, once every yeare to sprinkle the propitiatorye or mercy seate, with blood, when he entered into the place which was called Sancta sanctorū, that is, the holy of holpes. Neyther is it without a cause that the Apostle here straight way adoeeth, By faith: forasmuch as our aduersaries also do graunt y by Christ cometh righteousness vnto vs, but they will not once declare, by what meanes we apply the same vnto vs, and make it ours: which thing Paul now plainly expresseth. They seme alwaies to tende this way, that Christ therfore hath redeemed vs, because he is to be counted the chiefe and hed of our merites: as though (as their common phrase of speache is) Christ deserued for vs onely the first grace, and after ward leaueth vs wholye to our selues. But this is to muche niggardly and maliciously to vse the benefite of God. Wherefore seing now we vnderstand hym, we wil continually oppose vnto the iustice of God, the death of Christ, as a full satisfaction of our sinnes.

To declare his righteousness.] Hitherto we haue spoken of the efficient cause of iustification, which is, God, and his mercy. But those which are iustified, & pertaine to the materiall cause, are men of all sortes being guilty of sinnes, and destitute of the grace of God. The instrumentes also haue bene declared. The one instrument is as touching God, and the same is Christ, whome the goodnes of God hath vled for a sacrifice: the other instrument as touching vs, is faith, whereby we take hold of the mercy of God, and of his promises. Now speaketh he of the ende. God would to no other end in such sort iustifie vs, but to declare his righteousness: which cometh not to passe, but by communicating it with others. For the doth a man declare his riches, when he enricheth others: then declareth a man his knowledge, ledge, when he entrudeth others: then also the weth he his strength, when he strigjustifying of us, because he rendreth according to his promises which he hath made. But there is no final emphasis in this, that vnto righteousness he addeth this word, His, to declare that there is utterly no righteousness of ours. Chrysostom vpon this place saith: Be not afearde, for this righteousness consisteth not of workes, but of fayth, and he addeth, that in it are two excellent commodities: First, for that it is easy: secondly, because God by it declareth his owne proper righteousness.

Ambrose, not to read, remission, but, purpose. And in his interpretation he saith: because God purposed to deliuer not onely those which dwell in heauen, but also those which were in hell. Which thinges seme not to serue for this place. Erasmus supposeth y<sup>e</sup> he red not ἀποδοῖν, which signifieth, remission, but ἀποδοῖν, which signifieth purpose, & this reading also doth Augustine follow in his booke de spiritu & litera, y<sup>e</sup> rig. cha. But it is best, we rede, as the comō readynge hath it. For so is expessed vnto vs, in what thyng chiefly consisteth iustification, namely, in the remission of sinnes. Whiche thyng Dauid setteth forth expessedly when he saith: Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven. It cometh in deede by the benefite of the holy ghost, that besides the forgettenes of sinnes, followeth an insaturation or renewing of the whole mā.
But in the first principall pointe consisteth the summe of iustification, namelye, the forgivenenes of sinnes. This particle which is added,

Of the sinnes passed. ] accordyng to the opinion of some is put, to take away licentiousnes of synnyng, that men should not thinke, that after they haue obtained righteousnes at Gods hand, they should then liue losely. But it is to be thought rather, that the Apostle would hereby shew the infirmity of the lawe, and of philosophy, & of humayne strengthes, as thinges which were not able to put away sinne.
Sinne vndoubtedly continueth and abideth, butill righteousness be by faith communicated vnto vs. And that it did still abide, we shall afterwarde heare of Paule, when a little after he sayth: that sinne reigned from Adam euen vnto Moses: and that he therby proueth, for that death did spread abroad into all mē. And yet cannot by this place be proued, that men after iustification can not fall, which falles through fayth, must be forgiven by iustification agayne obtained. Wherefore the Prouatis did hereof vnaptly gather, that after baptisme, forgivenenes of sinnes should not be given vnto them that fell. Althoughe they beyng compelled by the force of arguments confessed, that God in dede can geue remission of wicked actes after bap-tisme: but to vs in the church, it is not lawfull to exercise or to promise any suche forgivenenes. But they very ill weighed what was said to Peter, that he should forgeue his penitent brother, not onely seuen tymes, but also seuentye tymes seuen tymes. Paules meanyng in this place is to declare the state of man, before he attaineth vnto iustification, namely, that he is altogether in sinne. Iustification em-braceth vs when we are in that state, that we bring nothing vnto God from our owne selues, but onely sins to be forgiven. Which vndoubtedly, whe they are forgeuen, it followeth of necessity that they went before. Wherefore by this place are rather cōfuted workes (as they call the) of preparatiō, the that it maketh any thyng on Prouatis side. And without doubt theyr opinion is utterly to be reiected, which thinke, that the first iustification in dede continueth vnto vs freely, and y<sup>e</sup> we should be by baptisme regenerated, are not required good workes to go before. But if we chance after ward (say they) to sin, then is it necessary, that we make satisfaction.
As though Christ were not the self same mediator at one tyme, y<sup>e</sup> he is at an other tyme. Iohn most manifestly cōfuteth those mē, saying, Little children, these thinges I write vnto you, that ye sinne not: but if we sinne, we haue an aduocate wyth the father, Jesus Christ, whom he calleth παράκλητος, that is, our propitiation. By which wordes we gather y<sup>e</sup> after baptisme also, if we chance to fal, Christ is our iustification, and not our workes. Neither is it conuenient to thinke, that the estate of them, whiche by greuous falles haue turned away from Christ, is better then theyrs, which are not as yet cōuerted vnto him, so that though before they could not iustifie themselves, they are afterward able to do it. Wherefore we must needs thinke, that by repentaunce is againe obtained the selfe maner of iustification, y<sup>e</sup> was before in baptism, or to speake more bp<sup>r</sup>ightly, wh<sup>e</sup> we were first regenerate by faith. Wherefore, I can not inough wonder, what came in their heads of Cullen, those moste great defenders of abuses, in that their booke called Antididagma, where they goe about to put a difference betwene that repentaunce which we preach vnto infidels, and y<sup>e</sup> repentaunce which is to be done of Christians that haue falle into greuous crimes.

They graunt, y<sup>e</sup> as touching infidels, we should by y<sup>e</sup> law of Moses, bp<sup>r</sup>haide vnto th<sup>e</sup> those wicked factes, which they haue committed: and then set forth Christ vnto them, as a remedy and medicine of so great euils. But they affirme, that vnto those which being Christians haue contaminated themselues with sinnes, are to be inculcated the giftes and benefites, from which they haue fallen: and to be set forth vnto them the exercises of the spirite, by which they may be agayne holpen.
And for this their sentence they cite certaine places of the Scripture. First, that which is written in the Apoc. Remember from whence thou hast falle, and do the first workes. Otherwise I come vnto thee. And vnto the Galathians, Paule saith: O ye foolish Galathians, who hath bewitched you, that ye should not obey the truth, to whome Iesus Christ was before described, and before your eyes crucified. Farther to the Hebrewes we reade, And if any man shall make voyd the law of Moses, he is vnder the witnes of two or thre without any mercy slain. How much more greuous punishment abide those which haue troden vnder foot the blood of the sonne of God. Lastly, they bring a place out of y<sup>e</sup> latter Epistle to the Corint. the 7. chapter, Where Paule seemeth to haue made mention of satisfaction to be made after crimes committed. They thinke also that Ambrose maketh on the y<sup>e</sup> side, when he interpreteth these wordes oute of the 11. chap. to the Romanes, The giftes of God are without repentaunce. Because (sayth he) grace in baptism seeketh not sighinge or mourning or any worke, but onely profession from the hart. And a little afterwarde he sayth, that in the first entraunce of sayth is not required repentaunce, for the gift of God freely forgaueth sins in baptism.
And they saine, that they speake these things, that we should not geue our selues to slouthfulnes or sluggishnes, and least some should imagine an idle iustificatio and a repentaunce without fruite. Repentance (say they) which is added after baptisme, is of that kinde, that it hath ioyned with it most seruent prayers, and mourning, and sighing, and almes geuing to our neyghbours, and spiritual exercises, by which maye be washed away sinnes committed. But whatsoener those men say, there is but one manner of true repentaunce, which is, that we shoulde from the hart be sorry for the sinnes which we haue committed, which haue alienated God fro vs. Vnto which sorrow is added, a desire of forgiveness, and thereunto also are adioyned prayers to attayne the same, with a full purpose not to runne any more into the like sinnes, and wyth a wyll to mortify the old man, and to put on the new man. And all these thinges oughte to leane vnto faith, for without it they cannot consist. And in a christian man is perpetuallye this kinde of repentance, so long as he liueth here: although we graunte, that it is greater, when we haue committed greuouser sinnes: which thinge then vndoubtedly cometh to passe, when after grace once receaued we fall againe. But as the common sayinge is, more and lesse chaunge not the nature and kinde of thinges. But whereas these men sayne, that in baptism is not required repentance, and especiallye when they say that are of full age are baptised, it is both wayne, and also manifestlye repugnaunte vnto the holpe scriptures. For in the Actes of the Apostles, when the people had heard the sermon of Peter, they were smitten in the hart, and sayd, Ye men & brethern, what ought we to do? Vnto whom Peter answered, that they shoulde repent them. And when the Jewes were baptised of Iohn, they were smitten with such a sorrow of repentance, that of the y<sup>e</sup> owne accord also they confessed the y<sup>e</sup> sinnes. Which selfe thinge the Ephesians also did, when they brought forth their wicked bookes to be burnt. And as touching Ambrose, vnles he be vnderstanded of Ecclesiasticall satisfactions, for that

the church requireth not them for sinnes before baptism, that which he wisteth, is not true. For in very deed it is not possible, that a man should from the hart be converted vnto God, and come vnto Christ, to be washed in baptism, but that he must earnestly repent him of his former life. Neither can I see, why it is not convenient to vse the ministry of the law, to preach it vnto those which haue falle away fro Christ, as well as vnto those, which are not as yet converted. For it is certayne that Christ entreated with the Apostles touching the lawe in the 5 and 6. chapters of Mathew, when yet notwithstanding they had now both belened in him, and also followed him. Paule also in this self same epistle, which he wrote vnto the faithfull, in the 7. chap. bleseth a testimony of the law to the declaration of concupiscence. And in the first to Timothy, he pronounceth the law to be good, so that a man lawfully vse it. Neither do those places of the Apocalipse, & vnto the hebrewes, and vnto the Galathians teach any other thinge. For the bypbrayding of benefites receaued, forasmuch as it reprobeth men of ingratitude, layeth before them the transgression of the law. For to sinne is nothinge els, but to violate the commaundementes of God, which are contained in the law. Neither is there anye mention made of satisfaction in the latter Epistle to the Corinthians, as these men sayne there is. For, that word which Paule there useth, is in Greeke, ἀπολογία. Neither mente the Apostle in that place any thinge els, then to declare, that he was very glad that his first letters had brought forth in the Corinthians a study, καὶ ἀπολογία, that is, an indignatio. For that they had excommunicated the incestuous person, whom Paule had noted vnto them, and had declared that they were not a little sorry for that, which Paule had reproved in them. So bitterlye far of is it, that that place commendeth vnto vs Ecclesiasticall satisfactions: of which yet there is no suche cause why these men should so much boast of, when as in theyr churches they now are utterly cleane out of vse: neither now haue they any other satisfactions, then those which they enioyne men after auricular confession, and which no manne can fully performe, vnles he be already before absolved of the priest, which is utterly contrarie to the vse of the elders. And if at any time we reade, that the fathers attributed remission of sins or righteousness vnto almes geuing or vnto other good works, eyther they are utterly not to be harkened vnto, or els they are to be vnderstanded to speake of woorkes, as they are effectes of sayth. They may also by the name of sinne sometimes vnderstand the paines and punishmentes which are due vnto sinnes: which punishmentes oftentimes are either mitigated or take away, if woorthy frutes follow repentance.

Thorough the patience of God.] By these wordes is signified, that God remitteth those sinnes, which he hath long time before borne with: when as otherwise men as touching themselves, deserue to be punished, euen straightway so soone as they haue sinned. But God is mercifull, and slow to anger: which thing he declared when he sent the floude, when he destroyed Sodom, and ouerthrew the publike wealth of the Iewes. And we finde him also to be euen suche a one towarde every one of vs particularly. For he wayteth long that we should repent vs. Which thing if we do not, we heape vnto our selues wrath in the day of wrath, & of the reuelation of the iust iudgement of God. And by this patience of God, we knowe that that is true, which Ezechiel sayth, that God will not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should be converted and liue. Neither here ought we to haue a respect vnto the secret will of God which vnto vs is vnkowne & obscure. For we oughte to iudge of it as by the holpe scriptures and by daylye experience it is set forth vnto vs, and may be known. For he suffereth long, and by scriptures, sermons, scourges, and finally by all manner of meanes and wayes calleth backe sinners vnto him.

At this present time.] Chrysostome interpreteth this of the coming of Christ in the flesh. For that then was he most chiefly geuen, & the patience of God was declared to be so muche the greater, for that then all manner of vices were rise: and Before baptism were not required ecclesiastical satisfactions.

A place in the latter epistle to the Corin.

The true ecclesiastical satisfactions are banished out of the Church of the Papists. How the fathers assigned remission of sinnes to good woorkes. God beareth with sinners.

and when men seemed to haue deserved to be moste gréuously punished, even then did the mercye of God most chieslye shine vpon them. And it seemeth that Paule, euery where wonderfully extolleth this time, wherein God so singularly declared his beneuolence toward men, that he gaue his onely begotten sonne for our saluation. And that time wherein God came vnto vs, he calleth the fulnes of times.

That he might be iuste and a iustifier of him, vyhiche is of the sayth of Iesus Christ. Here is touched the reason why God appoynted after this manner to forgive sinnes: namelpe, that his righteousness mighte, the more appere, we be to say, that in a manne there is a notable qualite, when as out of the same fountayne others are partakers thereof. But there is an Emphasis or strength in this forme of speaking, That he might be iust. Wherby we vnderstand that he is of himselfe iust, neither ought we to presume to chalenge the same to our selues. And he addeth, Of the sayth of Iesus Christ, because by that meanes the righteousness of God doth better appeare, then if we shoulde clayme it vnto our selues by workes.

Where is then thy glorying? It is excluded. By what lawe? By the lawe of workes? No, but by the lawe of sayth. Therefore we conclude that a man is iustified by sayth, without the workes of the lawe. God, is he the God of the Jewes only, and not of the Gentiles also? Yes euen of the Gentiles also. For it is one God who shall iustifie circumcision by faith, & vncircumcision through sayth. Do we then make the lawe of none effect? God forbid, yea rather we establishe the lawe.

sis.

V Wherefore thy glorying is excluded. By what lawe? By the lawe of workes? No, but by the lawe of sayth. After that he had declared his proposition, now as it were by a conclusion he giveth a definitiue sentence of that, which he put forth at the beginning of the chapter, when he sayd, What is then the preferment of the lawe? or what is the profite of circumcision? In this place he maketh answer, that as touching iustification the Jewes had nothing aboue others, wherof they might glory, for that by those thinges which haue bene now spoken, their glorying is excluded. In the Greke booke is not reade this woord, thy. And Ambrose thinketh that these thinges are spoken against the Jewes. For against the peculiarly contended he now. So farre is it of, that the lawe of workes excludeth glorying, that rather it ministereth matter to glory of. And by this woorde lawe, the Apostle vnderstandeth doctrine, for it hath the power to moderate and gouerne our strengthes and willes to the executing of any thing, as touching knowledge & doctrine or instruction. And in other places he applieth this woorde lawe to diuers thinges, as, The lawe of the spirit, The lawe of the fleshe, the lawe of the members, the lawe of the minde, and such other like. The lawe of workes is, that which decreeth that righteousness oughte to be gotten by workes. But the lawe of sayth teacheth, that it is to be hoped for of the mercy of God. And Christosom sayth, that the lawe of sayth is, that by grace we are saued: and he thinketh, that the Apostle bleth the name of the lawe, to the ende he would the lesse offend the Jewes, which much delighted in that woorde. For by that meanes he seemed to attribute some honour vnto the lawe, which had not ill deserved of men. Glorying, according to the definition thereof, is a boasting of some good thing. And how repugnant these two lawes are one to the other, we are manifestly taught in the Gospel, where the Pharisey speaketh thus to God: I gene thanks vnto thee, that I am not as other men: I fast twise in the weeke. &c. Here he maketh mention of workes only: ouerhipping the grace of God, as much as lay in him. But the other, namely the Publicane, prayd with sayth, God be mercifull vnto me a sinner. In which wordes he maketh no mention at all of workes. And seeing that God will haue all glorying excluded, it is manifest, how they erre, which

defend merites. For where they haue place, there wanteth not glozping. They which glozpe, thinke that both saluation, and righteousness, and eternall life are deu unto them. But he which leueth vnto the lawe of sayth, ought not in any wyse to perswade himselfe of any such thing. Although we mought make such a distinction, that debt may sometymes be taken as it is referred vnto our labours, and so it hath a respect vnto reward, as the Apostle will playnly afterward declare when he sayth, that vnto hym which worketh, a reward is imputed, not according to grace, but according to debt: and debt may be taken an other way, as it hath a respect vnto a promise: when a thing is deu unto a man, not that he hath deserved it, but because by our promise we haue bound our selues to geue it vnto hym. Of which thing we haue an example in those giftes, which are confirmed by contractes and hand writings. And agaynst this kinde of debt, the lawe of sayth is not. But of it springeth no glozping: but our aduersaries doo not vndoubtedly exclude glozping, when they say, that vnto the repentaunte is granted remission of sinnes, so that the repentaunte be vnto, and (as they call it) sufficient. In this their saying they of purpose resiste the will of God: which vnto tendeth to this, that all glozping should be excluded from vs. Pea Chrysostome affirmeth, that Christ for no other cause so long tyme deferred his coming in the flesh, but to kepe downe mans proude Perocks tayle. For if he had come straight way at the beginning vnto vs, men would easely haue sayd, that they had not then so great neede of hym, that without him they could not be saued: wherefore he would, that mankinde should so long tyme be oppressed with the seruitude of sinnes, and burthen of the lawe, till they should vnderstand, that they had vnto neede of a redeemer. But why God so much laboreth, to destroy our glozpe, the holy scriptures abundantly mough declare: namely, that his glozpe might the more brightly shine forth. Wherefore it is manifest, that whatsoener glozpe we claime vnto our selues, all that do we robbe from the glory of God. Neyther nedeth it any greates exposition, what Paul meaneth by the lawe of workes. For by that word he vnderstandeth as well the lawe of nature, as the lawe of Moses, and also mans lawe. For that all these lawes do engender glozpe, if a man can haunt that he can fulfill them.

We conclude therefore that man is iustified by faith without the vwookes of the lawe. Those thinges which he before sayd, he confirmeth with a brieue conclusion: which by a reason thereunto annexed he will afterward proue. And where as he sayth Arbitramur, that is, we thinke, in Greeke it is λογίζομεθα, which signifieth not to thinke or to suppose, but in this place it is to conclude, to inferre, and certainly to demonstrate, namely, of those thinges which before were spoken. In which signification it is taken in the 6. chapter: when the Apostle sayth, So thinke ye also, that ye are dead vnto sinne, but are aluie to God in Iesus Christ our Lord. Where this word, thinke ye, is λογίζομαι, and that which is thereby signified is, to haue for certayne. And as touching this thing, Ambrose is of our mind, and he vnderstandeth these words, man is iustified without workes, of the Gentiles. But Chrysostome contrarywise thinketh, that by this word, man, is meant nature, to make the sentence of the Apostle more ample and large: whose iudgement I mislike not, for it agreeth as well with the Iewes, as with the Gentiles, not to attayne vnto sound righteousness by workes, but by faith. Further seeing the Apostle so expessedly sayth, that man is iustified without the workes of the lawe, hereof is inferred that which we before also taught, namely, that it is faith only which iustifieth: which thing not only Origene, vpon this place, but also Chrysostome acknowledgeth, who sayth, that faith only is required to obtayne this righteousness. But I heare our aduersaries say, that when we reade in the fathers, That faith only iustifieth, that word, only, is to be vnderstanded principally, for that it hath in iustification the chiefest partes. And they bringe a place or two, where this word only so signifieth. But vndoubtedly it a man weigh Pauls words well, they will not agree with this interpretation. For Debt may be taken two manner of wayes.

Why the sonne of god deferred his coming so long.

Ezra.

he putteth righteousnes without y<sup>e</sup> woꝝkes of the law: which is not true, if woꝝkes do so follow sayth, that with it they bring forth iustification in the elect of God.

The aduersaries cry out, that if we teach me after this sorte, we then open a win dow vnto singgishnes and slouthfulnes. Vnto which their coloured pretices, some of our men haue sometimes simply and without guile consented: who when they say, that true faith which iustifieth, hath alwayes ioyned with it good woꝝkes, ab steyned in their sermons from that woꝝde Onely. But afterward, when they vnder stood the fraude of the aduersaries, which obtruded this deuise, to the ende they might at the length teach the people according to their owne sayned inventions, that men are not onely by faith, but also by woꝝkes iustified, they returned vnto their olde forme of speaking, that the people should not be any moze deceiued. And sayng Paule, most warely alwayes eschued daunders and offences of the hearers, so much as he might by the truth of the scriptures, and we see, that he most mani festly teacheth those things, wherof most plainly followeth, That sayth onely ius tifieth, we ought not to be asfeard of such daungers, which may easily be amoyed, if we aptly adde an vpright interpretation of that which we speake. They againe obiect vnto vs, that woꝝkes of the law in this place signifie ceremonies. Vnto who we aunswer, as we haue before already said, that the question in dede began about ceremonies: but Paule dissolneth it vniuersally, and answereth in suche sorte, that he concludeth of all kinde of woꝝkes. Wherfore the reason which he bringeth in, in the first place, That God is the God not onely of the Iewes, but also of the Gentiles, hath a respecte vnto ceremonies. For the Ethnikes had not receiued the ceremonies of the Iewes. But afterward when he addeth, that by faith the lawe is not abolished, but rather established, he declareth that his exposition is chiefly to be vnderstanded touchyng mozell woꝝkes, which faith abolisheth not, but rather confirmeth. Which thing we cannot affirme of ceremonies, which we see are by Christ, and his sayth taken away. Farther, in that he before sayd, that all men haue sinned, and were desti tute of the glory of God, and by that meanes euery mouth is stopped, and the whole world made guilty vnto God, it sufficiently declareth, of what law he speaketh. And so doth that also where he sayth, that the law sheweth sinne, and that also which he citeth out of Dauid. No living creature shall be iustified in thy sight: and many other thynges which afterward in their places we shall see, do sufficiently shew, that the woꝝdes of the Apostle comprehend also mozell preceptes. Wherfore woꝝkes are excluded, but they are excluded as from the cause of iustification: but not as from the effect.

And Christe to declare this to be true, in Luke sayde, When ye haue done all these thynges, say ye, we are unprofitable seruautes, vnto whom neither is this in dede due, to haue thanks geuen vnto vs. But if by woꝝkes, we should attayne vnto iustificati on, then should we not be vnprofitable in doyng well, and vnto vs should be farre greater things due, then geuing of thanks.

God, is he the God of the Iewes onely? and not of the Gentles also? Yes, euen of the Gentles also. ] He proueth now his proposition: namely, that men are iustified without the woꝝkes of the law. For if righteousness should depende of them, God mought seme to haue bene the God onely of the Iewes, and to haue left the Gentles without hope of saluation, as though he were not their God. This reason leadeth to absurditie, as though God were a taker of partes, which thing is by no meanes to be attributed vnto him: as the Ethnikes ascribed vnto their idols, when they sayned y<sup>e</sup> some toke part with the Trojans, & some with the Grecians, so that they fought also one against an other, and lamented when things went not with the as they desired. But with the true God, is no such acceptio of persons. It is true in dede, that some singular graces were geuen vnto the Iewes, but yet not in such sorte, that other nations were forsaken. Vnto be it Aben Esdra durst take vpon him to define, that Gods providence reacheth not vnto euery singular ma, but one ly as touching the Israelites, vnto the other he saith he looked onely generally, but had ouer the Iewes a peculiar care, as touching euery particular thing by them done. But Paule here testifieth, that God is the God as well of the Gentles, as of the Jewes. And soasmuch as God is (as it is most certayn) the chiefeſt good thing, he communicateth himſelfe vnto others, after the beſt manner that may be, whiche is moſt chieſly done, in iuſtifying them. Wherefore David ſayd: Bleſſed is the nation whoſe God is the Lord. But what bleſſednes can there be, wythout the gyft of iuſtification? And vndoubtedly, God delinereth from all euill, thoſe whoſe God he is. Wherefore he ſuffreth them not, either to be oppreſſed wyth ſin perpetually, or to be obnoxious vnto eternall puniſhmentes. By this meanes Chriſt concludeth the reſurrection of the dead, ſo that in the ſcriptures is written. I am the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Iacob. For if he were their God, then is it neceſſary that he at the length deliuer them from euill, and from the payne of death: which thyng by reſurrection he will performe vnto them, when he ſhall redeeme them from death. And it is manifeſt, that that ought to be graunted vnto all men, whereby all men are iuſtified. And ſoasmuch as this commeth to paſſe by the benefite of God, thereby is concluded that God is the God of all thoſe, vnto whome he geueth his righteouſnes, from which number the Gentles can not be excluded, when as in the time of the Apoſtles, they both came vnto Chriſt, and alſo moſt manifeſtly receiued the holy ghoſt, as did other which beleued in Chriſt and were of the Jewes. And ſo as much as God hath created all manner of thinges vniuerſally, and by his prouidence gouerneth all thinges, and formed the firſt one man, from whome is ſpred abroad all our whole kinde, ſhall not he be thought to be the God of al men? Which thing alſo is hereby proued, ſo that in the holy ſcripture it is written, That euery one that calleth vpon the name of the Lord ſhall be ſaued. And againe it is ſayd, They which beleue and are baptiſed, ſhall be ſaued. And vnto this tendeth that which is ſayde of the prophet, All fleſh ſhall ſee the ſauyng health of God, where by theſe we vnderſtande man. And this thyng alſo do all thoſe oracles teſtifie, in whiche is intreated of the calling of the Gentles: as is that which was ſaid vnto Abraham: In thy ſede ſhall all nations be bleſſed. And Iacob affirmed, that the ſcepter ſhould not be taken away from Juda, vntill he came which ſhould be ſent: and he (ſayth he) ſhall be the expectatio of the Gentles. In Eſay alſo we reade of the roote or ſeede of Jesse, that in him the Gentles ſhould hope. And it were an infinite labour to rehearſe all the places, which ſerue to this purpoſe. The Hebrewes boaste, that the lawe was geuen for them. But yet, that as touchyng this parte the Gentles were not neglected, hereby is teſtified, in that there moughte come vnto the publike wealthe of the Jewes and vnto theyr lawes as manye Proſelites as woulde. And when the Israelites were called ouſe of Egypte, there followed them no ſmall multitude of the Egyptians, vpon whome God in the deſerte beſtowed the ſelfe ſame benefites and giſtes, that he gaue vnto the Jewes. And he made a promiſe in his lawes, that ſtraungers alſo ſhoulde be admitted to the eatinge of the paſchall Lamb, ſo that they woulde be circumciſed. By all whiche thinges it is manifeſt that the Gentles were not neglected of God: even as touchyng the benefite of the lawe. Farther we knowe, that Melchizedek, who hath a ſingular prayſe in the lawe, was commended as juſt, and the prieſt of the moſte hygh God. Alſo Iethro, & father in law of Moses, & Iobe, being Gentles are notably comended in the holy ſcriptures. It is certayne alſo, that Queene Saba is commended, becauſe ſhe came to heare the wiſedome of Salomon. Perther were the Ninuites admitted, who when they had repented, were ſaued. By theſe thinges it is manifeſt, that beſore the comming of Chriſt amongſt the Gentles, were ſome, which had the true God, and worſhipped him for God. Further after Chriſt was now come, there is none but playnely ſeech, how it was declared, that God had a care ouer the Gentles. He diſdained not the woman of Samaria, nor the woman of Chanaan, which were Gentiles: and Cornelius the Centurion, beſore he had receaued baptiſme, was accepted of God: and when he had beleened, he receaued the holy ghoſt in a viſible ſorme, beſore he was baptiſed. Perther came Peter vnto him without an aſſured oracle of God, when as vnto him was ſhewed a beſell let downe from heaue, wherein were conſayned both ſerpents,

and all kind of uncleane beastes: of which it was sayd vnto hym, that he should kyll & eate. This also last of all is confirmed by the history of the Eunuch, which longed vnto Candaces Queene of the Ethiopians, who was by a singular miracle instructed of Philip, & baptised. This thing wonderfully pricked the Iewes, that they sawe the Ethiopes admitted vnto grace without the lawe. But they ought to haue remembred, as sayth Tertullian in his booke agaynst the Iewes, that whereas they so much boasted of the lawe, the lawe was not first geuen vnto them. For before them, Adam first receaued it in paradise: and in that which was geuen vnto hym, was contayned, whatsoever was afterward by Moses commaunded in the mozaill preceptes, especially as touching the principall poyntes. For if Adam had loued God with all hys hart, how could he haue transgressed his commaundement? And if he had beleued him, when he threatened death vnto him, he would not haue bene so vnadvised, to committe that which was the cause of death. And he also, if he had loued his neighbour, as he was bounde to do, would not by his transgression haue throwen all his whole posterity into death. And if he would haue delt iustly, he would in no case haue taken away an other mans fruite, which pertayned vnto him. These thinges hath Tertullian excellently well noted, of the lawe geuen in paradise vnto the first man and woman. And he also affirmeth, that after this lawe succeeded that lawe, which is called the lawe of nature. I will not speake, that Noe receaued some preceptes, which were common vnto all mankind. And if God would afterward by Moses more plainly expresse the lawes, which he had before geuen, there is no cause, why the Iewes should contemne the Gentiles, as though they were left without the lawe. For it is most manifest that whē Christ came, he did set forth a most perfect explication of the doctrine, which was then set a broode amongst all men, & of all lawes: whereby plainly appeareth, how folowly the Iewes are deceaued which are so raniſhed with the loue of theyr owne Roche, that they will rather haue God to want of his glozy, than he should not be the God of all mē, nor his prouidence reach vnto all mē, then they will confesse, that they alone are not the people, whom God hath a care ouer & loneth. In this place let vs note, that the Apostle bringeth a reason, why God is chiefly called the God of some, namely, because he iustifieth them. For straightway he addeth:

The law of nature.
The law geuen vnto Noe.

The rashnes of the Iewes.

Why God is sayd to be the God of some.

Metonymia.

A contentis of the Greekes & the Latines touching the holy ghost.

Metonymia.

VVho shall iustify circumcision of sayth, and vncircumcision by sayth. What is vnderstand by circumcision, and vncircumcision, we haue elswhere declared: they ar to be vnderstand by the figure Metonymia, so that by the signe we must vnderstand those thinges which are by it signified. These prepositions of and by, in this place, signifie one and the selfe same thing. They serue to amplify the matter, as in an other place Paule sayd of God, All thinges were made of hym, and by hym. The difference of these prepositions byed sometymes a greuous contention betwene the Greekes and the Latines. The Latines sayd that the holy ghost proceeded not only of the father, but also of the son. On the contrary, the Greekes affirmed, that he proceeded of the father: but by the sonne, & not of the sonne. But after they had long tyme contended, they saw that their contention was only about wordes. By these thinges which haue now bene spoken, we euidently see, that, as touching iustification, the Gentiles are made equall with the Iewes: which is a very great comfort vnto vs. Neyther ought we to be any thing moued, that Paule here useth a verbe of the future tense, when he sayth, Shall iustifye. For although in the olde time, very many both of the Iewes and of the Gentiles were so iustified, yet because that rarely happened, and amongst fewe, it was counted as not done, if we haue a respect vnto the general benedict, which happened after the coming of Christ. Neyther is the emphasis of strength of this sentence following to be passed ouer, For it is one God, vwho shall iustifye. &c.] For thereby is signified, that enen as there is but one God, so also to iustifye men he will vse but one waye, namely, By sayth. Those thinges which are here spoken, ought much to moue us, not to contemne our neighbours. For whē we shall consider with our selues, that our God, is their God also, we cā not but embrace them with a great love, honoz, & beneuolence. Neither ought we to flatter our selues touching singular benefites, which we haue receaued: soasmuch as the holy scriptures do admonishe vs, that many are fyist, which shalbe last: and contrary many last, which shalbe fyist. And Augustine in hys booke of 83. questions in hys 66. question admonissheth, that this sentence of Paule which is now proued, namely, that man is iustified without woꝝkes of the lawe, was peruerly vnderstand of many: which thought that men, when they beleued and were iustified, had no moze any nede, to liue holily & iustly: not weighing, that Paule here speaketh of woꝝkes that go before iustificatio, & not of those which follow it. This indeede is true, that there go no woꝝkes before, which are causes why we should be iustified. But after we haue once obtained righteousness, it is necessary that good woꝝkes follow. And hereof he saith it came, that Peter said, that in the epistles of Paul, are certaine harde things, which men would peruerse accordyng to their owne lust. James also seemeth to haue bene led so farre, that in a maner he wrote thinges contrary vnto Paule, namely. That a man is iustified by woꝝkes: who also required, y we should declare our faith by woꝝkes. Wherunto also John & Judas in their epistles seme to tend. But all these things are wel inough, neither ar they any thyng repugnant one to y other. For Paul speaketh of woꝝkes that are done before iustificatio: but James speaketh of those woꝝkes which ought to follow it. These things haue I brought out of the place of Augustine, before cited, and out of hys booke of faith and woꝝkes, the 14. chap. Who yet in the 66. question which we haue nowe alleaged, hath a certain sentence, which must be warely and aptly vnderstanded: otherwise it should not be true. For he sayth: That it is impossible, that we shoulde by woꝝkes goyng before obteyne iustification: but afterward (sayth he) it is necessarye that they follow, so that we remayne in life. And if a man beginne to beleue in the last houre of his lyfe, whē he shall streight way die, he hath nether good woꝝkes going before, nor good woꝝkes followyng after, but there followeth him onely a righteousness of fayth, and by it he is saued. Augustine seemeth by those wordes to affirme, that it is possible, that true fayth which iustificieth may be had without woꝝkes, which in very dede is false. For when a manne at the extremitie of death beleueth, it is not possible but that he loueth God and his neighbour, and calleth vpon him, and is soꝝy for those thinges, which he hath before wickedly committed. Wherfore these kindes of good woꝝkes which at the least haue place in the mynde, follow his faith. But I thinke Augustine vnderstode by good woꝝkes, those woꝝkes which are done outwardly, & may be sene of men.

Do we then thorough faith make the law of none effect? God forbid. Yea rather we establishe the law. ] Here is vsed the figure Occupatio, or a preuenting. For a man mought haue said, If the law bring not righteousness, why then did God geue it? Why may we not then liue losely, and follow our lustes? Not so vndoubtedly, saith Paule. For the law is not abolished by faith, but rather confirmed. He dispatcheth himselfe of this question bryefly, but afterward he entreateth of it moze largely. These men thought that Paule had made void the law, seing he had abrogated ceremonies. But in abrogating them, he exercised the liberty which was graunted him in the Gospell. But vnto the lawe, he did no iniury. For God in very dede would not, that the olde ceremonies should continue any longer. And yet notwithstanding Paule lieth not, when he sayth, that he in no case by fayth maketh the law voyde. And they which reason, that it is abolished, because ceremonies are made of none effect, do make a false argument of the Accident. For though the Accidences of any thing be taken away, it doth not follow, that the thing it selfe is altogether destroyed. But that is counted accident vnto the law, which hath not his force as touching all places and all tymes, and all men. And that ceremonies are so, it is not to be doubted. For when the people were in captiuitie, they were not obserued. Wherfore the Israelites being among the Chaldeans sayd, That they could not sing their song in a strange land. And Daniel complained, that in that captiuity the people wanted both a captayne and sacrifice. Circumcision all the while they were in the desert, was not obserued: and they fought on the Sabbath day, as we rede in the booke of the Machabees. Which booke if a man reied, we haue again in the booke of Iosua, that God commaunded the Israelites, to go about the citie of Jericho by the space of seuen dayes, and to cary aboute the arke with them, and to sound with trumpets. Which workes could not be done seuen dayes together, but that the Sabbath day must needs be one. But if a man demaund, if these be the acci-dences of the law, what was then the principall, prime, and perfect thing in these ceremonies, which should alwayes abide. To answer to euery perticuler thyng, would now require too long a tyme. In summe this I say, God would, that men should not forget him. And therfore by certaine outward signes he prouided, that he might alwayes be set before their eyes, and come into their thoughtes, that by that meanes they might euermore both worship him, and call vpon him. If they had loked vpon their body, Circumcision was before their eyes: If they beheld their garment, they had their hemmes to consider: If they came to the table, then had they to consider of the choyce of meates: If they entred into their house, their thresholds and postes had the commaundements of God written in them: If they had brought forth children, they had to consider, that the first borne should be redeemed, and that the woman was long tyme vncleane: if they had turned themselves to their flocks or cattaille, then were the first borne to be offered vnto God: if they had gone into the fieldes, the first fruites and tenthes should be gathered and offered: If their fruites gathered should be layd vp, then had they to celebrate the feast of the Tabernacles.

The revolutions of euery weeke, of euery month, of euery yere, or seuen yeares, or fifty yeares, had certaine rites appointed vnto it. Wherefore that which was the chiefest and principallest thing in the law, was confirmed by faith: and is now also retained of godly men: namely, in euery thing to remember God, & to thinke vpon him: which now ought to be obserued without outward signes, neyther is that abrogated either by Paule or by faith. But that God would no longer haue these outward ceremonies obserued, may thereby be gathered, that he hath ouerthrowen the publike wealth of the Iewes, and hath caused the citie of Jerusalem to be cleane defaced, so that now there is neither temple nor tabernacle standing, neither is the propitiatory or mercy seat to be found, from whence the voice of God was wonte to geue oracles, and the brestplate is lost, where were the precious stones, out of which, answer was geuen of thinges to come. The annointyng also is cleane gone, wherby he sometymes chaunged men, when they were consecrated to execute any functions. For Saule prophesied when he was now annointed. Neyther is fire now had from heauen, wherewith the sacrifices were consumed. And Prophesies are now cleane out of vse: which thing God would not haue permitted, if his will had bene, that the ceremonies of Moyses should haue continued any longer.
And this chiefelye is a let to the continuing of them, that it was lawfull to exercise them no where, but onely in the land promised vnto the fathers. And when the A-postle affirmeth, that by faith he establissheth y<sup>e</sup> law, this is chieflye to be understanded as touching the morall partes therof. For faith bringeth with it the obedience of the law. Wherefore of this thing our mindes ought to be settled, y<sup>e</sup> without faith the law cannot be obserued: & contrariwise that by faith an obedience begon maye be accomplished which thing also maye by reasons be confirmed. The law commaundeth y<sup>e</sup> we should loue God: that wth all our hart, wth all our soule, & wth al our strenghts.
But who is able to performe this, vntlesse he know God thoroughly, whiche thyng can not be done without faith. And if any man shall set God before him as a lawe gener, as a most severe iudge, and an auenger, he will rather abhorre him, & flye from him of hatred, as from a cruell slaughterman, then that his minde can ther-by be induced to loue him. But who can without faith in Christ perswade himselfe, that God is vnto him as a father, or mercifull, or louing? Farther, the lawe commaundeth, that we should call vpon him: which without faith we can neuer per-forme.

some: For it is sayde, How shall they call vpon him, in whom they haue not beleued?
 Moreover, we are commaunded to loue our neighbour as our selues. Which thing, forasmuch as it is a most hard matter to be done, we neuer accomplishe, yea rather we oftentimes therein faile. From whence therefore shall we haue forgeuenes, that y<sup>e</sup> which wanteth of our righteousness may be imputed of the righte-ousnes of Christ, vnles we vse the benefite of sayth: Augustine indgeth, that the law is two maner of wayes confirmed by sayth. First, because by it we obtaine the holy ghost: whereby are ministred vnto vs strengthes, to obey the lawe.
 But a man may peraduenture doubt, how this can be, that by sayth we haue the holy ghost, when as of necessity he alwayes goeth before sayth. For sayth is both his gift, and also commeth from him to vs. But we answere, that be-twene the causes and the effectes seme to be certayne circuites, as it is manifest by cloudes and showres. From cloudes descend raynes, & out of waters which are in the inferiour places are taken vp vapors by the heate of the heauens, which are thickened into cloudes, out of which againe descend showres vpon the earth.
 But in this circute, we must alwayes haue a recourse to the first, according to the order of nature: which is, whē there is supposed an humoz, of which cloudes may encrease. So also must we do here. We will graūt that sayth by the benefite of the holy ghost springeth in vs. By which sayth, is increased the aboun-dance of the selfe same spirite, whose encrease the former sayth hath presented: and of a greater sayth is still made a greater encrease of the spirite. But yet notwithstanding we constantly affirme, that there is but one thing chiefly, from whence all these good things flow, namely, the holy ghost. Secondly, saith Augustine the lawe is by the helpe of sayth otherwise confirmed. Because, by sayth we pray, and calling vpon God with prayers, we do not only obtayne remission of sinnes, but also so greate a portion of the spirite and of grace, that we haue strengthes to obey the lawe. Undoubtedly the lawe if it be taken by it selfe, maketh vs both vncertaine of the good will of God, and after a sort bring-geth desperation, vnles sayth come and helpe, which both maketh vs assured, that God is pacified and mercifull towards vs, and also by grace obtayneth the renuing of strengthes. And the Apostles phrase, whereby he sayth that by sayth he establissheth the lawe, is to be noted. For thereby he signifieth, that the lawe, if it be left vnto it selfe, and without sayth, is weake, so that it can not consist. And therefore, vnles it be upholden by sayth, it shall easely fall. And this is the poynte of a singular artificer, not only to depel from him, that which is objected, but also to declare that the selfe same maketh most of all for his purpose. The lawe and sayth helpe one another, and as the common saying is, geue handes eche to other. For the lawe doth as a scholemaster bring men vnto the sayth of Christ, and on the other side, sayth bringeth this to passe, that it maketh them after a sort able to accomplishe the lawe. For straght waye, so soone as a man beleueth in Christ, he obtayneth iustification, and is liberally endued with abundance of the spirite, and with grace. The entent and purpose of the lawe, was, that a man should both be made good, and also be saued.
 But this thing, it was not able to performe. Then succeeded sayth, and did helpe it: for through it, is a man renued, so that he is able to obey God, and his commaundementes. Chrysostome sayth, that Paul here prometh thre things. First, that a man may be iustified without the lawe. Secondly, that the lawe can not iustify. Thirdly, that sayth and the lawe are not repugnant one to the other.
Ambrose teacheth, that therefore by sayth is the lawe establisshed, because that those thinges, which by the lawe are commaunded to be done, are by sayth declared to be done. And we haue already before heard, that this righteousness, which Paul here commendeth, hath testimony both of the lawe, and of the Prophetes. And if any man object, that therefore the lawe is made voyde by sayth, because by it ceremonies are abolished, he answereth that this thing therefore so happeneth, because the lawe it selfe would haue it so, and soetold, that it should so come to passe. In Daniell we reade, that after the comming of Christ, and after that he was slayne, the dayly sacrifice should be taken away, and the holy anoynting, and such like kinde of ceremonies. Wherefore Christ did not without cause saye, The lawe and the Prophetes endured vnto Iohn baptistes tyme. Jeremy also most manifestly sayd, that an other leage should be made, farre diuers from that which was made in the olde tyme. The epistle vnto the Hebrues thereby concludeth, that that which was the olde leage and was so called, should one day be abolished. Zachary the Prophet in his 2 chapter sayth, that the city of Ierusalem should be inhabited without walles. Which signified that the Church of the beletiers should so be spred abroad and dispersed through out the whole world, that it should not be enclosed in by any borders or limites. Which selfe same thing Esay semeth to testefy, when he sayth, That mount Sion and the house of the Lord should be on the toppe of the hilles, so that the Gentiles should come vnto it out of all places. And Malachy the Prophet pronounced, that the name of God should be called vpon, fro the rising of the sunne to the going downe of the same, so that vnto God should euery where be offred Minchah, which many haue transferred vnto the Eucharist, as though it were a sacrifice: when as yet the prophet thereby vnderstandeth pray- ers, and the offering by euery one of our selues: as Tertullian testifieth in his booke a- gainst the Iewes, and also Ierome when he interpreteth that place. Wherefore when the Prophetes seme to affirme, that ceremonies should be transferred vnto the Ethnikes, they are so to be vnderstood, as though by the signes they ment the thinges themselves. The Ethnikes being conuerted vnto Christ, receaued that which was represented by the ceremonies of the elders. But they relected the outward signes, and thys was by sayth to confirme the lawe. And sozasmuch as the Prophetes foztold, that ceremonies should be abolished, the same is to be taken, as if it had bene spoken of the lawe, so that the Prophetes were inter- preters of the lawe. And that Christ when he should come, should chaunge the ce- remonies, euen the Iewes them selues doubted not, whych thing is manifest by the hystorie of Iohn Baptist, which we reade in the Gospell. For when he would purge menne conuerted vnto God, he sente them not vnto sacrifices, and vnto the ceremonies of Moses, by whiche, sinnes were sayd to be purged: but baptised them into repentance, to the forgiveness of sinnes, adioyning therunto doctrine, wherein he made mention of the Father, and of the Sonne, and of the holy Gost. Which thing undoubtedly the high Priestes, and Scribes, and Phariseys coulde in no case abyde, that he relecting the ceremonies, which were receaued, shoulde put in their place a new maner of purging. Wherefore they sent a Messenger vnto him, to aske of him, whether he were the Messias, or Elias, or the Prophet: as it were confessing, that vnder the Messias it should come to passe, that the cere- monies of the law should be abolished: & the same was not lawfull for other me to doo. And if a man demaund, why God gaue ceremonies, which should afterwarde be abolished, Chrysostome hath thereof a very apt similitude. If a man haue a wyfe very prone to lasciuiousnes, he shutteth her up in certayne places, in chambers, I say, and parlors, so that shee cannot wander abraide at her pleasure. He appointeth vnto her moreouer Eunuches, waiting maydes, and handmaidens, most diligent to haue an eye vnto her. So delte God with the Iewes. He took them vnto him at the beginning as a spouse, as it is said in the Prophet, I haue wedded thee with mercy, and with loue. And by this natio his wil was at conuenient tyme to enstruct the whole world. Which thing he did by the Apostles, when Christ was now departed fro the earth. But that people was ve- ry weake and feble, and aboue measure prone to adulteries of idolatry. Wherefore God se- perated them from other nations, and would haue them to dwell in the land of Chanaan aparte by themselves, and to be kept in on euery side with ceremonies and rites, as it were by scholemasters, untill this spouse was so strengthened and confirmed, that her sayth was no more had in suspicion. Which thing when husbandes perceiue in their wyues, they suffer them to go at their pleasure, whether they will, and to be conuersant with menne, neither do they any more set any keepers to wathe them. So God, when he had now by Christ giuen vnto the church the holy ghost, he removed away from it the custodie of cere-

ceremonies, and sent forth his faithfull to preach throughout the whole world. The selfe same father proueth in an other place, that the ceremonies and rites of the Iewes were not instituted of God, of a principall entente and purpose. For God would haue a people which should worship him in spirite and in truth. But the Israelites, which had bene conuersant in Egypt and had contaminated themselves with idolatry, would needes in any wise haue both sacrifices and ceremonies, so that if these sacrifices and rites had not bene permitted vnto them, they would haue bene ready to turne to idolatry. Wherefore God so delt with them, as the maner of a wise phisition is to do, who lighting vpon one sicke of a burnyng agew, whiche by reason of his wonderfull great heate requireth in any wyse to haue some colde water geuen him, and if he haue none geuen him, he is redy to hang himselfe, or by some other meanes to destroy himselfe, in this case the phisition beyng by necessity compelled, commaundeth to be brought a viall full of water, which he himselfe hath prepared, and geueth the sicke man leaue to drinke, but yet with suche a charge, that he drinke out of nothing els, but out of that viall. So God graunted vnto the Hebrewes, sacrifices and ceremonies, but yet so, that they should not exercise them otherwise, then he himselfe had commaunded them. And that this is true, he hereby proueth, For that God prescribed not ceremonies, but when he had made open his wrath against the Israelites, who hurling in theyr braselets, earringes, and ringes, caused a calfe to be made for them, which they worshipped. And sayng it is so, Paul saith rightly, when he sayth, that the law is not by faith abolished, although those ceremonies be taken away. Which sentence Christ also confirmeth, when he saith: that he came not to take away the law, but to fulfill it. The sence of which wordes, may easely be gathered out of those thinges, which we haue before spoken. The reasons which after ward follow, are brought to confirme this proposition now alledged, namely, That man is iustified by faith, and that without the workes of the law. Hether to when as at the beginning the Apostles had set forth, that by the Gospell and the faith of Christ cometh saluation, and righteousness, he vied this reason, that whersoener the Gospell and faith want, there is most great unrighteousnes and uncleannes of life: but on the contrary side where these haue place, there is both righteousness and true holines. Wherefore by them (saith he) come saluation and iustification. The second proposition was proued chiefly as touching the first parte. For first the Gentles liued most filthely, although they knew God by the nature of thinges. Farther the Iewes were not in their conuersation one whit better then the Gentles. And this done, he declareth, wherehence the true righteousness should be sought for, namely, of faith without workes. Which thing before he would proue, he thought it good to confute an obiection, namely, that by faith he overthroweth not the law, but rather by faith confirmeth it. This selfe same thing is objected vnto vs in our dayes, that by faith, which with the Apostle we affirme to iustifie, we overthrowe all honest and holy workes. Of this thing do they cry out, which defend the worke wrought in the sacramentes, which boast of workes of supererogation, whiche defend purgatory, inuocation of saintes, and obtrude bowes and sole life. What shall we answer to these thinges? Paul saith, y he by faith abrogateth not the law, but rather confirmed it. In which wordes he geueth a reuerence to the ceremonies instituted of God, & which for their tyme were of necessity obeyed, especially for y they were founded vpon y word of God. But we can not so say as touching those thinges which we are accused to haue overthrowen. Because they are abuses and mere superstitions, which are bitterly repugnant vnto the worde of God. Wherefore, we confesse, that these thinges we overthrow by the faith of Christ and doctrine of the Gospell. Now haue we heard the purpose and state of the question which shall be entreated of, which we ought continually to haue before our eyes, so that vnto it must we referre, whatsoeuer is sayd in this whole discourse. And this shal be with fruite to heare those thinges which the Apostle writeth.

The fourth Chapter.

What shal we say then, that Abraham, our father hath found concerning the flesh: For if Abraham were iustified by workes, he hath wherein to reioyce, but not with God. For what sayth the Scripture, Abraham beleued God, and it was counted to hym for righteousnes.

What shall we say then.] The summe of those things, which are contained in this. 4. Chapter, is deuised into these partes. The first is, that we must be iustified after the selfe same manner that Abraham was iustified. The seconde, that our iustification commeth by the imputacion of God. The third, that it consisteth in the remission of sinnes. In the fourth, is set forth the time, wherein Abraham was iustified, and so is declared, that he attayned vnto righteousnes, before he had put in vze, any worke of the law, namely, the worke of circumcision. Farther he plainly sheweth, that righteousnes is therfore had by faith, that the promise of God mighte be firme and sure. Moreover there is set forth the example of Abraham and that with an amplification declarynge, howe that he considered not hys owne infirmitie, neyther those things, whyche by nature had bene able to hynder that, which God had promised him. Lastly is shewed, y these things were not written for his sake only, but also for vs, which by faith do follow the steps of his selfe same father Abraham. Chrysostome bringeth in these things which are here spokē, after this maner: That it might seme peradventure to some, not to be very mete & glorious, that we should by faith be iustified without workes. But (saith he) the matter is far other wise. Because partly we may se, how excellent a thing this is, for Paul calleth that thing righteousnes, which we attayne vnto by faith; & here declareth, that God by this means sheweth forth & declareth his goodnes, & righteousnes: and partly because Abraham so great a Patriarche was after this maner iustified. It is not without a cause that Paul placeth an example before his other arguments. For the thinge that is here chiefly taught for, is that the truth which is layd before vs, might be made manifest, and playne. And this is the proper vse of examples, most manifestly to lay a thing before our eyes. And although there were greates plenty of examples, yet Paul did choose this example of Abraham, because he was both a man of God, and also one endued with most excellent vertues, & because the Hebrewes continually boasted of him, as whome they acknowledge and craked to be the father and prince of theyr kindred. And of suche force was his authority amongst them, that the place of the blessed was called the bosome of Abraham. Which name Christ would not haue vsed in his Gospell, vntlesse it had bene receaued amongst the common people. Neither ought we to meruaile, that the Apostle so diligently and exactly bendeth himselfe to dispute of this iustification. For it is not a slight thing, nor a matter of small weight, but the principall ground of our felicity: wherein if a man be thoroughly instructed, I dare be bold to say, that he shall easily put away all abuses. And because our aduersaries, in it, as in the first entry, do so wilyly stumble and erre, therefore in other partes of religion also, are they most filthily deceaued. But in this example this is chiefly to be marked, that, for as much as in it, is entreated of Circumcision, and Abraham is sayd to haue bene iustified, before he receaued it, some suppose, that hereby they haue a firme argument, that Paul excludeth not all workes from iustification: but onely ceremonies of the law. Vnto whom we answer, that Paul therefore in especial reasoned touching these ceremonies, for that for them the controuersie happened. But yet in the discourse of hys reasoning, he minglith many thinges, which cause that the question must of necessity be taken generally: which thing we shall in his place note. Wherefore we graunt, that the argumentes chiefly tende to that end: but yet are they so handled, that together he concludeth vniuersally of all workes. Farther, it is to be noted, that in the tyme of Abraham, and of the old law, for as much as these ceremonies then

The sum of the things that shall be spoken of in this chapter.

It is an honorable thing to be iustified by faith.

The Apostle doth very well in using an example.

The dignity of Abraham.

Of how great a value iustification is.

were founded vpon the word of God, men were bound no lesse to obey them, then the other commandementes. And yet the Apostle affirmeth that by that obedience men were not iustified. Wherefore we conclude, that those selfe same men could not be iustified by the obseruing of the other commaundementes. In this place is detected the dignitie of good workes, but not vniuersally. Wherfore those thinges, which are here spoken, ought not to be drawn vnto a looseness of life, and to licentiousnes to sinne, but rather are to bee applied vnto the scope and meaning of Paul. Paul onely entendeth this thing, to shewe, that in good workes, is not set the cause of our iustification. Other praises and commendacions he abundantly geueth vnto them. For it is not to bee thought, that by his doctrine he would bring into contempt the most excellent vertues of a man of such estimation. For, as the Iewes make mention, Abraham was very often tempted, and yet neuertheless he continually overcame. God called him out of his land and kindred, to lyue as a stranger in the land of Chanaan. But there he could not lyue by reason of the same: wherefore hee was constrained to go downe into Egipte, where he was tempted the thirde tyme, when Pharao tooke away his wyfe from him. The fourth temptacion hee suffered, when he was compelled to depart from Loth for the annoyding of contentions. Finally he was tempted, when he made warre agaynst so many kinges, and agaynst so victorions an host, when as he him selfe had with him but a very few. The first temptacion was, when he being now a very old man, was commaunded to receiue Circumcision. The senenth, when king Abimelech in Gerara agayne tooke away his wyfe from him. The eight, when Agar, which had conceaued by him, was constrained to flee from Sara, who afflicted her greuously. The ninth, when he was compelled to send away his sonne Ismael, being now of good age, together with his mother. The tenth, when God required of him, to sacrifice vnto him his onely begotten sonne Isaack. With these & other such most excellent workes was Abraham adorned: which thinges Paul contemneth not, but only sheweth, that these were not such, that they could be opposed and set agaynst the wrath and iudgement of God, so that for thesakes he should haue God fauorable and mercifull. For in this place, is not entreated of the righteousness, which is obtayned by workes, which is in vs a quality cleansing vnto vs: but only of that righteousness, whereby we are iustified before God. The reason of the Apostle may thus be knit together: We are iustified after the same maner, that Abraham was iustified: But he obtayned righteousness by fayth, without workes: wherefore we also ought to be iustified by fayth, without workes. The minoz, or second proposition is thus proued: For if Abraham should haue bene iustified by workes, he had glory, or merite (whiche is all one) before God. But that is not possible, that any man should haue glory before God. Wherefore neyther is that possible, from whence it is deduced. And that Abraham was not iustified by workes, the scripture declareth vnto vs. For it sayth, that Abraham obtayned righteousness by imputation. For it sayth, Abraham beleued God, and it was counted vnto hym for righteousness. This is the summe of Paul's reason. After Chrysostome's mynde this is worthy to be noted. If any man not hauing good workes should be iustified, that assuredly might seme to be a great thinge. But this is a thing farre greater, y<sup>e</sup> he, which was most rich in good workes, coulde not for all that be iustified by them. Vndoubtedly hereby most manifestly appeareth the worthynesse of fayth.

V What shall we say, that our father Abraham found. Forasmuch as he bringeth an argument from an example, to this ground leaneth he, that it behoorth all men to be iustified after the same maner, that Abraham was iustified. For it is the selfe same God, which iustifieth, and there is one and the selfe same nature of them which are iustified, and the righteousness, which both then was geuen, and also is now geue, is one and the selfe same, & it is the selfe same Christ, by whome both they and we obtayne righteousness. Wherefore it followeth

Paul contemneth not the vertues and good workes of Abraham. The temptacions and victories of Abraham.

The argument of Paul.

Abraham obtayned righteousness, not by workes, but by imputation.

Wherby the dignitie of fayth doth chiefly appeare. The foundation of the example is, that all men are iustified after one and the selfe same maner.

with that all men are iustified after one and the selfe same maner. God in dede may vse to it sundry instrumentes as well the scriptures of the olde testament, as of the new, and the simboles or signes also as well of the newe sacramentes, as of the olde: when as the thinge whiche is geuen, is vtterlye one and the selfe same. Further it is necessary, that the thinges which followe, haue a similitude with the types and signes which went before. And that the fathers were formes and shadowes of our times, no man doubteth. Here let vs call to remembrance, with what mynde thinke we, toke the scribes and pharisees, these wordes of Paul, vnto whome it appeared, that he tooke away the power of iustifying from these excellent workes of Abraham. I doubt not, but that they were therewith all thoroughly offended, and peradventure they resisted Paul, as though they would put away such injury from so great a prophet, and defend his excellent good workes. We haue at this day an experience of their furious rage in them, which so soon as euer they heare vs speake any thing otherwise then the fathers haue written, are set a fire, and counte vs not worthy to be harkened vnto. But Paul nothing passed vpon the euill reportes of the scribes in his tyme. For they may be answered by an easy and manifest distinction: namely, that there is one righteousness ciuile, outward, and attayned vnto by workes, and is a quality cleauing in our myndes: but there is an other righteousness which is imputed vnto vs of God.

Our father (sayth he) peradventure alluding vnto the name. For Abraham is called the father of many nations. And although in the booke of Genesis, where these things are written, he was not as then called Abraham, but Abram; yet when the Apostle wrote this, he thought mete to call him by that name, by which he was commonly called.

When he sayth, our, he includeth himselfe, that he mighte not be thought as an vnnaturall sonne, to haue cast of his father.

To finde, in this place signifieth to obtayne, by what meanes soeuer it be, whether it be by gift, or by any other meanes.

According vnto the flesh, he may be adioyned eyther vnto this word, father, wherby to geue vs to vnderstand, that he was the progenitor of the Iewes, as touching theyr naturall originall: and by that meanes he semeth to reprove the Iewes, for that they boasted of the nobility of the flesh only, and endeuored not to imitate the piety and religion of Abraham. Wherefore in the Gospell Christ sayd, that they were not the children of Abraham, but the children of the deuill: For if they had bene of Abraham, they would haue done his workes. But they contrarily wholly applyed themselves vnto lying, and murdering, which are most certainly the workes of the deuill. And after this maner he is called father according to the flesh, wherby is gathered (as some say) that only their bodies, and not theyr soules were traduced from him. Or according to the opinion of other men, these words, according to the flesh, are to be ioyned vnto the verbe, founde so that the sence is: By the flesh, that is, by the workes of the flesh: such as are ceremonies, & circumcision. This interpretation Ambrose followeth, who peculiarly vnderstandeth circumcision. Neither am I much against it, so that we vnderstand, that although this question, & the arguments that are put forth, be touching ceremonies, yet by the spirit of God is brought to passe, that those things should be generally entreated of, as we shall in his due place declare. And the thinges which Abraham found were chiefly, that he was called iust, and the Father of all beleuers. For this is to be the father of many peoples: and lastlye this also, that he was the heire of the world. But here is chiefly entreated of the obteyning of that righteousness, which is sayd happened not vnto him, but by sayth. For righteousness to be imputed, and to be iustified by workes, are cleane contrary the one vnto the other, which is hereby manifest for that to be iustified by imputation, is to haue righteousness freely. And to be iustified by workes, is not to haue righteousness freely. But to haue righteousness freely, and not to haue it freely, are manifestly repugnaunt one agaynst the other. And in that he sayth,

If Abra-

fied by workes are agaynst the naunt.

If Abraham were iustificed by workes, he hath whereof to boast, but not before God. It is as much as if he had sayd, that he shoulde not haue righteousness before God, and that all other righteousness is of no value. For it is God, at whose becke we ought either to stand, or to fall. Wherefore we nothing passe by on the righteousness, which is had of men, especially as touching this present purpose. And it were fond, to acknowledge any other righteousness, for the true perfect righteousness, then that which God himselfe, and the holy scripture calleth righteousness. Wherefore no man can now doubt, but that the Apostle speaketh not of ciuill righteousness, which we get by workes, and which cleaueth in our mindes as a qualitie: but onely of the righteousness which is geuen vnto vs freely, and is imputed vnto the beleuers. Wherefore Paul expessedly added this particle, Before God. Whereby is manifestly gathered, that the workes of men, are not of that nature, that they can be layde agaynst the wrath and seuerity of God, and that they can appease him, and make him mercifull vnto vs. Moreover,

To haue whereof to boast before God. It is to obtayne anye thyng as an excellent and noble gifte, which we may boaste, that we haue receyued of God: and not to haue obtayned it of our selues, or of our owne strengths. For he which leaneth vnto workes, commendeth himselfe, and his owne. But he which is iustificed by fayth, commendeth the liberalitie of God, and setteth forth his giftes. Whereupon Chrysostome noteth, that men haue much more to glorye of, when they leane vnto fayth, then when they take to glory in their workes. The giftes of God which fayth taketh hold of, farre excell all our workes. They which glory of workes, do magnifie a thing which is seene, and felt: but he which gloryeth in fayth, conceiveth a noble opinion of God, so that he is perswaded, that he will performe euen those thinges, which can not be done by nature, neither boasteth he of those thinges, which he hath done: but extollet those thinges, which God hath done: namely, that he loueth him, that he hath forgiven him his sinnes, and counteth him in the number of the iust. This is in a manner the whole glorying of the godly. By this kinde of speache we see, that the Apostle, by glorying, vnderstandeth righteousness, freely geuen of God. Whereby is easely expessed, what Paul ment, when before he sayd, All men haue sinned, and want the glory of God. In which place, by glory, he vnderstode nothing els, then righteousness freely geuen of God, because by that chiefly shineth forth the glory of God. This oracle is writte in the 15. chap: of the booke of Genesis. Vehaadin beichonah veiahashbo lo tfa dicka. Abraham beleued in God, and he imputed vnto him righteousness. To beleue in this place is, assuredly to thinke, that God of his mercy loueth vs, which mercy by his mere promise is set forth vnto vs: and we not to suffer our selues by reason of our vnpuritye or uncleanes, to be plucked away from this perswasion. Wherefore it wholly consisteth in the embracing of the grace and promise of God offered vnto vs. In very many places Abraham is highly comended and praised. But he was neuer called iust, but then onely, when he beleued. Hereby may we know, with what great diligence Paul did both handle, search and weigh the holy scriptures. He declineth not to allegories, nor to mens inuentions. He especially weigheth two wordes, which he compareth together: by which the whole reason is knit together, which wordes are, To beleue, and righteousness to be imputed. But in the historie of the booke of Genesis, which we are now in hand with, it is had after this manner. God appeared vnto Abraham and sayd, that he was his buckler, or protection, and his plenteous reward. Which thinges when he heard, he bega to complayne, for that he had no children. For the elders, had an exceeding greafe desire to haue children: and that for two causes, partly because they desired the increase of a people which might worship God, and partly because they had heard, that the Messias should take flesh of theyr nation. Therefore they desired, by hauing of children, to light at the length vpon that Messias. But God vouchsafed, not onely to geue vnto him posteritie, but commaunded him also to number the starres of heauen: which thinge when he could not do, God promised, that the abundance of his seede should be as greafe. Abraham beleued God, and it was imputed vnto him for

What is the glorying of the godly. Glorying is righteousness freely & liberally geuen. What is to beleue.

Onely in this place Abraham is called iust. How diligent & depe a handler of scripture Paul was.

Why the elders were so desirous of posterity.

Cap. 4 A Commentarie vpon the

righteousnes. That which the Grecians haue turned in the pastille significatio do- yo in, that is, was imputed, in the hebrue is written actively, he imputed, namely God imputed vnto him righteousness. But in the sence, there is no difference. And Paul therefore followeth the seventy interpreters, because they translation was not vnknown vnto the heathen: where let vs note, that that which in the hebrue is in Deum, that is, in God, the same both Paul and y<sup>e</sup> seventy haue turned to deo, that is, to God, wherefore they obserued not that difference of Augustine, of beleuing God, and beleuinge in God. But here ariseth a doubt, how Abraham seemeth to haue obayned righteousness by fayth. For, that fayth was not of Christ, but one-ly of an infinite yssue and posteritie. But vnto this may answere be made many wayes. First, that Abraham beleued not onely touching issue, but chiefly touching those thinges, which at the beginning of the chapter were promised vnto him, namely, that God would be vnto him both a shield and a reward. And moze ouer then this, he foresaw Christ in his posterity. Wherefore in the Gospell it is saide of hym, that he saw the day of Christ, and reioyced. And Paul to the Galathians referreth all thys vnto one seede, which is Christ. Farther, hee whoche talked wth hym, was the sonne of God. For no man hath sene God at anye tyme.
 Therefore whatsoever thinges we haue either seene or knowen of hym, the Sonne, which is in the bosome of the Father, he hath declared it vnto vs.
 Wherefore if he beleued God, he beleued in Christ. We haue oftentimes also declared, that in all promises was wrapped and infolden as the roote and foundacion, that promise, which was touching Christ. Neyther seems they to thinke amisse, which affirme, that alwayes the object of faith, is the mercy and goodnes of God, which sheweth forth it selfe in singular giftes, eyther tempo-rall or spirituall. Wherefore when the elders conceaued a hope of victo<sup>ry</sup>, of deliuey from enemyes, and from other calamities, they chiefly did put their confidence in the deuine goodnes, because by it God was moued, mercifully and appeasedly to geue vnto them these singular giftes. And he coulde not be appeased towarde them, but by Christ. Wherefore, in that they beleued any of y<sup>e</sup> promises of God, they beleued in Christ. Which thing also we ought to be myndfull of, when we aske our dayly bread, & we ought to beleue y<sup>e</sup> we shal not want such thinges as pertaine to our lining. Some thinke this to be repugnant vnto the argument of Paul, which is written in the 106 Psalme of Phinees the sonne of Eleazar, who when he had thurst throughte the Medianische harlot and the Israelite, not only repressed the plague inflicted by God, but also got this thereby, that euen the selfe same thinges with like number of wordes were written of hym, which Paul here citeth of Abraham out of the booke of Genesis. And it was imputed vnto hym for righteousness. Which wordes seing they are spoken of him by reason of his worke, it might seme, that iustification is not so proper vnto fayth, that Paul should firmly auouch, that righteousness commeth vnto vs by it only. But we answere, that we deny not, but that after fayth and iustification are of good men wrought excellent workes, which are of God counted for iust, especially when they haue their orispring out of fayth.
 Wherefore Augustine vpon the 31. Psalme: when he commendeth Abrahams fact, in that he would haue sacrificed his only sonne, sayth, that he commendeth the building, but in the meane tyme he considereth the foundation, which was fayth: he sayth that he alloweth the fruite, but in the meane tyme he hath a regard to the roote.
 But Paul now entreateth not of those thinges, which follow righteousness: but of the very roote and hed: what that is, for which we are counted iust. Wherefore the Psalme speaketh of the worke, and Paul of the fyrst righteousness. Nether ought we to maruaile, that good workes are sayde to be imputed for righ-teousnes: forasmuch as it is necessary it should be so. For they haue not in the selues so much perfeccion, that they can in all pointes satisfie the lawe of God.
 Wherefore it is needfull, that God for his mercy sake receaue them as acceptable, in imputing that part of goodnes and of righteousness which wanteth in them.

them. They also are not to be harkened vnto, which interpret this sentence so, that they vnderstand, that Paul speaketh of sayth here, as it is a worke: so that the sence should be, that God imputed vnto righteousness that acte of Abraham, whereby he beleued: as though he would count that for iustice. That is not intreated of at this present, to dispute of a iust worke. But that is sought from whence we are iustified. And to make the matter more playne, to be imputed vnto righteousness, is taken two manner of wayes. Sometymes it signifieth some acte to be ratified and to be allowed, and to speake briefly, to be accepted for iust: and after this manner we graunte, that that acte of Phinees, and the good workes of holy men are imputed of God vnto righteousness. An other way it signifieth that, by which we our selues are counted in the number of the iust: and that Paul attributeth only vnto sayth, as though he should haue said: Abraham beleued, that he was acceptable vnto God, and that he was counted with him for iust, and lastly, that he should attayne to blessednes: and as he beleued, so he receaued. For it came to passe vnto hym, according to his sayth. Wherefore by it he receaued that which was offered vnto him of God, as it is written in the beginning of the 15. chapter. For God had sayde vnto hym, I am thy protector, and thy exceeding great reward. But that which is sayd of Phinees, and of the workes of good men, pertayneth vnto the outpes, whiche follow them that are iustified. But forasmuch as many promises are made vnto workes, and God in this place calleth himselfe a reward, and eternall life, is oftentimes in the holy scriptures called a reward, as though it were rendred vnto workes, why may we not by workes likewise obtayne righteousness, seying that it is as great a matter to glorifye, as to iustify. But two thinges are here to be considered: first, that good workes may go before glorification, but not before iustification. Because after that we are iustified, we may do such thinges as are acceptable vnto God. But before we are iustified, we are able to do nothinge that is truly good, and which can please God. Whereouer we graunt not, that eternall life is had by workes, as though it were by them merited. But when it is called a reward, it is in this respect, because it is rendred after the worke done: euen as that which we deserue by any ciuile actions, is not wont to be rendred, till the worke be full done. And in such sort, eternall life may in dede haue some similitude of a reward: but yet properly and as touching the nature of a reward it is most farre of, and that for three causes. First, because those thinges which are geuen, and which are receaued, are not alike: but that is required to the nature of merite. Secondly, because the workes, which we offer, are not our owne. For God geueth them vnto vs, and woorketh in vs both to will, and to performe. Wherefore if there were any merite, it should not be attributed vnto vs, but vnto God, as to the author of all good workes. Lastly, when a reward or merite is properly taken, it behoueth, that which is geuen of vs, be not bound of duty vnto him vnto whom it is geue. But we, although we shoulde not obtayne felicitye, yet ought we to doo all our thinges vnto the glory of God. Wherefore eternall lyfe can not be called a reward, but by a certaine similitude. But many say, that these sentences of Paul are to be vnderstand by a figure, as though it were the figure Synecdoche, that faith is therefore said to iustifie, because it in iustifying obtaineth the chiefest place: and so they will not that good workes, which are ioyned with faith, should utterly be excluded from the power of iustifying. They are in dede content, that we should commend faith, but yet in such sort commend it, that we shoulde say that it iustifieth together with other good workes, which workes they say Paul vnderstandeth in it by the figure Synecdoche. And by this meanes they thinke may be conciliated very many places in the scriptures. For vndoubtedly in the 11. chap. of Genesis, God for a worke, promised many thinges vnto Abraham. Because (saith he) thou hast done this thing, thy seede shall be increased, it shall obteyne the gates of his enemies, and in thy seede shall all nations be blessed: and other such like. And Iames seemeth to expound this Synecdoche

Faith is not here taken as it is a worke. Two manner wayes of imputing

If eternall life be sayd to be rendred vnto workes why is not also sayd of righteousness. Good workes may go before eternall life, but not before iustification. Eternall life is called a reward by a similitude and not properly.

when he affirmeth, that Abraham was iustified by workes. Vnto these men was aunswer, that the wordes of Paul will in no case suffer any suche trope or figure: whose wordes are so playne and perspicuous, that they neither can be violated, nor yet ouerthrowen. For he saith not onely, that we are iustified by faith: but also he excludeth workes. For he saith, without workes, and that it mighte the playnier and easelier be vnderstand he addeth, freely: and other wordes, which apertly are repugnant with tropicall kindes of speech: And vndoubtedly this is to be considered, that the man, or (if I may so speake) the person it self be first both iust, and also acceptable vnto God: and then afterward shal good workes follow. But those things which are written in the ii. chap. of Genesis, are nothing at all repugnaunt vnto this sentence. For there it can not be shewed, that Abraham for that worke was counted iust before God. For, that, had he before obtained. But he receiued promises of hys posteritie, that God would also geue them many and excellent thinges. And we deny not, but that God very oftentimes promisseth vnto good workes diuers rewards as well spirituall as temporall, both as touching the elect themselves, as also touching their posteritie. Neither was James meaning, that Abraham was iustified by workes, after that maner that Paul here speaketh of iustification. For he speaketh of that iustification, which may be known of men, and according to which, we are pronounced iustified. For this spirituall iustification, wherof we now intreat, we can not know in other men, but by those thinges which are done by them outwardly. And in summe, whatsoeuer places of the scripture do attribute righteousness vnto workes, they speake of that righteousness which followeth iustification.

But to him that worketh, the reward is not imputed according to grace, but accordynge to debte. But to him that woorketh not, but beleueth in him that iustificieth & vngodly, his faith is counted for righteousness. Euen as Dauid declareth the blessednes of a man, vnto whome God imputeth righteousness without workes.

Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose syns are couered, blessed is the man vnto whom & Lord imputeth not sin.

But to hym which worketh, &c.] He goeth about now to shew, that Abraham could not be iustified by workes, soasmuch as now it is manifest by the holye scriptures, that he had righteousness by imputation. For these thinges are so contrary, that both of them cannot consist at one time. And in that Paul saith: To hym that worketh, & to him that worketh not, we ought not so to vnderstand it, as though they which beleue, worke not. For he speaketh of that working onely, wherby we deserue, or desire to deserue righteousness. And in this place, this is worthy of noting, which among the deuine scholemen is now common: to say that Paul calleth merite, debte. Wherfore sayng Paul here excludeth debte from iustification, he also of necessity taketh away merite, if we will speake properly and truly of it. But now I do so speake of it, not as it is referred vnto the promises of God, but as it is compared with our workes. In summe, Pauls meaning is, that imputation, and debte are utterly repugnant the one to the other. By this place we may very manifestly perceiue, that this is the foundation of the Apostle. But it shal appeare more plainly afterward, where it is said: And if of grace, then not of workes, and contrariwise, if of workes, then not of grace.

In this place are three antitheses or contrary positions. One is, of hym which woorketh, and of hym whiche woorketh not: the seconde, of debte, and of grace: The thirde, of rewarde, and of imputation. Whiche antitheses we oughte by no meanes to lette slippe. And by this place it manifestlye appeareth that the question put forth concerning ceremonies, is entreated of generally. For here the Apostle without any contraction entreateth of him whiche woorketh, and of hym which woorketh not: of grace and of debte: of rewarde, and of imputation of righteousness. Which extend much farther then to ceremonies. For they comprehend all the

the good workes that may be done.

But beleueth in him, which iustifieth the vngodly.] By the vngodly, he vnderstandeth a sinner which is a straunger from God: for impietie is the head of all wickednes. And where as God is said, to iustifie the vngodly, it is not so to be vnderstand, so long as he abideth vngodly: or as though God should accepte wicked actes for good, or shoulde pronounce them iuste. For that he forbad in the law: also pronounced y he wil neuer at any tyme so do. But he is sayd to iustify y vngodly, bicause he forgeueth him his sinnes, and of an vngodly person maketh him godlye. Hitherto we haue heard, that Abraham was iustified by faith. And moreover, that his righteousness consisted in imputation. Now followeth, Euen as Dauid declareth the righteousness of a man vnto whome GOD imputeth righteousness wythout workes.] By these wordes also it is manifest, that by workes are generally vnderstande all good actes, and not onely ceremonies. Whiche thyng the Antithesis dothe well declare. For when he had sayd, that we haue blessednes without works, he opposeth and setteth vnto them as contrary, sinnes and iniquities, whiche in iustification are forgeuen. But iniquities and sinnes haue not place onely in ceremonies. And that in this place hee allegeth Dauid, it serueth very much to his purpose. For Dauid was endued with many good workes, eue as was Abraham. And yet he thought he could not be iustified by them: but onely for that that his sinnes were forgeuen hym. And by this testimony of the Scripture, it appeareth, that iustification and blessednes are one and the self same thyng. Otherwise the conclusion should not be strong. And vndoubtedly iustification, if a man rightly consider it, is nothing els, then a felicitie begon. And Dauid testifieth, that this blessednes or iustification, doth not onely herein consist, that sinnes should not be imputed, but also to expresse that thyng more playnly, he sayth it consisteth herein, that sinnes should be forgeuen. And hee whiche is in hym self assured, that iustification is the remission of sinnes, the same man I say shall easily vnderstand, that we byng not good works vnto God, that by the working and merite of them he should iustify vs, but rather that we byng sinnes vnto hym, to be pardoned. Basilias expresthly sheweth, that the workes, whiche we do, whylest we are strangers from God, can not please hym. He of purpose demaundeth that question in his second booke De Baptismo, the seuenth question, and byngeth this sentence of the Prophet: A sinner whiche sacrificeth vnto me a calfe, is like vnto hym whiche killeth a dogge: and whiche offreth fine swete cakes, like vnto him whiche offreth the blond of swyne. But no man doubteth, but that the workes, whiche we worke, are in a sorte sacrifices. Wherefore if sinners offer them vnto the Lord, they are displeasent vnto hym. He addeth also an other reason: He whiche worketh sinne, is the seruant of sinne, because when we be seruants vnto sinne, it suffreth vs not to do any thing that is acceptable vnto God. Lastly hee maketh thys reason, that Christ said, No man can serue two masters: neither is it by any meanes possible, that we should serue both Mammon and God. Whereupon hee concludeth: that it is not possible that the wycked shoulde do good workes. Wherefore the workes of preparation whiche our aduersaries sayne, are are utterly excluded. Augustine interpretynge the 31. Psalm, sayth: That sinnes to be couered, is nothing els, then that God will not consider them. And if (sayth he) hee consider them not, then will he not punish them. Wherefore sinnes are sayd to be couered before God, because God will not punish them: They ought not so to be vnderstand to be couered, as though they were ouer couered, and yet neuertheles remayne liuing in vs. Their bonde and guiltines, whereby punishment was due vnto vs, is by forgeuenes taken away. And for this thing the Prophet prayed when hee sayd: Turne away thy face from my sinnes. When Dauid made this Psalm, hee was sicke, and was troubled with a greuous disease. For he maketh mention that his bones were withered away, and that he felt the hand of God heauy vpon him, and that the moistnes of his body was in a maner all dyled by: and manye other such like thinges. Wherefore being by the disease admonished of his sinnes and of the wrath of God, he brast forth into these wordes: by which hee testified

This reason of Paul is vniuersall.

Vngodliness the head of all wicked actes.

What it is to iustify the vngodly.

This also is a general reason.

Why he vnderstandeth the testimony of Dauid. Iustification and blessednes are taken for one and the self same thing. Iustification is felicitie begon. Basilias affirmeth that the thinges which are done before iustification, are sinnes.

Ambrose
saith we are saith onely.

those to be blessed, whose sinnes God had forgiven. And he taketh blessednes, for iustification. For iustification as we have sayde, is a blessednes begun. For sinns are onely a let, that we are not now already blessed: which whē they shall vtterly be taken away, they shall no more hinder blessednes. But men, though they be neuer so good and holy, yet so long as they lyue here, are not vtterly without sinne. Therefore they alwayes aspire vnto blessednes, that is, vnto the forgiveness of sinnes. Wherefore in that selfe same Psalm it is afterward added. For this, shall every one that is holy pray vnto thee. Which thing our Saviour also hath taught vs. For in the prayer which he made, which euen the best and most holye oughte to saye, he commaunded vs to saye, Forgive vs our trespasses. And they which pray for other thinges, and make not mention of this, let them take hede, that thyng happen not vnto them, which happened vnto that Pharisey, whom Luke sheweth to haue praid after this maner: I geue thee thanks O God, that I am not as other men are, &c. And for that cause (saith Christ) he departed not home to his house iustified, because he reherfed before God his good woorkes onely. But contrariwise, the Publicane acknowledging his misery, durst scarcely lift vp his eyes vnto heauen. And so being vtterly dejected in mynd: he said, Lord be mercifull vnto me a sinner. And by this confession he acknowledged that he brought nothing vnto God but sinnes, and therefore prayed, that they might be forgiven him. He (saith Christ) returned home iustified. Where as David here, as the Apostle citeth hym, maketh no mention of good woorkes, yet some will obtrude it vnto vs out of these things which follow. And in his spirite is no guile. But vnto these mē August. very well aunswereth, In him (saith he) there is no guile, which as he is a sinner, so acknowledgeth himselfe to be: and when he seeth himselfe vitiated with euill woorkes, dissembleth them not, but manifestly confesseth them. Therefore it is added in the selfe same psalme: I haue said, I will confesse mine owne iniquitie agaynst my selfe. But yet againe suche whyche woulde so fayne weaken thys reasonyng of Paule, obiecte vnto vs, that there is bled the figure Synecdoche, so that wyth those thynges which Dauid letteth forth, wee shoulde also ioyne good woorkes to iustifye. And to make their sentence of the more credite, they gather other testimonies out of Dauid, in which blessednes is also attributed vnto woorkes: as, Blessed are the immaculate, which walke in the law of the Lorde: Blessed is the man which feareth the Lorde: Blessed is the man, which hath not gone in the counsels of the vngodly: and many other such like places, in which they say, that blessednes is as expessedly ascribed vnto woorkes, as it is in that place, which Paul now citeth, vnto the remission of sinnes. But soasmuch as these men do recite againe the same argument in a manner, which we haue a little before dissolued, they shall also haue euen the selfe same answer: Namely, that here is not intreated of that blessednes or felicitie, whiche followeth the first iustification, but here is disputed of the very first and principall iustification. And why we can not here admit the figure Synecdoche, we haue before already shewed: because Paul expessedly affirmeth, that this righteousness cometh without woorkes. And because it should not be said, that he spake these things onely of ceremoniall woorkes of the law, he afterward addeth, that the promise therefore consisteth of grace, that it might be firme, & not wauer: which excludeth not onely ceremonies, but also moztall woorkes. And a little before we reade, soasmuch as iustification is geuen by imputation, it cannot then be of woorkes. And that he confirmed by a generall reason of working, and of, not working: which vndoubtedly extend much farther, then to ceremonies. For we worke no lesse in moztall woorkes, then in ceremoniall woorkes. He said moreover, that they which are iustified, haue wherof to glory before God, as though they had of him obtained righteousness, and not of their woorkes. Whiche reason remoneth from iustification eyther kynde of woorkes both ceremoniall and also moztall. Wherefore we mozte manifestly see, that the figure Synecdoche canne by no meanes stande wyth the reasons of Paul. Ambrose expounding these woordes oftentimes writeth, that we are iustified by faith onely: and he addeth, without labour, and any obseruation. But that which be afterward

afterward addeth, when he interpreteth this sentence of David:

Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven. ] he sayth, Vnto Whome iniquities are forgiven without labor, or any worke: and whose finnes are couered, no worke of repentance being required of them, but only that they should beleue. This his interpretation (I say) if we so vnderstand it, as though repentance were not required with the first sayth, whereby we are iustified, is most absurd. For howe can any man being endued with a true sayth, whereby he shoulde be iustified want repentance, so that he shoulde be nothing sorry for his euill life past? But, if Ambrose vnderstand ether that Ecclesiasticall satisfactions are not required, or els that that repentance, which of necessity followeth sayth, ought indeede to be had, but is not required as a cause of iustification, then sayth he well. Undoubtedly this sentence pleased him so well that he also wrote it before as we haue mencioned, and also vpon the xi. chapter (as we shall afterward see) he repeteth the selfe same. Hereby we see, how warily we must reade the fathers. For they speake many thinges sometymes, which if they be not well vnderstand, can in no case be allowable. Yea and sometymes somethinges escape them, which a man can scarcely interpret soundly: as that which the selfe same Ambrose writeth vpon this place. Wherefore (sayth he) he setteth forth the blessednes of the tyme, wherein Christ was borne: as the Lord himselfe sayth: Many iust men and prophetes desired to see the thinges which ye see, and to heare the thinges which ye heare: and haue not heard, neyther haue they sene. As though euen before the coming of Christ also, God iustified not his after the selfe same maner, that he now iustificieth vs. It is manifest, that this diuersity of tyme is utterly repugnant vnto the meaning of Paul. For he sayth that Abraham was iustified by sayth. Yea and David also, whose testimony this is, felt that he was after the same maner iustified. And y same Ambrose before, wher he expoundeth this place.

But to hym which worketh a reward is not imputed according to grace, but according to debt, thus writeth: It is for certayne, that vnto him which is subiect vnto the lawe of workes, that is, vnto the lawe of Moses, or vnto the lawe of nature, merite is not counted vnto reward, to haue glory before God. For he is debter to do the lawe, for necessity is layde on hym by the law, so that will he or will he, he must do the lawe, least he be condemned. As in an other place he sayth: but they which contemne, do get vnto themselves damnation, because presently they are guilty. But to beleue, or not to beleue, pertaineth to the will. For a man can not be compelled to a thing, which is not manifest, but is thereto allured, and is thereunto perswaded: for it may not be by violence vrged vnto him. But this difference betwene the workes which are commaunded by the lawe of nature and the lawe of Moses and betwene sayth (which Ambrose here putteth) is nothing at all. For by the necessity of the commaundement of God, we are no les bound to beleue, then we are to do good workes. And as to do good workes, is not violently vrged of men agaynst their willes, no more is to beleue also. And as vpon the transgression of the lawe of nature, or of the lawe of Moses dependeth condemnation, so also dependeth it vpon the transgression of sayth. Thus we see, what maner of thinges sometimes we reade in the fathers. I will adde also, how Chrysostome interpreteth this selfe same place.

But to him which worketh a reward is not imputed according to grace, but according to debt. ] Thus he writeth: But this thou wilt say is a greater matter, Not so vndoubtedly. For vnto him that beleueth it is imputed. But it should neuer be imputed, vnles he himselfe also had brought some what with him. &c. Here he sayth that he which is iustified by sayth, bringeth something of himselfe. And that is (as we before noted in his sayings) sayth. And that this is not true he himselfe vpon this place declareth. For he sayth, that this is the principallest thing, that maketh a saythfull man to be notable, namely, that he is by God endued with so much grace, that he is able to shew forth such so great a sayth. In this place he affirmeth, y sayth cometh not of our selues, but of the grace of God. So y before he wrote not so soundly, when he sayd, that we do ether geue, or els bring somewhat, to be iustified, and make God our debter. These thinges I therefore rehearse, that we should not thinke, that the fathers alwayes spake all thinges arighte and constantly: or that out of them we should at all tymes see the true exposition of the scriptures. First we ought out of the very scriptures, soundly to define of doctrines. Then afterward may the fathers be read with iudgement. But that the scriptures should of necessity be subject vnto y<sup>e</sup> expositions of the, it nether can, nor ought to be. For it were absurd, to make subject the iudgements of God vnto the iudgements of men. And seeing they also are oftentimes obscure, and in their expositions diuers, and manifold, this were to depart fro the scriptures which are certayne, to thinges vncertayne. These things I haue spoken by the way, but for our times I hope not vnprofitably. Augustine in the preface of his declaration vpon the 31. Psalm, writeth: *Many boast of woorkes, and a man shall finde manye Paganes or infidels, whiche therefore will not become Christians, because that they suffice themselves with their vpright life. We must of necessity lue well, saith he: and what shall Christ require of me? To lue well? I lue well already. Wherein then shall Christ be needfull vnto me? I committe no murder, nor theft, nor rapine: I desire not other mennes goodes, I am not contaminated with any adultery. For let there be founde any thyng in me that is worthy to be reprobued, and be whiche reprooueth me, let him make me a Christian. This man hath glory but not with God. See how the ignorance of this hidden iustification, whiche is not of woorkes, called men backe from Christian religion. Wherefore at this day also, they that are ignorant of it, and do iustifie themselves by woorkes, are both farre from Christ, and also haue no vnderstanding of the benefite that cometh by him. And in this sentence of Danid, let vs this consider also, that there is no mention made of good woorkes: whiche thing also this worde blessednes geneth vs to vnderstand. For when we attaine to any thing, wherein we haue spent great labour, we are not for that counted very happy. But if we attayne vnto the selfe same thing without labour, and in a maner without any our trauaile, then are we counted happy and blessed.*

Came this blessednes then vpon the circumcision, or vpon the vncircumcision? For we say that fayth was imputed vnto Abraham vnto righteousness. How was it then imputed: when he was Circumcised, or vncircumcised: not when he was circumcised, but when he was vncircumcised. Afterward he receiued the signe of circumcision, the seale of the righteousness of fayth which he had when he was vncircumcised, that he should be the father of all them that be leue, not being circumcised, that righteousness mighte be imputed vnto them also. And the father of circumcision, not vnto them only which are of the circumcision, but to them also that walke in the steppes of the fayth of our father Abraham, which he had when he was vncircumcised.

Came this blessednes then vpon the Circumcision, or vpon the vncircumcision? The Latine interpretation hath this worde Manet, that is, abideth, added to this sentence, which is not in the Greke booke. Neither doth y<sup>e</sup> verbe which the Latines haue, much agree with the phrase which is by the accusative case, and by the Greke preposition ἐν. Rather (as Theophilactus admonisheth, we must vnderstand this verbe ἔσται, which signifieth, lighteth it, or belongeth it, or some such lyke thinge. Neither do I disallow the coniecture of Erasmus, who thinketh that in steade of this verbe Manet, was first writtten Manat, whiche signifieth to come or to spread abrode.

And thus muche as touching the wordes. But this is the meanyng. A man might thinke, that although Danid made no mention of woorkes, when he set forth the blessednes of those, whose sinnes are forgiven, yet because he himselfe was both circumcised, & also vied sacrifices, he thoughte that this forgiveness of sinnes is obtained by these thinges, although he expessed them not. And for that cause Paul sayeth

heth againe the example of Abraham which he at the first bled. And so returneth to the ground and beginning of circumcision, and considereth the very time, where in Abraham received it: and pzoneth, that long time before he was circumcised, he was both iustified, and also pzonounced the father of many nations, that is, of all them which beleue. Whereof it folloiweth, that we without ceremonies and other workes shall by faith be counted iust, and be admitted into the people of God, and placed among the members of Christ. This argument may thus be made more euident. That which yet was not, coulde not bring righteousness vnto Abraham. But when Abraham was pzonounced iustified, circumcision was not yet. Wherefore it could not iustifie Abraham. Let vs in this maner set the order betwene the causes and the effectes. First, God did set forth vnto Abraham his pzonises. Secondly, followed faith: And thirdly, iustification. Lastly, came obedience, which caused him to circumcise himselfe, and to do many other excellent good workes. We may not peruert this order, that by obedience and circumcision whiche are the last effects, we should bring forth iustification which went before. Againe in this place the Apostle teacheth vs, with how great study and diligence the Scriptures are to be read, and the times and moments in stories are thoroughly to be considered. He treateth of circumcision, because all that controuersie sprang first by reason of ceremonies: and because also they had circumcision in no lesse estimation, then we now haue baptisme. For they counted it for a noble worke, and an excellent worship: pyng of God. Wherefore we may inferre or conclude, that if we be not iustified by that kind of workes, wherein consisted the worshipping of God, vndoubtedly much lesse shall we be iustified by other workes. For these are counted more excellent & more acceptable vnto God, then are other workes.

For we say that faith was imputed vnto Abraham vnto righteousness. These wordes serue wonderfully to depresse the pride and hautes of the Iewes: which continually cried, that righteousness could by no meanes stand without circumcision. But Paul contrariwise affirmeth, that it was in Abraham before he was circumcised. For Abraham was as yet vncircumcised, when he was pzonounced iustified. Wherefore it is no meruaile, if many mo of the vncircumcised then of the Iewes were saued after the comming of Christ. Here it semeth that there are set before our eyes two fathers, the one of the vncircumcised, the other of circumcision. And if we more depely consider the matter, we shall see that the father of the vncircumcised is set in the first place. For Abraham was not yet circumcised, when he was of God counted iust. What the is there remainyng for the Iewes, that they should so aduance themselves aboue the Gentiles. Nothing vndoubtedly but the signe. And euē as Abraham is not the father of the vncircumcised for he can e only, because they haue vncircumcision, but because of faith: so also is he not the father of the circumcised, because they are circumcised, but because they beleue. By these things it is manifest, that both circumcision & also vncircumcision are conditions comyng by chance and of theselues helpe nothing to the obtaynement of iustification. Wery aptly doth the Apostle bring in these two men Dauid, and Abraham. Of which the one that is, Dauid, being now circumcised, bare testimony of iustification. And Abraham being not yet circumcised, obtained neuertheles iustification. Wherefore it sufficiently appeareth, that Circumcision is not a meane necessarily required to obtain righteousness.

And he receaued the signe of circumcision. ] He receaued I say circumcision which was a signe.

The seale of the righteousness of fayth. ] This is a prevention, for they which heard these thinges, mought thus haue thought with themselves: If Abraham were iustified before circumcision, then was circumcision superfluous, vnto this objection Paul answereth, saying, that circumcision was not bayne or vnprofitable: for it was the seale of the righteousness of fayth. In this sentence Paul hath two wordes, namely, σημα, that is, a signe, and σφαιδρα, that is, a seale which wordes although they be of very nigh affinitye the one to the other, yet are yet at they not both of one & the selfe same significatio. For this word significatio, that is a sign, is moze general then his word sealatio, & is, a seale. An image is a signe, but it can not be a seale. But we vse to put seales vnto such things, as we wyll haue with greate fidelity kept, and remayne vniolated. And therefore are letters sealed, & letters patentes of princes are confirmed with seales, & no man should doubt of the authoritie or truth of the. So God delinerech vnto vs sacramentes as seales of his promyses. Wherefore circumcision signified two thinges both that euill lusts should be cut of out of the minde and also that the children of Israell should be seperated from other nations. Farther it was the seale of the will and promise of God, which was offered vnto Abraham concerning righteousnes, the remission of sinnes thorough Christ, and the league with God, and a greate many moe such like good thinges. This promise (I say) was sealed with the signe of circumcision. And besides these significations of the sacramentes are two other comodities not to be cotemned. For the thinges which are so marked, are thereby appoynted to be theyrs, who are their owners as in hoeses, oren, & other suche like thinges, the markes and notes, which are burnt in them, declare vnto whome they pertaine. So the Sacramentes when they are receaued do beare witness that we belong vnto God. Farther such outward notes declare, of what value and estimation the thinge that is sealed ought to be counted, as it is manifest in copnes of gold, and also in hoeses. For the best and excellent hoeses, are marked with one marke, and dull yades with an other marke. Farthermoze, the sacramentes which God hath commended vnto vs, declare how much God setteth by vs. For the notes and markes of circumcision and of other sacramentes are as it were admonishers of the will and promyses of God. For so much as we are weake, neyther do we easily beleue the promyses of God, it was nedefull that his good will towardes vs shoulde not only be signified by wordes, but also shoulde be sealed by thinges which might be offered to our senses. Wherefore Augustine very aptly sayth, that the Sacramentes are visible wordes. And Chrysostome vpon this place writeth, that circumcision preached righteousnes. Wherefore God would that we should both haue his wordes in the holy scriptures, which shoulde be set forth vnto vs, whillett the miseries were in doing, and also that vnto them shoulde outwardly be added visible notes: that we might the moze firmly resist, if at any tyme the minde shoulde beginne to doubt. By these thinges it is manifest, how they are deceaued, which thinke that by the power of the action, or (as they vse to speake) by the worke wrought, the sacramentes bring saluation. Andoubtedly, euen as the wordes of the scripture nothing profit without fayth, so also nothing profit the sacramentes, vnlesse fayth be present. Neither is that opinion to be allowed (whereof Augustine in his booke De civitate dei, maketh mention) namely, that they can not be damned, which haue once receaued the sacraments of Christ. I thinke there is scarce any place in the holy scriptures, wherein is so briefly and so expressedly set forth the nature of the sacramentes, as in these wordes of Paul, wherein circumcision is called, a seale. And to the ende we shoulde vnderstand, that it is not the seale of euery thinge, there is added, of righteousnes, that is, of the forgiveness of sinnes, which pertaineth vnto the will of God. Lastly he addeth, of fayth to geue vs to vnderstand, what manner of thinge that is, whereby we may take hold of that righteousnes. And that is fayth. Wherefore euery man may see how much they are deceaued, which thinke the sacramentes to be but onely markes and notes of religion, whereby men may knowe one another. For so shoulde they attribute no moze vnto sacramentes, then vnto garments, or colour, whereby families and seates are discerned one from another. Neither is this sufficiente which others say, which thinke, that in sacramentes are shewed forth the signes only and professions of those thinges and actions which are required of vs, which are initiated into Christ: so that circumcision they make to signifie the mortifying of wicked affection: and baptisme to signifie that we must must stoutely and with a valiant courage suffer losses, injuries & adversities: because in it is signified, that we are crucified and buried together with Christ. And that the supper of the Lord is only a signe of Christian beneuolence, & of duties of mutuell charity. We deny not but that all these things are in the sacramentes. But the hebd and summe of theyr signification we say consisteth herein, that they seale vnto vs the giftes and promises of God, which he offereth vnto vs to be taken holde of by fayth. The Greeke Scholies haue in this place most expessedly put, that Circumcision was for thre causes gotten: that it should be a signe of fayth and of righteousness: that it should sepearate the kyn-dred of Abraham from other nations: and that it should be a note and manifest token of a pure and undefiled conuersation. This place most manifestly declar-eth y<sup>e</sup> which Augustine writeth to Bonifacius: namely, that Sacraments haue the names of those things which they signifie. And that thing he proueth by many similitudes: amongst which he maketh mention also of the Eucharist, because we call it the body of Christ, when as it is only the sacrament thereof. And wee also teache, that the bread in the holy misteryes is therfore the body of Christ, because it is the signe thereof. These things some cannot abide. But they ought to remember, that in the booke of Genesis, Circumcision is called the couenaunt of the Lord: which is nothing els, then the promise of righteousness, and of the forgiveness of sinnes throughe Christ. And this couenaunt the Lord commaun- ded that the Jewes shoulde carpe aboute with them in theyr fleshe. That thing Paul now expoundeth, namely, that it was the signe of that righteousness and couenaunt. Wherefore it manifestly appeareth, that this kind of interpretation which we vse, was brought in by the Apostle, and that to follow those interpre- tations is nothing els then to follow the steps of the Apostles. If thou demaund, that for as much as we haue remissio of sinnes, & haue by fayth obtayned righ- teousnes, what commoditie then bringe the sacramentes vnto vs, we answer, very much: for that they offer themselves before our eyes, and so doe admonish vs. For our fayth is stirred vp, not indeede by them, but by the power of the holy ghoost, who bleth this instrument of the sacraments enen as he doth the instru- ment of the word which is preached. And faith being stirred vp, more and more embraileth righteousness and remission of sinnes. For these things are not in ato- mo, or in an indissoluble point, but they haue in them some breadth. For if sinne were in this life perfectly remoued from vs, we shoulde neuer sinne any more. But many euilles oftentimes offer them selues vnto vs, which haue nede of for- geuenes and remission. So, although we be regenerated and renewed, yet there neuer wanteth in vs somewhat, which must be regenerated and renewed. And to make this the playner, I will bringe this similitude. That which is most perfect white, hath mixed with it no blacknes or darknes at all. But our righteousness hath mixed to it much vnpurites & vncleannes, which must nedes be made cleane. Wherefore in the resurrection we shall haue a perfect and absolute regeneratio. And therfore Christ called the resurrection by that name, when he sayd vnto his Apostles, that they should sit in the Regeneration upon xij. seater, and iudge the twelve tribes of Israel. For that selfe same cause Paul, when he was alreedy infir- med, was commaunded to be baptised. And Abraham, of whom we now speake, af- ter that righteousness was imputed vnto him, was commaunded to be circum- cised, and that not in vayne, but for that cause which we haue alreedy declared. Now the matter moueth or rather requirerh vs, somewhat to speake of circum- cision. But because we can certaynely affirme nothing touching it vnles we thoroughlye knowe the nature of sacramentes, therfore I thoughte it beste, first to declare what in my iudgement is to be thought of them in generall.

The word which signifieth a sacrament is in Hebrewe Sod, & Razi. The syll of these wordes is common vnto all secretes and hid thinges, and is more in vse. And the other Esay vsed in the 24. chapter: where he sayd, Razi li, Razi li, that is, A secret vnto me, a secret vnto me. Daniel also in his 2. chapter, when he entreateeth of the knowledge of the mystery, vnto the selfe same worde. Such is the nature and condition of sacramentes, that they contayne thinges hidde, vnto some indeede knowen, but not vnto all. And from this Etimology, the Greeke worde μυστήριον, differeth not much, which is deriued of μύς and τέριον μυστήριον μύς. That is, we ought diligently to kepe thinges close inwardly. Of that maner were the misteries of Ceres of Eleusis in the countrey of Athens, which were opened vnto none, but vnto those, that were initiated. And they are called μυστήρια, which haue these thinges sealed and shut vp in them. Chrysostome, when he interpreteth the xi. chapter of this epistle where Paul sayth, that he writeth a mystery of the Israelites partly blinded and partly to be restored, sayth: that a mystery signifieth a thing vnknown, and vnspokeable, and which hath in it much admiration, and which is aboue our opinion. The same father, when he interpre-teth the second chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians, where we reade, We speake wisdom in a mystery, thus writeth: It should be no diuine or perfect mystery, if thou shouldest adde any thing of thy selfe. By which words it is manifest, how much they are to be blamed, which at their owne pleasure and iudgement make sacramentes, and from those which Christ himselfe hath ordained plucke away what pleaseth them. These wordes of Chrysostome do manifestly reprove them.

Neyther let them thinke, that this any thing helpeth theyr case, to say that he speakerh of that mystery which is found in the holy scriptures, vnto which he sayth nothinge is to be added, neyther any thinge to be taken awaye from it.
Forasmuch as the sacramentes, wherof we entreate, are of no lesse wayght, then the holy scripture it selfe. For they (as Augustine very aptly sayth) are the visible wordes of God. Farther, Chrysostome, expounding the place before allead-ged, sayth, that we in the sacramentes see one thing, beleue an other thing, behold with our sence one thinge, vnderstand in our mynde an other thinge. Whereof it followeth, that all are not after one and the selfe same maner affected towards these misteries.
For an insidell when he heareth, that Iesus Christ was crucified, thinketh it to be a thing foolish, and of no valew. But the saythfull man acknowledgeth in that mystery the exceding great power and wisdom of God. If an Ethnike beare, that Christ was rayssed vp from the dead, he will thinke it to be a fable. But a Christian will not only beleue, that so, but also will not doubt, but that he himselfe, as a member of Christ, shall one day be rayssed vp from the dead. Chrysostome commeth afterwarde to the visible sacrament, and sayth: If an insidell see baptisme, he will iudge that there is but water onely. But the saythfull beboldeth the washing of the soule by the blood of Christ. And in the Eucharist, by the senses is knowne onely the bread and the wine. But the belouers referre their myndes vnto the body of Christ. Hereunto be applyeth a similitude of a booke: For if an vnlearned & rude man that can not reade a word should light vpo a booke, he can only behold & wonder at the prikes, figures, & colours: but the sence and vnderstanding of them he can not find out: but he which is learned, learneth out of it, ether histories, or other thinges worthy to be knowen and pleasant. Now that we haue declared the interpretacion of the Greeke and Hebzeue name, there resteth, that we speake somewhat of the latine word. Among the elders sacramentum, that is, a sacrament signified a bond which passed by an othe. Wherefore we are accustomed to say, Sacramentum cum aliquo contendere, that is, by an othe to contend wyth a man, and Sacramentum militare, that is, an othe which a man taketh, when he goeth to warfare. And peradventure these our misteryes are therefore caliled sacramentes, because in them God byndeth himselfe with conuantes and promises being after a sort sealed, and we on the other side binde our selues vnto him. Wherefore we entreate not of a mystery or sacrament generally, wher-by is signified (as Chrysostome sayth) any thing that is vnknown, and vnspoke-able, which hath in it much admiration, and is aboue our opinion. For after that maner, there are an infinite number of sacramentes. For so may we call sacramentes, the natiuity of Christ, his resurrection, the Gospel, the blinding of the Iewes, the calling of the Gentles, and many other thinges. But we speake so of sacramentes, as Paul now speakerh of circumcision. Now because we haue

hane sufficiently spokē of the word; we will adde the definition of a sacrament, and this definition is most receaued. A sacrament is a visible forme, or a visible signe of an inuisible grace. And that is called a signe, which besides the forme which it offreth vnto the seyles, bringeth some other thing into our knowledge. And a signe (as Augustine writeth, and the master of the sentences affirmeth) is deuided into a naturall signe, and a signe geuen. Smoke is a naturall signe of fyre, and clondes, a naturall signe of rayne. But a signe geuen, and appoynted of the will, is diuers, as letters, wordes, gestures, bekes, and many such like. And these signes may pertaine to diuers and sondry senses. But the things that are signified, are eyther thinges past, thinges present, or thinges to come. The tables of the lawe, the Manna, & the rodde of Aaron, which were kept, signified thinges past. For God would haue these thinges to remayne as certayne monumentes of thinges past. Other signes betoke thinges to come, as the rayne bow in the clondes, which was geuen in the tyme of Noe, the fiele of Gedeon, and the shadow of the Sunne, which in the tyme of Ezechias the king went backward. Sometimes are signified thinges present, as in the garments of the priestes, in the apparell of the Leuites, in the ornamētes of magistrates, and in the miracles of Christ. For all these signified the present power of God. Our sacramentes are visible signes, not in dede of theyr owne nature, but geuen vnto vs by the will of God: and they pertaine to many senses. For the wordes which are set forth in the sacramentes, are receaued with the eares: but the notes and outward simboles are perceaued eyther by sight, or feeling, or smelling, or tastig, and they demonstrate both thinges present, thinges past, and thinges to come: for the death of Christ is represented in them, which is now past: and the promise and gift of God, which in the mynde and by sayth is presently embraced: and the purenes of lyfe and mortification, and duties of charity, which are afterward to be perfozmed of vs. By those thinges it is manifest, what maner of signes we put to be sacramentes. But it may seme to be sufficiēt to take that definition which Paul here useth, namely, to say, that sacramentes are opaydis, that is, sealinges of the righteousnes of sayth. For they seale the promises, by which, so that sayth be adioyned vnto them, we are iustified. If a man demaund, what it is that God promiseth vnto vs, to answer briefly, it is, that he will be our God: which thing where it taketh place, saueh vs, & maketh vs blessed & happy. This is the promise, which is by diuers outward simboles sealed in the sacramentes. Which thing we haue in the boke of Genesis the 17. chapter, where circumcision is geuen, whereby was confirmed the couenant made betwene God and Abraham. The summe of that promise was (as we haue sayd) that God would be his God, and the God of his seede. Which selfe same thing Jeremy also testifieth of the new couenant of the Gospell: where he sayth, that the lawes shoulde not only be written in the bowelles and hartes of the beleuers: but also that God would be vnto them theyr God, and they agayne on the other side, shoulde be vnto hym, his people. That also we well allowe, which is commonly sayd, that the sacramentes consist of two thinges: namely, of outward signes, which the scholemen count for the matter, and of the thing signified. Which is chiefly expessed by the wordes adioyned vnto the simboles: out of which we may gather the forme. Which is not so to be vnderstand as though those thinges which are signified, are bound to the outward signes, or lye hidden vnder them: otherwise as many as shoulde receaue the outward elementes, shoulde together therewithall receaue the thinges signified. And it is necessary, that betwene the signe and the thing signified there be kept some analogy, that is proportion and conueniency. For if signes had no similitude with those thinges that are signified, then shoulde they not be signes of them. And yet notwithstanding wyth this conforinity is styll to be kept a diuersity betwene that which is signified, and those thinges whiche signifye. Whiche thinge Augustine moste manifestly teacheth agaynst Maximus the Arrian

In hys 3 booke, where he sayth, that Sacraments are one thing, & signify an other thing. Wherby oftentimes it cometh to passe, that these things which are attributed vnto the signes, agree in no case with the nature of them, but onely are to be referred vnto the things by them signified. And he citeth a place out of the epistle of Iohn, where this thing is manifestly shewed. For he saith y there are three things which bear witnes, bloud, water, and the spirite: and these three (saith he) are one. This can by no meanes be true, if we haue a consideration to the nature of bloud, water, and the spirite. For these things are not one (as they vse to speake) in essence, or in kinde. But this verily agreeth with the father, the sonne, and the holy ghost which are the thing signified. And that thing which Augustine here writeth, may we easily perceiue in the sacraments which we now entreate of, in which, the properties of the signes, and of the thing of the sacrament are put one for an other. Now that I haue sufficiently spoken of the name and definition, and also of the matter and forme of the sacraments, there resteth to speake of the finall and efficient cause of them. The ende for which the sacraments were instituted, is, that our mynde being admonished by the senses might be stirred vp, and by faith take holde of the promises of God, and so be inflamed with a desire to attaine vnto them. For we see, y signes tend to no other ende, but to transference and to imprint those things which we our selues haue in our mindes, into the minde of an other man: that therby he may be made the more certaine of our meaning and will. And this is not commonly done, but in matters of great weight. For if they be but light matters, we are not accustomed to confirme them with signes. But in things of great importance, they are commonly bled: As when princes are consecrated, when matrimonies are contracted, when bargainings & gifts, or other such like couenants of great waight are made. For we desire to haue them to the vttermost witnessed, and to be knowne not only by reason, but also by the senses. But there can be no other efficient cause of the sacramentes geuen, but either God, or our Lord Iesus Christ, who also is verily God: and of them ought we to haue an euident testimony out of the holy scriptures. Which thing is most plainly declared by the definition, which we haue now set forth. For thus we defined them, namelye, that sacramentes are signes, not in dede naturall, but appointed, & that by the will of God. And this his will can not be made known vnto vs, but onely out of y holy scriptures. And therefore it is no hard matter to know how many they are in number in the new Testament. We see, y Christ instituted Baptisme, and the Eucharist: but the other sacramentes, which the schole deuines set forth, can not by the worde of God be proued to be sacraments. We speake not this, as though we deny that matrimony is to be had in reuerence, or that the ordinations of ministers is to be retained still, or that penance is to be done: although we reiect auricular confession, and other the abuses thereof, & deny it to be a sacrament, otherwise euen we also do highly esteeme these things, but not as sacraments. Neither dislike we with that confirmation, whereby children when they come to age should be compelled to confesse their faith in y church, and by outward profession to approue that whiche was done in Baptisme when they vnderstode nothing: but yet in such sort, that of such an action we frame not a sacrament. But as touching extreme vntion, it is manifest, y it nothing pertayneth vnto vs: especially seing it had no longer any force, then whilst the gifts of healings were extant in the Church. And forasmuch as those giftes are now long since taken away, it were absurde to kepe still the bayne signe thereof. Neither also dyd Christ commaund that this vntion should perpetually be vsed in the church. But those other things which we before spake of, although they may still be wyth profite retained, yet are they not properly sacramentes. eyther bicause they haue not outward signes: or els bicause they want manifest wordes of promises, which should by a visibill signe be sealed: or els bicause there is no commandement of God extant wherby we are bound to obserue these thinges. Basilus in his booke de spiritu sancto, where he reckneth by the traditions of the church, maketh mencion of y signe of the crosse, wherwith we ought to defend our selues: and that adorations vpon the

the Sunday, and from the resurrection vnto the feast of Pentecost ought to be done standing vpright. Amongst others also he reckoneth holy vntion. Whereby we see, y<sup>e</sup> this father held not, that this vntion is had out of the holy scriptures, which thing our aduersaries rashly do. Farther by his wordes we gather, of how great waighe it is, when as it is put amongst the number of those things, which haue now long since growen out of vse. Now let vs see what be the effectes of the sacraments. The maister of the sentences, in the 4. booke in the first dist. putteth thre effectes of the sacramentes. For he would that as men for pleasure sake haue made themselves subiect vnto thinges sensible and inferiour vnto themselves, so now they should for piety sake do the same, that of a certaine modesty, or (as they speake) humilitie, they should suffer themselves to be made subiect vnto these visibill signes of the sacraments. But herein he far erreth. For by the sacraments we are not made subiect vnto creatures, neither ought we to worship them. Onely the mind is there erected vnto God, that man may be restored vnto his olde dignitie. For he is set to be aboue all things which are sene, and not to be subiect vnto them. The second effect he putteth, to be erudition, that by the outward signes we should be instructed of things heauenly. Which thing we also vndoubtedly affirme. Lastly he sayth, that therfore they were instituted, that we should not be idle, but be profitably exercised in true ceremonies, casting away superstitions. But this, vnles it be declared, is not very plaine. For we are sufficiently occupied in beleuing, praying, readyng of the word of God, and doing good to our neighbours. But outward ceremonies although they be instituted of God, yet without faith they nothing profit. Wherefore the exercising of them doth not of it selfe please God. Howbeit if faith be present, superstitions can take no place, for that it hath alwayes a regard vnto the worde of God. Wherefore after this maner they may be called exercises of faith and of pietie, and be counted acceptable vnto God. But we will after a better sorte set forth these effectes of the sacraments. First, we say that they instruct vs, which thing is alreedy said: Secondly, that they kindle in vs sayth, & a desire of y<sup>e</sup> promises of God: Thirdly, that they knit vs together in a streighter bond of charity, for that we are all initiated with one and the selfe same mysteries. And to these may two other effects also be added. For by the sacraments, we are both seperated from other sects, & also are admonished to lead an holy life. But touching grace, whither it be conferred by the sacraments or no, we shall afterward see. These things being thus orde- red, there are two thinges which are contrary and repugnant vnto the nature of the sacraments. The first is, if we attribute to much vnto them. For by y<sup>e</sup> meanes is easely brought in idolatry: when as that which belongeth vnto God onely, is ascribed vnto a creature. And if at any time the sacraments are sayd, either to saue or to remit sinnes, or any such like thing, the same ought to be vnderstand of the thing signified and not of the signes. For these thinges onely procede of the promise and liberality of God, whiche is sealed vnto vs by visibill signes. And oftentimes it happeneth, that both the scriptures and y<sup>e</sup> fathers seme to attribute vnto y<sup>e</sup> signes, those things which only belong vnto the promises. But now they which after this maner attribute more the is mete vnto y<sup>e</sup> sacraments, may be called sacramentaries, because they put to much affiaice in the. The other thing which we said is repugnant vnto the nature of the sacraments, is, when we count them to be nothing but bare & naked signes. For by that meanes they shuld nothing differ from Tragicall and Comickall significations, and from colours and garments. Neither are they only signes of our actions, but also of the promise and of the will of God, and are sealinges therof. And the holy ghost doth no les vse these signes to stirre vpon our hartes, then he vseth the wordes of God which are in the holy scriptures. And hereby also we may see, that they likewise are agaynst the sacraments, which will haue them to be sacrifices. For the nature of a sacrifice is, to be offered of vs vnto God: but the nature of a sacrament is, to be offered of God vnto vs. I confesse indeed, that in the celebracion of the supper of the Lord are contayned thanksgouing, almes, prayers, and other such like thinges: which may haue the consideration of a sacrifice. But we deny, that the very sacrament of the Eucharist may properly be called a sacrifice. And much les is that to bee borne with all, which the sacrificing priests make theyr boast of, that they offer vp vnto God, the body of Christ. Our lord hath offered by himselfe, nether hath he nede of any other to offer him vp. Now that we haue well considered all these thinges, we nede not manye wordes to expresse the instrument, whereby the thing of the sacrament is receaued. For, Paul hath most manifestly declared it, when he sayd, that Circumcisio is the seale of the righteousness of sayth. For it is sayth wherby y righteousness, which is signified in y sacrament, is receaued of vs: for nether can our sense v3 reason therunto attayne. And Augustine, expounding these wordes of Iohn, Now ye are cleane by cause of my word. sayth: that in that the sacraments doo make vs cleane, they haue it of the word of God. For if thou take away (sayth he) from the element the word, there will nothing remayne but water only. The word commeth vnto the element, and it is made a sacrament. For how commeth it (sayth he) that the water toucheth the body, & washeth the hart? He answereth: that the same commeth to passe thorough the force and power of the word, not by cause it is spoken, but by cause it is beleued. By these thinges it is manifest that sayth is it, whereby we receaue cleansing and sanctification. which thing also is w3ritten in the Actes of the Apostles: By sayth purifying theyr harts. And Paul to the Ephesians sayth, that Christ loued the Church, and cleansed it with the lauacre of water. But there is added, In the word, that is, by the word: which (as Augustine sayth) is vnderstand to be done, by cause it is beleued, and not by cause it is spoken. For by the pronounciation of the wordes, are neither changed the natures of the signes, nor the benefites of God geuen: for so it mought seme an enchantment. Sayth (I say) is the instrument, wherby we receaue the wordes of God, and let them downe into our mindes. But now touching the maner of administering the sacraments, there ought none other maner to be brought in, then that which Christ himselfe the author of the sacramentes hath commended vnto vs. For if the Jewes durst not deale otherwise in the ceremonies of the old law, the was prescribed the of God: much moze ought we to obserue those ceremonies, which Christ hath prescribed vnto vs, after the selfe same maner that he hath prescribed them. Farther so, as much as those signes came from the wil of God, and of theyr own nature signifie nothing, what is moze reasonable then to referre all thinges vnto his wil, which hath geuen them. But his will can by no other wayes be knowen, but by y holy scriptures, And vndoubtedly no mā will presume to alter the letters patents of kings graunts: much moze ought y same thing to be take hede of in y sacramentes of God. And the minister by whome these thinges ought to be exercised and distributed (although he be conuenient, that he be godly and of an honest lyfe, for such a one is to be maintayned and when he behaueth himselfe otherwise, and is knowen so to be, he ought no longer to be suffered) yet though he be wicked, so long as he kepeth still that funcio, he can not vitiate the sacraments, so that he doo those thinges which Christ hath commaunded to be done. Augustine hath a very trime similitude, of a pipe of stone, through which water is brought into a garden. For although the pipe be made nothing the moze fertile by meanes of the running through of the water, yet is the garden by it watered, and made fruitfull. The dignity of the sacramentes dependeth not of the minister, but of the institution of God: which thing the donatistes not vnderstanding, rayled by much tumults agaynst the Church. That is true which is commonly sayd of liuing creatures, that by a dried by member the spirite of life can haue no passage into the other member. For if the arme be dead and withered by, the life and spirite can not come vnto the hand. But in the Church, there is no suche greate coniunction betwene menne. For the power of the sacraments is to vs as the light of the Sonne: which light although it bee disperfed through vile and filchy places, yet is it not therfore contaminated or infected. But the times of the sacramentes may be deuided into two partes. For some were were before the coming of Christ, and some after. And these differ the one from the other, by outward notes and signes. Neither was that done rashly or without great consideration. For we also (as sayth Augustine) do after one sort signify things to be done, and after another sorte affirme things already done. Which thing these two wordes now pronounced sufficiently declare. But here are two errors to be taken heed of us, as the same father against Faustus very well admonisheth us. First, that we thinke not, that though the signes be changed, therefore the things also are diverse: that so much as the thing is one and the selfe same, therefore the signes ought not, nor can not be changed. For if an householder may commaunde straighter things unto those seruantes, to whom he knoweth it expedient to be more straightly kept under: and may laye easier burdens upon theyr neckes, whom he will count as his children: why then may not God do the same towardes men. Physicians also be according to the diuersity of the diseases of the sicke persons, to minister diuers and sondry medicines: of all which medicines yet the force is one & the same, namely, to restore health. But whether the signes of the old Testament haue now utterly ceased or no, Augustine answereth in his booke de vera religione, that they remaine by interpretation and faith, but are in very dede taken away. But as touching the things themselves, the things which were set forth unto the elders in their sacraments, & which are set forth unto us in our sacraments, were one & the same. And if thou demand, what were those things which were common unto the fathers and unto us, it may in fewe wordes be answered, God, Christ, reconciliation, Grace, Remission of sinnes, and such other like things. These things were in tymes past signified, and set forth to be beleued in the sacramentes of the elders: and the selfe same, are in our tyme signified in the new Testament, and set forth in our sacramentes. But the signes and symbols, which the fathers used, were changed by the coming of Christ: at whose second coming also, those likewise which we now haue, shall be taken away. For when we haue once the fruition of that chiefe felicity which we wayte for, we shall then neede no sacramentes. Farther besides the alteration of the signes, are also out of Augustine gathered some other conditions, whereby is declared, that our sacramentes are more excellent then were the sacramentes of the elders. For ours (sayth he) are in power greater, in profit better, in acte, easier: in number fewer, in vnderstanding most full of maiesty, in obseruation most pure, and in signification most excellent. Those things indeede are greater, but yet they alter not the nature of the things signified. Neither cause they, but that our sacramentes and the sacraments of the elders, are as touching the substance one and the same. Paul in his epistle vnto the Romanes, sayth, that the Jewes as vnprofitable branches were cut of from the holy tree, and we grafted into theyr place. And the roote (sayth he) carrieth thee, and not thou the roote. whereby it is manifest, that both we & the fathers, as touching the substance of saluation, are in one and the same stocke, and in one and the same roote. Therefore the better and worthier part of the sacraments, is one and the selfe same. And whatsoever difference there is betwene us & them, the same consisteth wholly in the coming of Christ, past, and to come. Wherefore Augustine against Faustus sayth, that our sacramentes are signes of things now fulfilled, but the sacramentes of the elders were signes of things which were to be fulfilled. And vpon the 6. chapter of Iohn he sayth, that in signes, they were diuers from ours, but in signification of things, like. I know in dede, and I remember that the fathers are wont som tymes aboue measure to extenuate the sacramentes of the elders. Chrysostome in hys 27. homely vpon Genesis denieth, that circumcision any thing profited vnto saluation: but that the Israelites caried it about with them, as a token of gratitude and as a signe and a seale, to the ende they should not be contaminated by mingling themselves with other nations. And in his 39. homely he sayth: that it was a byole and a payer of fetters vnto the Jewes that they should not mingle themselves with other nations. And

Of sacraments some were before the coming of Christ and some after. The sacraments of the elders & our sacramentes are aptly distinguished by signes. Two errors to be eschewed in the sacramentes. A similitude. In other similitude how the signes of the elders are taken away and how they abide. What are the things of the sacrament. By the second coming of Christ shall our signes be taken away. Our sacraments more excellent then the sacraments of the elders. The nature of the things signified is one and the same. We and the Jewes in the old time haue one & the same stocke and one and the same roote. The diuersity of tymes distinguisheth them. The fathers extenuate the sacraments of the elders.

he affirmeth that God commaunded it vnto Abraham, and vnto his posterity, that by an outward signe he myght declare, that he was the possessor of hym. And for that cause he changed his name. For so do we also, when we take into our possession a beast or a bondman. For we geue vnto them a name, and we marke them with our signe or marke. And vpon the same booke in the 40. booke, he sayth, that the Jewes by circumcision were knowen. And hereunto may be added Ambrose, expounding this selfe same place which we are now in hand with. For he declareth, that circumcision did only put a difference betwene the posterity of Abraham and other nations. Whiche they do not euery where speake after one manner. For the same Ambrose when he expoundeth that place in the 10. chapter of the first to the Corinthians. That the elders were baptised in the sea, sayth that they sinnes were not imputed, and that they were without doubt purified. These thinges are of much more excellency then to be seperated, or to differ from other nations. And Augustine agaynst Faustus in hys 12 booke and 29 chapter, expressedly sayth, that the sea and the cloude was baptisme consecrated in the blood of Christe, and by them the sinnes of the Jewes were forgiven: all which thinges are common with our sacramentes. Farther all the scholl deuines hold, that circumcision was a remedy agaynst original sinne wherby we may perceiue, that they hold not, that circumcision was a bare and bayne signe. There may also for profe hereof be brought places of the scripture, which teach the selfe same thing. For in the 10. chapter of the first epistle vnto the Cor. the elders are sayde to haue bene baptised, and to haue eaten the selfe same spirituall meate, and to haue dronke the selfe same drinke, which we at this day eate and drinke. And agayn in the 2. chapter to the Colossians he sayth, that we are circumcised with circumcision not made with handes: And he addeth, By the washing away of the sinnes of the fleshe: where he declareth, that in the signe of circumcision, was through Christ geuen the washing away of sinnes. And in the booke of Genesis the 17. chapter is most manifestly declared, that circumcision was the signe of the couenant, wherein God promised, that he woulde be the God both of Abraham and of hys seede. But agaynst those thinges, whiche haue bene spoken, is objected vnto vs out of the 10. chapter of the first to the Corinthians, that Paul there affirmeth not, that the sacramentes of the elders were one and the same with ours: but only writeth thys, that the elders had one and the selfe same sacramentes amongst themselves, and yet many of them shamefully perished and were destroyed in the desert, although they had in the sacramentes communicated with other godly men. Wherefore they say, that Paul of the letter or of the like would conclude, that we also if we lyue wickedly shall perishe, although we be initiated in Christ, and vse the selfe same sacramentes that the elect of God do. But agaynst this exposition the wordes of the Apostle hymselfe are most playnly repugnant. For he sayth, that the elders had in their sacramentes the selfe same meate that we haue, that is, Christ. For thus he writeth, And they dranke of the spirituall rocke following them: and the rocke was Christ. Now, if they had Christ, doubtles they wanted not the meate of our sacramentes: which can not be sayd to be any other thing, then Christ. Farther we see, that the Apostle hath by expresse wordes put the names of our sacramentes. For he nameth baptisme and spirituall meate and drinke. Farther if we follow the expositions of our aduersaries, we shal make Pauls argument of small force. For he went to reprove the security of the Corinthians, which seemed to promise vnto themselves saluatio for this cause only because they were Christians, and partakers of the holy misteryes, although in the meane tyme they liued losely, and dissolutely. Wherefore he declareth that God would severely punish them, except they repented, as we reade he punished the fathers of the old testament, when he sondry wayes afflicted them in the desert. And if their sacramentes and ours were not one and the selfe same, Paul concludeth nothing. For the Corinthians mought haue sayd: yea but our Testament is a farre a farre other thyng, then was the testamēt of the olde fathers; & our sacramēts are farre excellenter then were their sacramentes. Wherefore God wil not as-side vs, neyther oughtest thou to compare vs with them. By this meanes is Pauls argument made of no force, if we take away the similitude and proportion of the things of our sacramēts with þ things of þ sacramēts of the elders.

 Farther also Augustine in his 26. treatise vpon Iohn most plainly teacheth, that the Elders as touching the spirituall thing, had in their sacramentes the self same thing that we haue. In outward forme (he sayth) one thing was geuen vnto the,
 and an other vnto vs: but as touching the thing signified, he acknowledgeth no difference at all. Wherefore the place of the Apostle, which our aduersaries haue by their expositions, gone aboute to wreste from vs, is by these reasons to be defended. They object moreover, that the Fathers in many places say, that the sacramentes of the Elders were shadowes and images of that truth, which is exhibited in our sacraments. Vnto them we answer, that images may two maner of wayes be taken. For some are outwardly bayne and voyde, and contayne nothing: other images haue in dede the thing it selfe, but yet intricately and obscurely, if they be compared with other images that are more open. And thys second way we will easely graunt, that the sacraments of the Elders were images and shadowes of ours, not that the elders had not in their sacramēts þ self same things þ we receiue in ours, but because their sacramēts more intricately and ob-scurely shadowed those thinges. To the better explication hereof, Chrysostome semeth to bring a verie apt similitude, in his homely which he made vpon these wordes of Paul, Our fathers were baptised into Moyse, and in his 17. Homely vpon the Epistle vnto the Hebrewes. Paynters (sayth he) when they entend to paynt a King, firste draw out the proportion vpon a table wyth shadowes and darke colours: but yet in such sort, that a man may by that delineation, althoughe it be somewhat obscure, easely perceyue, that the image of a King is there paynted, and horsemen and chariots, and such other like thinges, which thinges yet are not straight way knowne of all men. But afterward, when the Paynter hath layd on fresh colours, and hath finished the worke, those thinges which before by those first lines appeared scarce begonne and rude, are now manifestly and expessedly perceived. Such (sayth he) were the Sacramēts of the Elders, if they be compared with ours. By these wordes it is manifest, that Chrysostome was of the opinion, that one and the selfe same thing is represented in our Sacraments, and in the Sacramentes of the Elders, although in theyre more obscurely, and in ours, more manifestly. But how great a nearenes there is betwene both these kindes of Sacraments, Paul semeth hereby to teach, in that he putteth the names of the one, for the names of the other, and maketh them common to both. For in the 12. chapter of the firste epistle to the Corinth, he as-firmeth, that the Elders were baptised, and had one and the same spirituall meate, and one and the same spirituall drinke, which we now haue. And on the other side, to the Colosians, he calleth our Baptisme, Circumcision. For he saith: that we are circumcised in Christ, but yet with a circumcision not made with handes, by putting of the body of the sinnes of the flesh. In which place he ascribeth vnto circumcision, þ putting of sinnes. But they thinke that this maketh against vs, which is red in the bty. chapter to the Hebrewes, where it is written: In that that he sayth now, he hath abolished that which was before. But that which is abolished and waxen olde, is euen as had to vanish away. Of these wordes they conclude, that the olde testament is utterly abolished. Which thing (say they) could not be possible, if the substance therof were one, and the same with the substance of the new. But these men ought to haue cosidered, that the substance of the olde Testament is not abolished. In dede ceremonies are abolished as touching the outward signes: howbeit the signification of the abideth the selfe same that it was. Iudiciall preceptes also, although in our dayes they be not all had in vse, yet the summe and principall scope of them, is stil retained, namely, þ sinnes should be punished, and iustice preserued in cōmon wealthe.
 But the sence and obseruation of morall preceptes, remaineth stil perfect & whole:

of the elect. But they say, that Augustine also is against our sentence. For in his preface vpon the 73. psalme, thus he writeth: I hat the sacramentes of the elders promised a sauiour, but ours gene saluation. But by these wordes Augustine mente one ly to put a distinction betwene the maner wherby the sacraments of the elders signified Christ in one sort, and ours in an other sort. For they so represented Christ, as to which should one day contemners do so represent him, as now already come. For how could Augustine thinke, that the sacramentes of the elders did by no meanes geue a sauiour, when as he most manifestly testifieth that the fathers in the Spenna had the selfe same Christ, which we now haue in the Eucharist. And in his booke de nuptijs & concupiscentia ad Valerium, and other places he oftentimes confesseth that the Elders were by circumcision deliuered from originall sinne. Beke also vpon Luke affirmeth the selfe same thing, and saith, that circumcision differed nothing from baptisme, as touching remission of sinnes, but onely that it opened not the gates of the kingdome of heauen. For to the performance of that, the death of Christ was looked for. Touching this thing surely, I will not much contend, so that this be graunted, y those fathers being dead in what place so euer they were, were in the presence & sight of God in happy state. For they had without al doubt the fruition of God, neither is it to be thought, that they could be forsaken of hym in whom they beleued. But that they were caried by into heauen, before Christ ascended by, I know the fathers do deny, neither do I therein any thing contende against them. But let vs returne vnto that that these fathers of their owne accord graunt, namely, that Circumcision take away originall sinne. How then can they say, that Christ by circumcision was not geuen at all? For what remission of sins could there be without Christ? The maister of the sentences very absurdly thinketh, that circumcision had y power of remitting of sinnes, but not of conferring of grace: as though forsooth remission of sinnes can be had without grace. He sayneth also, that the sacraments of the Gospell had their force of the death of Christ: and forasmuch as this death is now accomplished, therefore are they of more efficacy & more mightier then the sacraments of the elders: as in whose time the price of the death of Christ was not yet paid. But this their sentence wherby they appoint the force and merite of the passion of Christ, to be but for a time, cannot be but absurd. For of what more force to saue is the death of Christe now that is already past, then it was in the old time, when it was looked for to come? Undoubtedly, on eche side is required faith, whereby assuredly we do no lesse comprehend things to come, then we do things past. But if we will say, that God hath a respect vnto the sacrifice of his sonne offered vpon the crosse, undoubtedly, this was from all eternitie, and before the foundations of the worlde were layd, ratified and most fully accepted of him. Of Christ also it is written in the Apocalips. I hat the lambe was slayne from the begynning of the worlde. And where as they say, that circumcision had the power to take away originall sin, fro whence I pray you had it such so greate power, but from the death of Christ? Doubtles our baptisme so agreeth with circumcision, that Augustine agaynst the letters of Petilianus in his 2. booke and 72. chapter and in other places, proueth, that the sacramēt of baptisme ought not to repeted, because circumcision in the olde tyme was not repeted, if a man had receaued it of the Samaritanes, and were afterward conuerted vnto the sincere religion of the Ierosolomites. But amongst other thinges, this semeth not a litle to haue moued our aduersaries, for that it is written vnto the Galathians of the ceremonies of the elders, that they were weake and beggerly elementes of the worlde. But these wordes of Paule are to be vnderstand of those olde sacramentes whiche are now abrogated by Christ. Or if this aunswere like not, then vnderstand Paule so to speake of the sacramentes of the elders, as he saw the Iewes at that tyme vsed them, namely, without Christ or his promise. But the first aunswere is both truer and playner for that place. And if a mā deimaund, how it cometh to passe, that the sacramentes of the elders were more in number then ours, this question may easely self be answered. Namely, that the church was then beginning, neyther did they know so many thinges of Christ, as are made open vnto vs, after that he is now come into the world and hath finished the sacrifice so long looked for.

 Therefore it was requisite that God shoulde at that tyme by many ceremonies and images shadow one and the selfe same thyng: but there is no neede now of such paynfull instruction. For (as we haue befoze sayd) the signes of the sacramentes were therfore geuen, to confirme the promises of God: not as though those promises are not of themselves firm inough, but that our myndes, being otherwise hard to beleue, and wauering, shoulde by sensible signes be strenthened. Chrysostome in hys 6. homely vnto the people of Antioch, If (sayth he) our nature had bene vterly spirituall and without body, spirituall thinges shoulde haue bene deliuered vs, without corporall signes. Hereby it is manifest, how absurdely they order the matter which set forth the visible signes of the sacramentes to be sene of all men: but the promise which shoulde be confirmed by those signes, and ought to cleaue vnto our myndes, they both pronounce in a strange tonge, and secretly mumble by, that it shoulde not be heard of others. But that the sacramentes of the lawe, which were so many in number, were seales of the promises of God, may by induction be easely known. The tabernacle and Arke of the Lord sealed the promise, that God would dwell in that people, & that he would be in the middell of them. The consecration of the priest, and the ornaments of the garmentes, shadowed Christ the only priest, and the same perpetuall and eternall, as the authoz of the epistle to the Hebrues proueth. And of this selfe same promise, Dauid most playnly maketh mencion, when vnder the person of Christ he sayth, Thou art a priest for ever according to the order of Melchisedech. The sacrifices also signified the oblation of Christ vpon the crosse. But here some man will peraduenture say, Ergo, the sacrifices were sacramentes. How then do we say, that there is great difference betwene the nature of a sacrament, and the nature of a sacrifice? So indeede we sayd befoze, and now agayne constantly affirme: but thereof it followeth not, but that the consideration of ether, may sometymes light vpon one & the same thing. The nature of a sacrifice and of a sacrament may concur in one & the same thing. For there were two thinges to be considered in sacrifices: fyrst, that there was something offred vnto God: and therein consisted the whole strength of sacrifices: secondly, that the oblation which was killed, and burnt, represented Christ, which was to be slayne for vs, by whome we shoulde haue God pacified and mercifull. And after this maner we doubt not but that in them was a sacrament. And how all these thinges were seales of most certayne promises, may easely be declared by euery one of them peticularly: as by the obseruation of the Sabbath, by circumcision, by choyce of meates, by washing and sprinklinges of holy water, by the bow of the Nazarites, by the ceremony of the scious, by the purification of the childwife after her deliuey, and by all such like kynde of misteries. But because we would be brieue, we thought it sufficient to expresse those fewe now mentioned. But there yet remaineth one doubt, whether the people of the Jewes hauing those sensible signes of ceremonies, vnderstoode also the promises of God, whiche were by the sealed Augustine at large treateth of this matter in his 4. booke agaynst Faustus, & in his 3. booke de Doctrina Christiana: & sayth, that the patriarches and prophetes, and the excellenter sort of men in the olde testament being illustrate with a mighty spirite, knew very well the significations of the ceremonies and of the sacramentes: so that they tooke not the signes for the thinges, which (sayth he) is a miserable seruitude: but he thinketh that the people and common sort of men vied these signes as the thinges themselves, for that they vnderstoode only this, that there is one only God, which ought to be honozed with this kynde of wor-shippinge and seruice. For if there were any, whiche when they knew those to be signes of other thinges, woulde yet notwithstanding enterprete them after their owne lust, & had bene an error of a wandring mynde. By this doctrine of

Augustine may be put three kindes of men, as touching the vse of signes. For some there are, which in very deepe vnderstand, what is signified, & therefore sticke not in the signes, but turne their eyes to the thinges signified. Others vse the signes, but to what they are to be referred, they know not: And this Augustine thinketh, pertayneth to seruitude. Lastly are those, which are not ignorant, that those thinges which they vse are signes, but yet notwithstanding they peruerfly, and as they list themselves, interpret them. This is an error, & that very hurtfull. As touching the first, and third, I am of the same mynde that Augustine is. But in the second as touching the common and vulgare people of the Jewes, I do not so fully assent vnto him, to graunt, that the common people of the Hebrewes know nothing els of the sacramentes, & ceremonies of the law, but that by them they shoulde worshippe the onely and true God. For they were taught continually of the Scribes and of the priestes, and heard dayly the oracles of the prophetes. Whereby they mought easely gather, at the least a generall signification of theyr sacramentes, as well touching Christ, as also touching all other thinges pertayning to purenes of lyfe and holynes of maners. The doctrine of the looking for the Messias was so common amongst them, that, as I suppose, it was hidden from none of them all. Phillippe, as it is writen in the Gospell of Iohn, thus spake vnto Nathaniell: We haue founde the Messias, of whome Moses and the prophetes haue writen. And the common people of the Jewes, being amased at the miracles of Christ, sayd, We knowe that Messias shall come, and teach vs all these thinges. Hereunto also serueth that the prophetes euer taught, that ceremonies being done onely outwardly and without sayth, are most displeasent vnto God. And that sayth, which was required to outward rites, vnles it had had a respect vnto Christ, although not fully, yet some way, and that at the least generally, of what force could it haue bene? And soasmuch as the prophetes were so diligent in obtruding, and euery where inculcating the significations of the ceremonies, do we thinke, that they taught nothing of Christ: Dauid most playnly speaketh of sacrifices, that God delighteth not in them. But a sacrifice vnto God (sayth he) is a troubled spirite, and a contrite and humble hart. Touching washinges and clensinges, Esaie instructeth them saying, Be ye washed, and be ye cleane. Ieremy also, washe (sayth he) thy hart from iniquitye. And Ezechiel he weth that by those waters is signified the power of the holy ghost, when he bringeth in God promising, that he would poure cleane water vpon them. Touching Circumcision also they are verpe often admonished in the holy scripture to circumsise theyr neckes and theyr hartes. And that they shoulde not thinke, that they were able to doo this, of them selues and by theyr owne strengthes, Moses in the 30 chapter of Deut. sayth, God shall circumsise thyne harte, that thou mayst loue him. Touching purifications and washinges of garmentes, and sach other like thinges, they were thus admonished in Leuiticus the 11. chapter, I am the lord thy God, which brought the out of the land of Egypt ye shalbe holy vnto me, bycause I am holy. Touching the Sabbath they were oftentimes told, that in it was signified the rest of God, and theyr sanctification. And if so be all these thinges were so manifestly and playnly declared, which no man can doubt, but that vnto them they were good and profitable, and that it was not possible for them to be ignorant, that the attaynement of euery good thinge came through Christ or the Messias, I can not be perswaded, but that they saw, that in theyr sacramentes was signified Christ. Moreover this also is an other reason Esaie most manifestly testifieth, that God did lay vpon Christ all our sinnes, and that we were healed only by his stripes and death: wherfore seing in the sacraments mention is made, that God by sacrifices is made mercifull vnto vs, they could not but cal to remembrance, the only mediator Christ, by whome only is God made mercifull vnto vs. Howbeit we can not affirme, that the common sort of the Israelites knew all the misteries particularly. Onely this we say, & they had a certayne generall knowledge of Christ in the sacramentes of the law, when as otherwise we our selues can not perticularly render a reason of these ceremonies. The Apostles haue only generally made them playn vnto vs, And though there haue benne some amongst vs, as Origen, and a greate many other like, which haue attempted to frame for every perticular ceremony a proper alegory, yet haue they in a manner but lost theyr labour. For theyr inuentions could bring no profite at all vnto vs. For they most plainly want the word of God. Neither is it to be meruayled at, that they so much delighted in such inuentions, For euen as euery where our owne deuises woonderfully please vs, so in this matter, the curiosity of man exceedingly delighted it selfe. Now those things which we haue spoken most playnly declare, how farre the schole men haue misse of the marke, which haue betwen the old sacramentes, and the new, put this difference, that the old sacramentes only signified grace and Christ, but ours largely and abundantly exhibite both. For the elders (say they) were holpen by the woork of the woorker. For when any man came with fayth and a godly motion of the hart and of the minde vnto those holy seruices, he had ther by merite. But the woork wrought (as they call it) nothing profited them as touching saluation. But in our sacraments they say it is farre otherwise: that not only fayth and the spirituall motion of the minde, which they call the woork of the woorker, helpeth vs, but also euen the outward sacramente it selfe, and the institution of God, which they call the woork wrought, conferreth vnto vs both remission of sinnes and also saluation. But I will demaund of these men, what that is which the outward woork and the visible sacrament exhibiteth vnto vs, that we do not attayne vnto by fayth: if they answer that it is Christ as for hym we comprehend by fayth: If remission of sinnes, that also, we obtayne by fayth: if reconciliation, wherby we returne into fauor which God, this also we can not obtayne without fayth: if last of all the increase of grace and of the spirite, neither vndoubtedly do we by anye other meanes obtayne this, but by fayth, what is there then remanynge, that this woork wrought bringeth? This word is altogether strange, nether is it once mentioned of in the holy scriptures. Neither would I at this time haue bled it, but that I haue so contended agaynst the aduersaries. But peradventure they will say, Forasmuch as besides fayth is also added the outward woork, is there nothinge to be attributed vnto it? yes vndoubtedly, I attribute much vnto it when it procedeth of fayth. For I know that such a woork pleaseth God, and that he bleseth to recompence many thinges vnto such woorkes. But what maketh that to this present purpose. Did not the elders vnto theyr fayth adioyne also those woorkes, wherby they exercised and receaued the sacraments of theyr law? Wherfore as touching this part, wee see that they had in theyrs as many thinges which pleased God, as we haue in ours: vnles peradventure they wil contend, that the exercising and receauing of our sacramentes, is ether a better, or nobler woork then was the exercising and receauing of the sacramentes of the elders: which thing I will not graunte vnto the: especially seing y the perfection of the woork is to be considered by fayth and charity from whence it procedeth: wherfore if Abraham and David had more fayth when they receaued theyr sacramentes, then any weake Christian, when he is baptised, or communicateth, who will not iudge but that theyr woork is more notable and more excelent then the other mans woork? And moreover as for that kinde of speach which these men so often vse, namely, that sacraments remitte sinnes, as conferre grace we do not easily admite: vnles peradventure in that sense wherin Paule affirmeth, that the Gospell is the power of God to saluation: as vnto Timothe the reading of the holy scriptures is sayd to make saffe: which vndoubtedly is nothing ells, but that the might and power of God wherby he remitteth sinnes, giveth grace, and at the end saueh, bleseth these instruments and meanes to our saluation. And euen as to bring vs to saluation, he bleseth the word of the Gospell, and the preaching of the holy scriptures, so also adioyneth he ther vnto the sacraments. For by ether of them is preached vnto vs the liberall promise of God: which if we take hold of by fayth, we shall obtayne both saluation

We must not gene our selues so much to Allegories. Error of the scholmen.

The receauing of our sacraments is not more excellent or better then the receauing of the sacraments of the elders. Whither the sacramentes conferre grace and remitte sinnes.

and also remission of sinnes. This is the true sense, vnto which also are the sa thers to be applied, when they say that grace is the power of the sacramentes.
Which is all one as if they had sayd, vnderstanding and sense is the power of speech and of wordes. And how vnaptly the Scholmen speake of they? Nay or let, herby it is manifest, for that they say, that he putteth not a stay or let, which although he haue not the acte ether of louing, or of beleuing, yet objecteth no ryng that is contrary or opposite vnto grace: namely, the acte of infidelity or of hatred. The in such case (say they) the sacraments of the Gospel conferre grace.
But this is nothing ells, then to attribute vnto creatures the cause of our sal uation, and to binde our selues to much to signes and elements of this world.
Thys ought to bee certayne and most assured, that no more is to be attributed vnto the sacramentes as touching saluation, then vnto the worde of God. Where fore if sometimes we heare, as Augustine also saith, our sacramentes are better then the sacramentes of the elders, this ought so to be vnderstanded that it be refer red vnto perspicuitie. For we graunt that our sacraments both speake and preach more plainly of Christ, then did the sacraments of the elders. Wherefore seing we are more clearely and plainly instructed, faith is the more fuller, and bringeth vn to vs more grace and spirite. And we gladly admit that which the same Augustine saith: That sometymes it cometh to passe, that the sacrament is receyued wythout the thing. For so the wicked and infidels vsinge the sacramentes, receiue onelye the outwarde signes, and are vtterly boyde of saluation and of grace. Sometimes also it contrariwise happeneth, that the godly being excluded by any necessitie fro the vse of the sacramentes, yet are in no wise defrauded of the thing it selfe, and of the thing signified. Neither let any man here lay to our charge, that we affirme that sacraments depend of our faith. For neither teach we any such thing: yea ra ther we affirme, that the sacraments are sacramentes, although thy faith be either weake, or els none at all. And Augustines iudgement is very good concerning him which onely carnally receiueth the sacrament, when he sayth: It doth not therefore cease, to be spirituall: but vnto them it is not spirituall. And now at length to make an ende, we must neuer come to this point, to thinke that grace and our saluation is contained in the sacramentes, as in certaine sackes or bagges, which may be pou red out vpon the communicantes and receiuers. For the sacramentes are as cer taine tyding bringers of our saluation: whom he that beleueth, shall obtaine sal uation. And thus much hitherto haue I sufficiently spoken of sacraments general ly. Now resteth for vs somewhat to speake of circumcision: for the better vnderstan ding wherof we haue spoken these things the more largely and with more wordes.
But here we shall not nede so long a treatise. For if we remeber all those things, which haue bene generally spoken of sacraments, it shall be no hard matter to vn stand all that which may be spoken of circumcision.

And circumcision (not to go from the wordes of the Apostle) was the seale of righteousnes of faith, bicause it preached and confirmed the promise concernyng righteousnes, which the elders receiued by faith. And hereof it followeth, that the elders by it had remission of sinnes. For, forasmuch as righteousness (as we haue be fore more at large debated) consisteth chiefly in the remission of sinnes, whosoener beleued the promise set forth and by circumcision sealed, it followeth of necessitie, that he was pertaker of the remission of sinnes. Some demaund, whether circum cision and baptisme which succeeded it, bring remissio onely of those sins which are alredy past, or also of those, which are after ward comitted. Let these me consider, if the vse of Circumcision and of Baptisme is not for a tyme, but perpetuall. For, as the faithfull oftentimes say, so when they forthwith come againe vnto themselves, they thinke vpon the promise of the Gospell, which is of the remission of sinnes.
Wherin also euen for this cause they are confirmed, for that they remember them selues to be either baptised or circumcised: and so by putting to of faith, they are de liuered from sinnes, and are reconciled vnto God. Hereby it is manifest, how they wer in the old tyme deceiued, which would not be baptised, but euē now whē death approched, & that they were in a maner geuing by y<sup>e</sup> ghoſte. Neither let any man thinke, y<sup>e</sup> this is repugnant vnto the keyes of y<sup>e</sup> Church, by which are receined the penitent. For, that they may the better vnderſtande the matter, this they muſt nedes graunt, that thoſe keyes of the church are nothing els, but the preaching of the Goſpell, wherby the miniſters do perſwade the beleuers that their ſinnes are forgiven them. But they which are to be perſwaded, are by the benefite of the holy ghoſt perſwaded, & their faith concerninge the promiſe is alſo hereby confirmed, ſo that they call to memory the ſigne of Baptiſme or of Circumciſion, whiche in times paſt they receined. And Paule when he ſaid, For the remiſſion of the ſinnes going before, ment, y<sup>e</sup> iuſtification when it is applied vnto vs, alwayes putteth away thoſe ſinnes which we haue before committed. But that nothing letteth, but that the promiſe of the remiſſion of ſinnes, and the ſealing therof, may oftentimes with profite be called to our memory. But ſo oftentimes as ſinne is ſo forgiven, it followeth of neceſſitie that the ſame ſinne went before: but that which we ſpeake of tendeth to this, to declare, that the vtilitie of the ſacraments is not for a tyme, but pertaineth to the whole courſe of our life. Circumciſion differed from other ſacramentes, ſo that it was the beginning and firſt ſteppe and viſible entrance to the couenaut of God. But what maner ones the vncircumciſed were counted, the Apoſtle declareth in the epiſtle to the Ephesians. Remember (ſaith he) that ye were ſometimes Gentiles in the fleſh, which were called vncircumciſion of circumciſion in the fleſh made wyth handes, ye were ſometimes without Chriſt, aliens from the comon wealth of the Iſraelites, ſtraungers from the couenantes of the promiſes, without hope in the world, and without God. And in the epiſtle vnto the Phil. he teacheth, which is the true & ſpirituall circumciſion. For we (ſaith he) are circumciſion, which ſerue the Lord in ſpिरितe, and glory in Chriſt, and haue no confidence in the fleſh. And vnto the Coloſſ. he writeth In whom (ſaith he) ye are circumciſed with circumciſion not made with handes, by the putting of the ſinfull body of the fleſh. By whiche place we ſee (as we haue before alſo noted) that forgiveness of ſinnes is to be put, as well in Circumciſion, as in Baptiſme. Wherefore Auguſtine in his booke againſt Iulianus the Pelagian, in that part wherin he heapeth by a great many authorities of the fathers, reproveth the Pelagians by theſe wordes of the Apoſtle, ſo that notwithstanding they denied original ſinne, yet they baptiſed their infants: ſo, ſo much as they affirmed y<sup>e</sup> in them is no ſinne, how could that Baptiſme (as Paule ſaith) be circumciſion not made with handes, by the putting of of the ſinful fleſh? Theſe places of the Apoſtle ſerue very much to the explication of the proprietie and nature of circumciſion. And in Dent. the x. chap. the Lord ſaith: Thou ſhalt circumciſe the vncircumciſion of thine hart, neiſther ſhalt thou harden thy necke. In ſtede of vncircumciſion the Chaldey interpreter hath, Tephacho that is, ſolitiſhnes: therby ſignifieng, y<sup>e</sup> the firſt ground of ſinne herein conſiſteth, that we are blinde to all thinges pertaining to God, and that we are wonderfully infected with the ignorance of God. The 70. interpreters haue σκληροκαρδια, that is, hardnes of hart. The promiſes which are offered vnto them y<sup>e</sup> are circumciſed, are theſe: that God is made our God, and the God of our ſeede: in which onely thing we haue the horne of plenty: that is, the ſumme of all good things. Hereof alſo ſpringeth our felicitie, & conſolation in all affliction: They were therby alſo put in mind of y<sup>e</sup> mortifying of y<sup>e</sup> fleſh: y<sup>e</sup> is, of y<sup>e</sup> cutting away of ſuperfluous pleaſures, & moreover by it they profeſſed pure religio. And in ſum therby was ſignified y<sup>e</sup> couenāt made wth god. Theſe wer y<sup>e</sup> things ſignified, & y<sup>e</sup> matter of this ſacramēt and pertayne truly vnto the nature and ſubſtance therof. In baptiſme alſo all thoſe ſelfe ſame thinges are contayned. Only the ſignes are changed. Wherefore hereby we may conclude, that euen as in times paſt Circumciſion was geuen vnto infants, ſo alſo Baptiſme can not now be denied vnto them. For if they haue the thing, what reaſon is it, why they ſhould not haue alſo the ſigne? And that we ſhould not doubt, whether Circumciſion and Baptiſme are a like, and haue one and the ſelf ſame nature, Paul moſt manifeſtly declareth it vnto the Coloſſians, in which place he calleth Baptiſme, the circumciſion of Chriſt. And they which affirme, that the infants of the Hebrues oughte to haue bene circumciſed but ours should not be baptised, do make God more fauorable vnto the Jewes, then vnto Christians. Some demaund, that seeing we are ignorant whether in-fantes haue the thing of the sacrament or no, why we geue them the signe, and seale y<sup>e</sup> which is vncertaine vnto vs: vnto whom we answere, that this question is not moued agaynst vs, but agaynst the word of God. For he expessedly commaunded and willed, that children shoulde be circumcised. Father let them answer vs, why they admitte them that be of full age vnto Baptisme and vnto the Communion, when as they are not sure howe they parte is affected. For they whiche are baptised or doo communicate maye dissemble, and decease the Church. They answere, that it is inoughe that they make theyr profession. If they lye, what is that to vs: say they, let them looke to that. So say we of infantes, that it sufficeth vs, that they are offered vnto the Church, ether of the parents, or of them in whose power they are. And if with the action of the sacrament be ioyned election and predestination, that which we doo is rationed: but if not, then is it voyde. For our saluation dependeth of the election and mercy of God. But as touching election, for as much as it is hidden from vs, we iudge nothing. We follow only those signes and tokens of it, which we may attayne vnto: as are these, that the children being infantes are offered vnto the Church to be baptised, and that when they come to age, they by wordes con-fesse, that they beleue in Christ: which tokens althoughe they be not so certayne, that they can not sayle, yet vnto vs they are sufficient for the ministracion of the sacraments. Neither as I thinke is this to be omitted, that when infantes are baptised, althoughe they haue not the vnderstanding of the significacion to moue the, yet notwithstanding doth it moue and instruct the Church which is present: but the infantes obtayne the benefits at Gods hand, who secretly worketh in them by the holy ghost. But the significacion of the sacrament, they shall, whē by age they may, afterward perceaue and vnderstand. Neither let vs much be moued with the difference of the signes, of Circumcision (I say) and of Baptisme: for in the sacraments this part is of least wayght: for they may be changed, as experience hath now thought. And without them God can geue the more excellēt part. For neither is his power and mercy bound vnto the sacraments. Wherefore when we vse the sacraments, we ought to applye our minde rather vnto the more excellenter and better part. Wherefore the Lord in Jeremy the 4. chapter after this maner reproveth the Jewes: Circumcise the foreskinnes of your hart, lest my fury be kindled, and there be no man to quench it. But they which contem-ning sayth, and the thing signified, cleane wholly vnto the signes, seme to deale euen altogether as they doo, which in kings letters patents with great diligēce kepe the seales, but the letters themselves and the giftes, they ether rent, or care not for.

Now are there two thinges remainyng to be discussed. The one is, why circumcision was commaunded to be marked in the member of generation: the second why it was commaunded to be done the eight day. Out of Augustine in diuers places we gather, that therefore God woulde haue it so, to put vs in mynde, that originall sinne, is by generation traduced from the parentes into vs: and that euen as the foreskin being cut of in the parent, doth notwithstanding returne agayne in the childe which is begotten, so originall sinne being remitted vnto parents, buddeth by agayne in children which are brought forth.
We are thereby also admonished (whiche thing we haue before oftentimes mentioned) that the league of God pertayneth not only vnto vs, but also vnto our children whom we beget. Finally by that signe was chiefly signified, that Christ shoulde spring of the seede of Abraham. Neither ought we here to follow our owne sence or humane reason, to thinke that to be a thing ridiculous or of small force, which God himselfe hath instituted. For otherwise the crosse of Christ and the Gospel are an offence vnto the Jewes, & foolishnes vnto the Gentiles. Neither ought we to iudge of thinges deuine according to that which is shewed

shewed outwardly. Otherwise Julianus and Celsus made a laughing matter, that the apple was forbidden our first parentes. And Naaman the Sirian thought it a thing ridiculous, that he should be seven tymes washed in the river of Jordan. Neither doubt I, but that there were some which derided Moses, when he did cast the wood into the bitter waters, to heale their bitterness. In our dayes also very many meruaple, how it cometh to passe, that the stealth of one halpenny bringeth eternall destruction. But these men ought to remember, that these thinges are not to be considered by their owne force: but vnto them must be added also the wayght of the word of God: which vndoubtedly is of so great wayght, that it wayggeth heavier then the whole world. Neither is there any thing so vile and abiect, but that when the word of God is added thereunto, it is made notable and excellent. Indeepe kinges and princes of this world haue a care to haue goodly and honorable scales. But as touching the promises and gifts, which are by them sealed, they oftentimes deceaue men. But God when he bleth euen the most abiect signes, neuer deceaueth any man. Now will I speake a word or two of the consideration of the eight day. The Hebrewes affirme, that such is the dignity of the seventh day, that of it all thinges obtayne I know not what force and strength. Wherefore they thinke, that after the seventh day there cometh vnto the infant newly borne so much strength, that he is able easely to abyde the payne of circumcision. But let vs leaue vnto them these sayned royes: and let vs rather thus thinke, that in the eight day was betokened the resurrection of Christ, and therewith all ours, which thing, may easely be perceaued by Paule: for he sayth, that in circumcision was signified the cutting of, of the finnes of the flesh. But the finnes of the flesh can neuer be perfectly cut of from vs, vntill we are come to the holy resurrection. All the whole tyme of this world, and the tyme of this whole life representeth a weeke of dayes. But the eight day signifieth the resurrection. There is moreouer an other reason not worthy to be contemned, namely, that a childe being so newly borne is able to do nothing of hymselfe as touching the attaynement of righteousness. Wherefore hereby we be admonished, y<sup>e</sup> iustification cometh not of our workes. And although it were so in the rite of Circumcision, yet are not we in Baptisme bound to any certayn number of dayes. For Christ hath made vs free from this kinde of obseruation. Howbeit there haue bene some, which haue gone aboute in Baptisme also to compell Christians vnto the eyght day. But those the Council held by Cyprian hath condemned. In the primitive Church, Circumcision was for a tyme obserued. Augustine also vpon the epistle vnto the Galathians saith, that not euery circumcision after Christ was condemned, but only that circumcision, wherein was put hope of saluation: but that circumcision which was receaued for this cause only, to retaine peace in the Church, and the more to aduance the preaching of the Gospel, wrought well be borne with all. For this cause Paul suffered Timothe to be circumcised. But if it be required to be done as necessary vnto saluation: it is by no meanes to be permitted. And therefore Paule earnestly resisted and would not suffer Titus to be circumcised, as it is written in the epistle to the Galathians. They say that euen now very many Churches in the East or in the South retayne still to this day Circumcision together with Baptisme. How rightly they do it, let them see vnto that. Doubtles it is most likely, that, forasmuch as they haue retayned it so long, and that so stidly, they put some hope of they<sup>r</sup> saluation in it. Wherefore they should do much better if they would utterly omitte it. But it shalbe good, in the meane time to declare how Paul to the Galathians sayth: that he which is circumcised is debter to obserue the whole law. For when Abraham receaued Circumcision, the law was not yet geuen. Wherefore it semeth, that Circumcision had not that of his owne force and nature, to binde men to obserue the law. But we ought to remember, that that whiche the Apostle sayth, proceedeth out of an other principle: namelpe, that Circumcision represented Christ as which should come, and geue himselfe vpon the crosse: and the law should so long be of force, vntill Christ came. foze seing by Circumcision they testified, that he was not as yet come, it must nedes follow, that they were kept still vnder the law, when as the law could only by the coming of Christ be abrogated. And with how greate an obseruation God would haue that sacrament to be kept, hereby it is manifest, for that in the booke of Genesis the 17. chapter he testifieth, That the soule which is not circumcised the 8. day, should be cut of from his people. Ambrose in his booke of Abraham the Patriarch, seemeth to wonder at this so greate severity, For God (sayth he) appoynted cities of refuge, that if any had by chance, or vnwares killed a mā, he mought haue a place whether to go, that the frendes and kinssolke of the party slayne should not kill hym: so that he had not of set purpose and willingly, but by chaunce and vnwares committed the murder. Wherefore seing infants did not by their owne will refuse circumcision, what reason was there they should bee cut of? He answereth, that therefore peradventure God would haue the children deprived of theyr corporall life, that in them the parentes might be punished for theyr impiety, But he sayeth that there were other which were of the opinion, that this sentence pertayned not vnto the infants: but vnto those in whose power they were, as if it had bene sayd, that they should be cut of. But the very wordes of the scripture are agaynst this sentence: wherefore he turneth himselfe to an allegoricall exposition: as though that threatening should pertayn to those, which circucise not the mind, which is the strongest & most excellentest portion of the soule.
But suche allegories satisfie not this question. Wherefore I thinke that two thinges are necessary to the absoluinge of this doubt. The firste is, that that threatning pertayned vnto him, when he came to full age, if he should then allow the negligence of his parents, & not receaue Circumcision, vnto which he was by the law bound. The second is, that God is not to be accused of iniustice, if somtimes he killed the infant being so brought by vncircumcised. For such seuerity mought be of force to admonish me, in how ill part God taketh it, to haue his sacramentes contemned. And if peradventure thou demaund, what is to be iudged of the soule of a child so killed, hauing not as yet receaued the sacrament: I answer, that we, ether as touching his saluation or condemnatio, can affirm nothing on neither side. For if he pertayned to the number of the elect, so that he was predestinate to eternall life, there is no cause, but that he may be saved: for asmuch as grace is not bound vnto the sacraments. But if he were a vessell to that end made of God, to shew forth in him his wrath, and so to be condemned, what can we complayne of the severity of God, especially seing we are all bozne the children of wrath, and of condemnatio: Howbeit in my iudgmēt we ought to hope well of him: for that, forasmuch as the promise was geuen vnto the seed of Abraham, and he being an infant hath not by any actuell sinne of his owne withdrawen himselfe from the promise, it is most likely, that he is admitted vnto the kingdome of God. Neither oughte we to thinke, that he was slayne of God to eternall condemnation, but rather to saluation, that he shoulde not by mallice change his hart: and that by his death he mought testifie vnto his parents, vnto his elders, & vnto others, how greuously they sinned, in neglectyng his circumcision: and might profite the whole Church, being a manifest token of the wrath of God against the contemners of the sacramentes. Farther it is not hard to beleue, that godly men, which liued before Circumcision was instituted, had other certayne notes, wherby they: righteousness, which was had by sayth was sealed. For we read, that they both offered fyre frutes, and also sacrificed. But by what signe they signified they: fyre regeneration, the holy scriptures mencio not. And the Hebrewes, in Circumcising their children, used a knife made of stone, which thing yet God commaunded not. But they were moued so to do by the example of Zippora the wife of Moses, whiche used suche a knife in circumcising of her sonne, when he was in danger to haue bene slayne of the angell. And although this sacrament was diligēly obserued and kept amongst the Iewes, yet it spread abroad also to foren nations. For if we may geue credite to Ambrose in his booke of Abraham the patriarch, the Egyptians, Arabians and

ans and Phenicians were circumcised. And he thinketh, that they for this cause did it, for that they thoughte, that by suche firste fruytes of their bloude are dyu-uen awaye diuels, to the ende that they shoulde not hurte hym which is circumcised. So the deuill hath alwayes gone aboute to vitiate the sacramentes of God. For it was supersticion, to ascribe the power of saluation of the delinery from Sathan, vnto the nature of bloud shed forth. And at this day the Jewes seme not to be farre from this kinde of foolishenes. For whillett they circumcise the infante, there standeth one by with a little vessel full eyther of earth or of duste, where into they thruste the foreskinne beyng cut of, as though the Deuill seemed by that meanes to haue his meat. For the Lord said vnto the serpent euen straight way at the beginning: Vpon thy breast shalt thou creepe, and earth shalt thou eat.
 They seme to thinke that the deuill, hauing thus gotten his meate, departeth from the child, and wyll not afterwarde trouble him any moze. Amongst the Ethniques also (as the same Ambrose affirmeth) was circumcision corruptly obserued after an other maner: for the Egyptians circumcised not in the eight daye, as God had commaunded, but in the 14. yere, for that Ismael at that age receiued circumcision. Which maner also it is most likely the Arabians followed: For at this day the Turkes also are circumcised at that age. Although the Egyptians (as the same Ambrose affirmeth) were wont also to circumcise theyr women kynde, and that in the 14. yere, as they did their males. And of this thinge they gaue this reaso, that they would by this signe signifie, that lust is to be restrained, which in eyther kinde at that age beginneth chiefly to be kyndled. But God commaunded, that onely the male Kindes should be circumcised: and yet were not the women of the Hebrewes therfore counted either straungers fro the Church or from the couenat. For they are alwayes numbred together with the men: they that were vnmarrid with their father, and the married with their husbandes.
 There haue bene some which haue by deceitfull arguments spoken yll of circumcision, and after a sozte reproued the God of the olde Testament. For first they sayd, that the foreskinne that was cut of, is eyther according to the nature of the of the body, or els it is against the nature thereof. If it be according to nature, why would God haue it cut of? If it be agaynst nature, why doth God suffer it to be brought forth. Ambrose in his 77. epistle to Constantinus answereth, That that foreskinne is according to the nature of our body: but it is not absurd, that those thinges which are agreable with our body or our flesh be cut of, if the spirite may thereby be hol-pen. Which thing we see done in fastings and other mortifications of the fleshe, and in bearing the crosse, which God hath layd vpon all the faithfull. In whereby we are compelled to suffer many thinges which are against the fleshe. Farther, they sayd, that God feared away the other nations from the law of Moses, when he layd vpon them this yoke of Circumcision. Which if it had bene alway, many straungers and outward nations would haue come vnto the religion of the He-brewes. But after the selfe same maner also they mought canell agaynst Christ him selfe, for that he seemed to feare away the world from his religion, partly by reason of the severity of his doctrine, and partly by reason of the persecutions and martirdome, which in the first time the most part of the faithfull were lyke to suffer. But they which truly pertaine vnto the number of the elect, doo in no wise leape backe because of the difficultie of the calling. But they which go backwards, were not of vs, and therfore they are fallen away. They maruayle also why God would in so tender age haue such a ceremonie exercised, which mought oftentimes bring weake litle bodies into danger. As touching age (saith Ambrose) as euery age is subiect vnto sinne, so also is it meete for the sacrament. And that Infants are subiect vnto sinne, theyr diseases, weepings, paines, and deathes abundantly declare.
 And if peradventure they were brought in daunger of their lyfe, yet was there no cause why they should complaine, for as much as they ought the same all whole vnto God. And yet (as they write) very few haue by that occasion died. And that payne and daunger brought some vtilitie. For euen as valiant soldours, when they remember that they haue before suffered many thinges for that they would not flee away, are the more animated to stand by it, least they should dishonor those scars and wounds, which they before suffered, rather then they would forsake theyr place and standing; So would God, that the hebrues being now of full age, and at mans state should defend the profession of theyr law euen agaynst all dangers, when they called to remembrance, that for religious sake they had bene wounded euer from theyr infancy. But now (he sayth) Circumcision is wholly refused of Christians for that forasmuch as Christ hath shed his blood the price of our redemption, there is now no neede that euery particular man should priuately shed his own blood. And as touching the sacrament of Circumcision, these thinges we thinke sufficient for this present purpose. Now let vs retorne againe vnto Paul.

For the promise, that he should be the heyre of the worlde, was not geuen vnto Abraham, or to his seede by the law, but by the righteousness of fayth. For if they which are of the law be heyres: fayth is made voyde, and the promise is made of none effect. For the law worketh wrath: for where no law is, there is no transgression.

The law
extendeth farther the circumcision.

Why the promise came not by the law.

If the lawe were added
vnto the promise, it should make it
voyde.

For the promise that he should be the heyre of the world, was not geuen vnto Abraham or to his seede by the law. [He hath before proued, that Abraham had not his righteousness by Circumcision: for that he had obtained it before he was circumsised. Now he proueth the same a maiori, that is, of a greater thing. By the law (saith he) was not the promise made: wherefore neither thorough Circumcision. The reason is hereby manifest, for that the law extendeth farther then Circumcision: for the law doth not onely containe it, but also other innumerable most excellent preceptes. And that the promise was not geuen thorough the law, as it were vpon a condition, may two manner of wayes be proued: First, as it is writtē vnto the Galathians: The law was geuen after the promise foure hundred yeres: wherefore forasmuch as it was not as yet extant, it could not be a condition of the promise then already made. No man (saith Paul) maketh voyde the testament of a man, or addeth any thyng therunto. But this reason taken of the time Paul here omitteth: partly because he had a little before used it, when he said, that Circumcision was geuen, after that Abraham was now already iustified: partly also because he woulde vse another reason more euident. The law (saith he) if it were added vnto the promise, should make it voyde and abolish fayth: for when the law entred into our wicked mindes, it setteth forth nothing before vs, but the wrath of God. And it is not possible, that it should bring vnto vs the promise or the inheritance of felicity. And that by the law cometh the wrath of God, he hereby proueth, for that where no law is, there is no transgression. Ambrose sayth, that the lawe was therefore geuen, to make the offenders guiltie. But they which are guilty, are either condemned, or els made vnnete to receiue the promises. For the sonne which by reason of his transgressions is disinherited, receaueth not the inheritance: So wee also by the law are adiudged to hell fire, and to the curse, rather then that by it we are made able to receaue the inheritance, and to obtayne the promise. Thus muche of the order of the argumentes. Now let vs examine euery thing particularly.

By the lawe (saith he) cometh not the promise. [For whē the inheritance of the world was promised vnto Abraham, there was no such condition added that he should obserue the law. This reason leadeth to an absurdity. For by this meanes both the promise, & fayth also should be made voyde. The Greke Scholies affirme, that we are iustified by fayth only. And vnder the name of Senecianus, is added a sentence that he which sticketh in the law, as though he could obtayne saluation, neglecteth that saluation which is by fayth. And Chrysost. sayth, that it mought be that some would say: Although we haue fayth, yet will we keepe the lawe also. But this he sheweth is not possible. For whosoener (saith he) obserueth the lawe as a thing geuing saluation disableth the power of fayth. Wherefore seeing the lawe is not annexed vnto the promise of God, as a condition of necessity, it followeth that he is presumptuous and rash who taketh vpon him to anere it. For lawyers say that priueleges and grantes of Princes are not to be contracted or narrowly skained, but rather wryth with reasonable fauour to be enlarged.

To be the heyre of the world. ] There is no where by expresse wordes had any such promise made to Abraham: howbeit it is contayned in those promises which we haue in the scripture. For God sayde vnto hym, that his seede should be multiplied lyke the sand of the sea, and the starres of heauen. Wherefore herein consisted the promise, that his seede should fill the whole worlde. For they are not counted his seede, which haue proceeded from hym only as touching the flesh: but which imitate hys sayth. And soasmuch as such are dispersed throughout the whole worlde, by them hath Abraham the inheritance of the whole worlde, which selfe thinge is very expressedly spoken, when God made this promise vnto hym: And in thy seede shall all nations be blessed. And although all these thinges are true, yet I thinke rather that this inheritance is to be referred vnto Christ. For he sayth, that all thinges are deliuered vnto hym of the father. And Dauid writeth, that he hath for hys inheritance all the Gentiles, and the endes of the earth. And sayth in Christ, who is in this sort the heire of the whole worlde, is it, which iustifieth: & all the promises of God (as we haue els where taught) are to be referred to this promise only. The prophetes haue oftentimes expressed this promise of the kingdome of Christ by the properties and conditions of a worldly kingdome, & of carnall felicity. For spirituall thinges can not by any other meanes be vnderstanded of gros wittes. Sometymes they say, that it shall one day come to passe, that the children of Israel being dispersed and exiles shalbe of the Gentiles brought home agayne in shippes to their owne place. They tell forth also, that kinges and princes should be the fosterers and nurces of the Iewes: And they threaten destruction to those kingdomes and nations, which will not obey the Israelites. But all these thinges are chiefly to be attributed vnto our great king Iesus Christ: of whome we reade in the Gospell, this is the heyre, come let vs kill hym. Dauid in the voyce of God the father writeth of Christ: Aske of me, and I will geue thee the Gentiles for thine inheritance: and the borders of the earth for thy possession. And in Daniell it is writen of the stone helmed out without hands, that it shoulde ouertrow the principalities of this world, and whe it is growen to a great huge mountayne, it shoulde possesse all thinges. And we, soasmuch as we are the members of Christ, can not be excluded from this inheritance. For in this selfe same epistle Paule writeth, that we shall be the heires of God, and the fellow heires of Christ, for that he is the first begotten amongst many brethren. Christ himselfe also sayth: Euen as the lining father sent me, so send I you: and dispose vnto you the kingdome, as the father hath disposed it vnto me. Where I am, I will that there also be my minister. Agayne in an other place, to the ende he woulde declare, that we are not excluded fro this inheritance, he sayth, blessed are the meke, for they shall possesse the earth. And Paule sayth, All thinges are yours, and you long to Christ, and Christ to God. Yea also the Angels serue the elect. He hath geuen charge (sayth he) to his Angels concerning thee, to keepe thee in all thy wayes. Farther by Christ is restored whatsoever was lost in Adam. Man, when he was created, was made vnto the image of God: which sentence the scripture strayght way interpreteth, to be ruler ouer all thinges created. And if Christ haue restored this Image, then also hath he rendred agayne the principality that was lost: and so hath rendred it, that the same is sayd by right to be restored vnto vs, by right (I say) of inheritance. Forther ought we to despaire of this promise, although the outward shew of thinges appeare now farre otherwise. They which pertaine vnto Christ are very weak. And the deuill stirreth by against them the Princes of this world, and tyrantes. Wherefore we seeme to be most nedy of all thinges, and to be most abject: when yet in very dede we are Lordes of all thinges. These thinges are hidden from the eyes of the flesh: but then shall they appeare, when Christ himselfe, in whome our life is hidden, shall appeare. Which is not spoken, as though Christ doth not now raygne. Vnto many peradventure he seemeth to be sle: but the godly feele, th it he raigneth most mightely in the congregation of the elect, which is the church. And he reigneth by the spirite & the word: that is, by faith, which cometh from the spirite, and depndeth of the word of God. Which faith, when the elect haue obtained, they haue obtained the victorie against the world. For Iohn saith, This is the victory, which ouercometh the world, your faith. And soasmuch as the faithfull vnderstand that all thinges are theirs, they are content with meate and drinke, and apparell: as for other thinges they vse of them so much as is expedient vnto their vocation. Finallye, there is nothing in the world, which turneth not to their profite. The Chiliasis, whom in Latin we may call Millenarij, thought that this inheritance of the whole world shal be declared before the end of this world, when Christ, as they thought, shall raygne a thousand yeares in this world with his saintes, hauing destroyed and overcome all the wicked. And these men, it should seme, followed the oracle, which is sayde to come from Elias, That the world should endure. 6000. yeares. And these yeares they thus describe, saying that. 2000. yeares passed away before the law, 2000. vnder the law, and as many shall be vnder the Gospell. Afterward they adde a thousand yeares, in which they say shall be the chiefe rest: so that the thousand last yeares they call the Sabbath. And so they appoint a weke, in which euery particular day is taken for a thousand yeares: according to that which is said, a thousand yeares are wyth the Lord as one day, & againe one day, as a thousand yeres. Augustine maketh mencion of this opinion in his. 20. booke, and. 7. chapter de ciuitate Dei, and saith, that it was after a sorte tollerable, & that he himselfe was once of the same minde. But that which they added concerning pleasures, delightes, and worldly honours, which they sayd, all the saythfull should for the space of those thousand yeares enioy together with Christ, he earnestly reproveth. They vsurped certaine testimonies of the scriptures, wherby they thought to establishe their fond inuention. For in the Apocalips the. 27. chapter it is witten, that Christ shall raigne a thousand yeares with the saintes, hauing in the meane time overcome, and vanquished Sathan. They leane also vnto a saying of Christ in Luke the. 22. chapter, That ye may eate and drinke vpon my table. I wyll so dispose the kingdome vnto you, as my father hath disposed it vnto me. Finallye, the oracles of the Prophetes, which by temporall descriptions shadowed the kingdome of Christ, they so take, as though they were no otherwise to bee vnderstande, then they seme for at the first sight. And they in suche sorte speake of this matter, as though in the last time shall be restored the golden world, which is described, of the Poetes. There were of this opinion men not of the meanest sort, as Papias which liued in the Apostles tyme, Irenens, Apollinarius, Tertullian, Victorinus, Lactantius, and Methodius the Martir. Wherfore Hierom in his 4. booke vpon Jeremy writeth, that he durst not condemn that sentence, because many ecclesiasticall men and Martyrs had died beyng of that opinion. Whobett in an other place he manifestly derideth these Millenarij, and very pleasauntly mocketh them. Eusebius Cesariensis, in the third booke of his history, saith: that this opinion had his beginning of Cherinus thus the heretike: of whom Dionysius bishop of Alexandria, expounding the Apoc. of Iohn thus writeth: that he was altogether geuen to lustes and vnto the bellye, and therefore attributed these carnall delightes vnto the kingdome of Christ, which should continue a thousand yeares. Neither contendeth he onely that there should be marriages and procreations of children all that whole time, but also that there should be circumcision, sacrifices and other ceremonies of the law. But sithen we see that Irenens is agaynst Cherinus, we cannot easely thinke, that he was wholly of the selfe same opinion touching this fable. And doubtles it is possible, that amongst these Millenarij, some were touching one, and the same thing of an opinion, and other some of an other opiniō. For it is very likely, that by reason of that place of the Apocalips, some holy men were brought into this opinion, to thinke y Christ should in this world raigne with his a thousand yeares: but touching the restoring of the law, the reedifying of Jerusalem with precious stones, the bringing in agayne of delightes and pleasures of this world, they were vtterly agaynst it. For how is it possible

possible, that the law which hath brought no man to perfection, shall be the of greatest force, when the state of the godly shall be most perfect: Doubtles men that are of full age haue no neede of a scholemaster: and they which haue profited much, neede not to be brought backe againe to learne their first rudiments. But Lactantius, as touching pleasures & delights, writeth nothing els, but that the earth shall at that time shew forth her fertileness, & shall of her owne accord bring forth fruites most plentifully. For hony shall run down the rocks, vine trees shall spread along the rivers, and the founts shall flow ouer with milke: But all these thinges are the inuentions of men, and the same, such fayned deuises, that they are manifestly repugnant vnto the word of God. Christ whē he entreateth with the Saducees concerning the resurrection, affirmeth, that the sayntes shall be like the angels of God, as which shall neyther marry wyues, nor be married. And Paul, when vnto the Thessalonians he setteth forth the history of our resurrection, maketh no mention of such trifles. Whis onely he saith, That we shall not preuent those which haue slept in the Lord, but shall be taken up together wyth them to mete Christ in the ayre, and so shall alwaies be with the Lord. Farther our sauour hath testified, that his kingdome is not of this world. And Paule to the Corinthians saith: That we after the resurrection shall be spirituall, and also that the belly and meates shall bee destroyed. And to the Rom. he saith: that the kingdome of God is not meate and drinke. In the booke of the Apoc. a thousand yeres are taken for a long tyme, as he saith: That he would haue his myracles testified vnto a thousand generatiōs, & is, for euer. So y number of an hundredeth signifieth an absolute reward. For so Christ saith, that he would render an hundredeth fold to those which forsake all that they haue for his sake. And oftentimes in y holy scriptures, a number certain is put for a number vncertain & infinit. And wher as it is written in the Apoc. y the deuill shall be bound for a 99. yeres, Augustine referreth y to the state of this present tyme, wherein by the benefite of Christ, that strong man is so vnarmed and overcome and spoiled, that he cannot seduce the elect vnto destruction. And y table of Christ at which the sayntes shall eate and drinke, Ambrose vpon Luke interpreteth to be the communication of eternall lyfe, and of the chiefe felicitie. The prophets also oftentimes vsed similitudes taken of kingdomes of this world, to describe the kingdome of Christ: that the ruler sorte mought the caselier vnderstand the thinges that were spoken. And as touching this matter let this suffice.

Forasmuch as Paul saith: that the promise consisteth not of the law, but of faith: and bringeth this reason, for y other wise both the promise should be voyde & faith made of none effect, a man mought doubt, if there be so small agreement betwene the promise and the law, how it came to passe, that God vnto his law and precepts annexed so many promises. For he hath promised to do good vnto a thousand generations of them that obserue his law: and to geue long life to them that honoꝝ they parents. And Christ himself saith, If thou wilt enter into life kepe the commandementes. Geue, and it shall be geuen vnto you, forgone and it shall be forgiven you. Here we muste make a distinction of promises. For some of the pertaine to the Gospel, & concerne iustification, & eternall saluation. These thinges he pende not of the condition of the lawe, as Paul testifieth. For then should they be voyde, for as much as none of vs is able to accomplish the law: and that partly by reason of our infirmity, and partly by reason of the wonderfull excellency of the law it self. Our infirmity Paul declareth in this epistle, when he saith That which was impossible vnto the law, in as much as it was weakened through the flesh &c. Wherby it is manifest y the flesh is the let, y we can not perform those thinges which are commaunded in y law. And in y 7. chapt. he saith, that in our flesh dwelleth no good, so that we doo those thinges which we would not. And the excellency of the law is vnderstanded by the 5. 6 & 7. chapters of Mathew: and especially by that precept, Thou shalt loue the Lord thy God with all thine hart, and with all thy soule &c. And on the other side, Thou shalt not lust. And Paul ioyned these two causes together, when in the 7. chapter of this epistle he sayd: The law indeede is spirituall: but I am carnall, sold vnder sinne. This is the reason why the promise of the Gospel consisteth

uers obtain the promises annexed vnto the
law.

A coullation againste
the reason of Paule.

Useth not of the law: which thing also Paul expressed in that that he sayth, that the law worketh anger. But there are other promises annexed vnto the law, and to certayne perticular commandements, and those we say are not put in vaine. For after that a man is once iustified, there beginneth in him a certayne obedience of the commandements of God: and the same pleaseth God: which obedience although it be not absolute and perfect, yet is it so imputed vnto the beleeuers, as if it were perfect, & by that meanes we obteyne the promises annexed vnto the commandementes: whiche yet should in vaine be hoped for without iustification, and the promise of the Gospel. And this is a notable place, and woorthy neuer to slip out of our memory: That the promise consisteth not of the law. And if any man will by the law vnderstand ceremonies, straightway ought to be layde agaynst hym those thinges which follow, the lawe worketh anger: and this, that the promise shoulde be firme. In which places is most manifestly declared, that the law is not to be vnderstand only of ceremonies, but also of the morall part. For by neglecting or not observing it, we fall into the wrath of God. Although there are some which go about riddingly to auoyde the strength of this reason. For they say, if the inheritance shoulde consist of ceremonies, the promise shoulde be vncertayne. For those ceremonies were not common vnto the Gentiles, vnto whome yet was promised salvation. Wherefore at the least as touching the Gentiles, sayth shoulde be vncertayne, and also the promise. But if it were so, the argument of the Apostle shoulde be absurde: for the aduersaries, and the false Apostles would haue sayde: therefore to the ende the promise shoulde not be vncertayne, let the Gentiles also receaue the ceremonies. And so Paul shoulde haue vsed that fallace, which is called peticio principii, and shoulde haue taken that as a ground, which he shoulde first haue proued, namely, that the Gentiles ought not to be compelled vnto ceremonies. But they are most manifestly confuted by that that is added, that the lawe worketh anger. Which thinge vndoubtedly agreeth rather with morall preceptes, then with ceremoniall. The Apostle moughte haue proued his argument by that, which we haue a litle befoze made mencion of, that none of vs is able to kepe the law. But he omitteth that at this present. And to conclude the moze evidently, he addeth, that the lawe worketh anger. As if he shoulde haue sayde: So farre is it of, that the lawe bringeth the inheritance, that it rather maketh vs guilty, and subject vnto the wrath of God. And if thou demanda, why the law doth in such sort bring vnto vs anger, we may answere, because we are not able to kepe it. For by anger Paul vnderstandeth nothing els, but the vengeance of God, and that by the figure Metonymia. For men when they are angry, are accustomed to auenge: whiche thinge God also doth although he be not moued with humane affections. This selfe same thinge hath Paul to the Galathians, in other wordes expressed, saying, Cursed be he that abideth not in all the thinges that are written in the booke of the law. And a curse in the holy scriptures signifieth nothing els, but calamity, affliction and misery. I meruaile that Origen vnderstandeth this saying of Paul, of the lawe of the members: for that vndoubtedly is so farre wide from the purpose. For the Iewes glozied not of the concupiscence which was in them by nature, which is called of Paul the lawe of the members: but they boasted of the lawe of God, which was geuen them of God by Moses. Wherefore that the Apostle mought with some fruite deale agaynst them, it behoued him to write of that lawe, whereof they boasted. Howbeit by Origenes wordes our aduersaries may see, what he thought of naturall concupiscence. Vndoubtedly seing he sayth, it worketh anger, it followeth that he iudged, that the first motions, which are deriued out of it, are of necessity sinnes and transgressions. I know there haue bene some, which haue taken anger in this place, not for the anger of God, but for our owne anger. For sozasmuch as we are by nature prone vnto vices, and the lawe when it commeth forbiddeth them, we beginne to hate God the authoz of the lawe: and so it worketh in vs anger. But the

the first exposition is bothe plainer, and also better agreeth with the sentence following.

For where no law is, there is no transgression.] By these wordes it is manifest that the Apostle ment to signifie this, that the wrath of God is kindled against transgressions. But how transgression is brought in by the law, the nature of relatives teacheth: which is such, that the one of them being taken away, the other also is taken away. On the one side is put the law: on the other side is set either the obseruation or transgression thereof. And forasmuch as the obseruation of the law can not be perfect, there remaineth onely transgression, which Paul in this place inferreth. But those thinges which are here spoken, are to be vnderstande of the law written, and whiche was geuen by Moses. For otherwise there is none, which wanteth a law, at the least undoubtedly the law of nature. Wherefore there can none be found without sinne: no not an infant of a day olde, when as vnto him the image of God is in steede of a law: vnto which image for that he answereth not (as Augustine declareth in his booke of confessions) undoubtedly he can not be without sinne. As touching the letter, the Greke wordes wordes is eu with aspiration, & so it is turned in Latine cuius, that is, of whome. But the vulger interpreter seemeth to haue read eu, and therfore turned it ubi, that is, where. But as touching the sense, there is no difference, whether it be this, or that. Whotbeit let vs not thinke, that these thinges are to be ascribed vnto the lawe, as it is taken by it selfe alone: but as it lighteth vpon our mynde being corrupt and vitiate. We haue of this thing an example (although grosse) in gonne powder, wherewith is mingled either salt nitre or salt peter, which is by nature very cold. And thereof it cometh, that when the fire is receiued in the bymstone, against which striueth the coldnes of salt nitre, or of the salt peter, it conceiueh so great a violence, that the pellet being driuen out with an incredible force, shaketh and ouerthroweth whatsoeuer is in the way. So the heate of our lust, when it findeth the law repugnant agaynst it, is with a greater violence strengthened, so that it enforceth men to most haynous wicked actes. For as the common saying is: We endeavour our selues to that whiche is forbidden vs, and we haue alwayes a desire to thinges denied vs. Whotbeit to the godly and to the elect, this force of the law is not vnprofitable. For it leadeh them euen as a scholemaster vnto Christ. And for that cause Christ is iustly and worthely called the ende of the law: not for that the law is by him abrogated, but because it directeth men vnto him. Finally Christ hath performed and accomplished the law not onely in himselfe, but also in them that beleue in hym: for he hath geuen them strengthes to obey it. Neyther is it any maruell, that the law bringeth men vnto Christ, especially saying he himselfe was the author thereof. For by the Sonne it was reuealed vnto Moses. And for this ende he gaue it, by it to drawe men vnto hym. Here are we admonished of the perversenes of our nature, whiche is so greates, that although we be taught the will of God by the lawe, yet we neuer cease to strine agaynst it. Some goe aboute by this place to inferre, that they do ill whiche set forth the lawes, especiallly saying they serue verpe muche to increase transgressions. But if their argument were of any strengthe, then shoulde they inferre that God also oughte not to haue made any lawe. Wherefore we say, that those lawes whiche are made, are either iust or vniust. If they be vniust, then are they not to be counted for lawes. For who will call the violent affectes of tyrantes lawes? But if they be iust, then are they interpretations of the lawes of God. And by them we vnderstande the will of God, that by that meanes, we may be broughte to Christe, that by him we may obtaine strengthes to do them. This selfe same sentence also is had in the epistle to the Galathians, That the lawe was put because of transgressions, namely, to shew forth the, to accuse them, & to condemne them. So in the latter epistle to the Corinthians, the law is called the ministry of death: and in the first to the Cor. it is called the power & efficacy of sinne. And before in this epistle, by the law is said to come the knowledge of sinne. Wherefore a man may not without iust cause meruaile, what moued Paul to write so like things so oftentimes of the lawe. But we oughte to consider that it is moste likely, that in the primitive church, when Christ beganne euery where to be receued, the deuill craftely inuented an other new deuise, to extol the law by all manner of meanes, that it might be had in estimation, not onely of the Jewes, but also of the Gentles, that in the mean time Christian religion might be weakened, and cleane taken away. And he blinded the eyes of men, that none should haue an eye vpon Christ, which was the end of the law. And lest any man should by often reading of the law, attaine to any continuance, he found the meanes, that he gaue themselues to brawling about wordes, and old waines questions. Wherefore Paul was brought to this point, that either he must reiect the lawe of God, or els haue wincked at the lettes of the Gospell. Wherefore by great aduise he teacheth thre things. For first, considering the lawe of God by it self, and in his owne nature, he with worthy praises extollet it, and therewithall sheweth, what evils by it come vnto vs thorough our owne default: Secondly, he teacheth that Christ is the ende of the law: last of al, he cutteth of brawlings, contencions, disputations, and impropriable questions, and which make nothing to the purpose. These self same things in a maner, happen also in our tymes. Our aduersaries cry out, God workes, god workes: as though we were agaynst them. Farther they wyll not that the people should vnderstand the mercy & grace of God, & benefite of Christ. Lastly, they continually braule & contend to hinder & iust reformation of the church, & so continually prolong the tyme, to the ende nothing shoulde be put in execution. But let vs learne of Paul how we may warily and wisely resist them. Let vs leaue vnto god workes, their dignitie: but yet not in such sorte to attribute more vnto them, then either the truth and holy scriptures will suffer, or els is agreable with our weake nature. Farther let vs as plainly as we can out of the holy scriptures declare the grace of God and benefite of Christ: Lastly let vs abstayne from superfluous and contentious questions. By these wayes and meanes may we well withstand the deuill. Neither doth the deuill these things by himselfe: but alwayes findeth instrumentes apte for his wicked purpose: whome Paule calleth deceitfull workers, which transforme themselves into aungels of light, and euery where sowe discordes and offences, bewitching men that are in the ryght course, and leading men from Christ to estimation of themselves. He calleth them moreover, chynge cut of, dogges, enemies of the crosse of Christ, whose God is the belly, and end destruction: which wyll be teachers of the law, and yet in the meane tyme know not what they affirme and speake: whiche by a fayned modesty and affliction of the flesh, and worshippynge of angels, and religion of themselves deuised, take away from men the reward of saluation: which after they haue fallen away from the loue which procedeth from a pure hart, a good conscience, and an vnfeined faith, turne themselves to vayne speeches, and range and creepe abroad like a canker: which although in wordes they say they know God, yet in dedes they deny hym. With these counteours both the Apostle paint forth false ministers, agaynst whome he had muche to do: vnto whome they are not vnlike, which in our dayes withstand the restorynge of religion. Wherto he hath bled reasons ab absurdo, that is, dyuine to an absurditie. If the inheritaunce should consist of the law, then should faith be vayne, and the promise of none effect: and to affirme either of them, were very absurd. His argument he hereby proued: for that the law worketh anger, and is alwayes toynd with some transgression. Now he proueth by a direct reason, that the inheritaunce consisteth of faith: namely, that it might be of grace, to the ende the promise should be firme. As if he should haue sayd, it behoueth that the nature of Gods promises be kept. For such is the nature thereof, that it be certayne, and come freely. But it can not be certayne and come freely, vnlesse we be made hepyes by fayth, and not by the lawe.

Therefore is the inheritaunce geuen by fayth, that it might come by grace, and that the promise might be firme to all the sede, not to that onely which is of the law, but also to that which is of & fayth

of Abraham, who is the father of vs all, as it is written, I haue made thee a father of many nations, accordyng to the example of God, whome he beleied, who restoreth to lyfe the dead, and calleth those thinges which are not, as though they were. Whiche aboue hope beleied vnder hope that he should be the father of many nations, accordyng to that which was spoken vnto hym: So shall thy seede be. And he not weake in fayth, considered not his owne body which was now dead, beyng almost an hundredth yere olde, neyther the deadnes of Saraes wombe. Neither did he doubt of the promise of God through vnbellefe, but was strengthened in faythe, & gaue glory to God, beyng full assured that he which had promised was also able to do it. And therefore it was imputed vnto hym for righteousnes.

Therefore is the inheritaunce geuen by faith. By this place we see, that to attaine to any thing by faith, is with Paul nothing els, but to haue it freely. Wherefore it ought not to seme meruailous, that we haue oftentimes inculcated, that to be iustified by fayth, is to be vnderstande of the obiect of fayth, that is, of the mercy and promise, that we may be iustified freely. Chrysostome sayth, if the promise should come of the law, we should not neede that saluation, which we obteyne by fayth and grace. But now where as the Apostle saith, that the promise oughte to be firme vnto all the seede of Abraham, that ought to be vnderstanded both of the Iewes, and also of the Gentles: as though in Abraham were a double posteritie. And this is chiefly to be noted, which here is alleaged of the certaintie of the promise. For, that may not either be wantyng or doubtful. For, that whiche we apprehende by fayth oughte to be certayne. Whiche is onely the woꝛde of God, wherunto onelye fayth ought to leane. Wherefore besides the holy Scriptures there is nothing that shoulde be beleied. For it can not be constant and firme. And whatsoever is not of fayth is sinne. For if the conscience doo not by fayth beleue, that that which we do, pleaseth God, or also if it suspect, that it is not acceptable before him, and yet in the meane tyme we do the selfe same thing, vndoubtedly that which we do is sinne. And so both Basilins in his Epistols the 80. sum in a maner towards the end of the booke interpretate that place which we haue alleaged. Wherefore we ought not ether to add any thing vnto the woꝛd of God, or to take any thyng from it, as in which only are contained the promises: Otherwise both our fayth and our conscience should haue no certaintie wherunto to leane. And this certaintie wherof we speake, dependeth of two principal pointes. Of which the first is, that it be plaine by the woꝛd of God: then which, can nothing be moꝛe firme or constant. But some man will say God by the prophet Ionas sayd it should come to passe, that the city of Ninine shoulde be destroyed, and that after 40. dayes. And by Esaie the Prophet he sheweth vnto Ezechias the king, that he should dye: which thinges yet came not to passe as they were sayd. Yea also the lord him selfe in Jeremy the 18. chapter thus speaketh, If I shall speake of any kingdome, or nation, to roote it out and to destroye it and they in the meane tyme repent them, I also will repent me. And on the other side, if I shall speake to plante, and to build any kingdome or nation, and they in the meane tyme behaue themselves wickedly, I will not performe these changes which I haue spokē. But we answer, that the promise wherof Paul here speaketh dependeth not of any condition, as doo a greate many promises of the law, vnto which pertaine these threatnings which are now alleaged yea the Apostle himselfe sufficiently expreth, of what kind of promises he speaketh when he sayth, By fayth, that it should be of grace. For if it consist freely, the hangeth it not of any condition, or supposition, and by this means the promise can in no case be made frustrate. This may the easier be vnderstand by a similitude: If a physician should by taking of any medicine promise health, but yet vpon this con-

To haue a thing by fayth to haue it freely.

In Abraham a double posterity.

Besides the holy scriptures there is nothing that can be beleied, but the woꝛd of God, wherunto onelye fayth ought to leane.

Two principal pointes wherupon dependeth the certaintie of the promises.

Paul speaketh not of such a promise as is annexed with a condition.

Which condition is not conditionally.

dition, that he would haue for his paynes infinite summes of money, & that the sicke persō should obserue a very hard diet, a poore man might easily answere that that promise of health is vayne, both for that he hath not the money to pay, and also for that being weak he is not able to obserue the diet which is prescribed him. But contrariwise, if a man promise a medicine which he will geue freely, neither requirerh any worke of the sicke person, but only that he woulde drinke, or some other way receaue his medicine, this promise is easily made firme. So vndoubtedly standeth the case here: the promise is offered vnto vs, and that freely. For only is of vs required, that by fayth we receaue it. And this is the first principall poynte, whereupon dependeth the certaintie of the promise: namely, for that the promise consisteth of the word of God, and is offered freely. The other principall poynt is, the nature of fayth. For fayth is an assent not vncertaine or doubtfull, but fixed and constant, as the Apostle wyl afterward moze at large declare, when he discourseth the example of Abraham. By these two principall poyntes it is manifest how wickedly they deale, which teach me continually to doubt of the promise of saluation. For if as the holy scriptures teach vs we ought to hope, and such is the nature of hope, not to confound, we may manifestly inferre, that we ought not to doubt of our saluation. There are, which pretend, that their doubt hereof springeth, for that they are vncertaine, whether they shall perseuer vnto the ende or no. But these men should consider, that we ought alwayes to pray for perseuerance. For, as saith Ciprian, whome also Augustine followeth, In all the thinges which we aske in the Lordes prayer, is included perseuerance. And as Iames teacheth, We must aske without doubting. Wherefore it is manifest, that we must by no meanes doubt of perseuerance, and especially seeing we haue in our hartes the holy ghost alwayes bearing an excellent testimony vnto vs thereof. For as Paul sayth in this epistle, It is the spirit, which beareth witness vnto our spirit, that we are the sonnes of God. And he which hath not the spirit of Christe, is not hye. And Paul writeth of himselfe, that he is sure, that neither life, nor death, nor principalities, nor powers can plucke hym from the loue of God, namely, from that loue wherewith God loued hym. But that is frivoulous, which some alleadge, namely, that Paul speaketh these thinges of himselfe only, and that by a certayne peculiar and assured relation. For when we comie to that place, we will declare, that those thinges pertaine to all men vniuersally. Other say, that finnes feare vs away from the assured confidence of our saluation. But so long as we are in this life, we can not be without finnes. For Iohn sayth, If we say, we haue no sinne, we deceaue our selues, and the truth is not in vs. Wherefore so to teach is nothing els but to drine men to desperation. Finally so much as Paul saith, that we being iustificed freely haue peace towards God, it manifestly declareth, that the saythfull are certain of theyr saluation: other wise there can be no tranquillity, & peace in the conscience. Howbeit there are certayne thinges to be taken heede of, that we be not dangerously deceaued in this certaintie. For first we ought to knowe, that it springeth not of any righteousness which is in our mindes: and farther, that they which are most assured, do not for all that want trembling and feare, but are soze afraid of falles and of offending of God. Neither can that certaintie, which we speake of, haue ioynd with it that kinde of sinne, which, as Augustine speaketh, wasteth away the conscience. And we must chiefly beware, that this certaintie be not applied to licentiousnes and liberty of the flesh. But in such sort ought we to frame our selues, that we should alwayes dispayre as touching our selues: but contrariwise put all our confidence in God only. Lastly this is to be knowen that it is not possible, that so long as we lyue here, we should be so assured in fayth, that there should neuer arys any doubt. Neither are these thinges repugnant one to the other, but that we may both beleue, and also be assured, and yet in the meane time be moued with some doubtfulness. For these thinges procede of diuers principles. As for example, reason iudgeth, that the dybe of the Sunne is bigger then the whole earth: but yet in the meane tyme the sence both doubteth touching that matter, and also testifieth otherwise. John also sayth, he which is borne of God sinneth not: Pot best contrariwise he sayth, If we say we haue no sinne, we lye, for we do not alwayes worke by that ground where by we are regenerate: and therefore we oftentimes fall & sinne. So also must we think of certainty & doubting, that they procede not out of one & the self same principles or grounds. For doubting procedeth fro our flesh, fro humane weaknes & humane wisdom. But certainty, cometh of ffaith which we haue towards god. But because we do not alwayes worke by faith, the of it cometh that we oftentimes doubt. But at the last the strength of faith getteth the vpper hand, and driueth away the cloude of doubting. Now let vs see, how Paul declareth vnto vs the certaynty of the promise by the second principle, namely by the propriety and nature of faith. This thing he doth in discoursing the example of Abraham, of whome he thus writeth.

Which is the father of vs all. As it is written, I haue made thee a father of many nations. Abraham is a father of many nations, that is, of all those, which beleue, in what place of the world so euer they be. And he is called the father of the beleuers, both bycause he was an example of faith vnto the beleuers, and also taught and preached the same. This is that communion of Saintes, which we professe in the Simbole or Creede.

According to the example of God. In Greeke it is κατ' εἶδος, which Chrysostome interpreteth by this aduerbe of similitude, as, as though Abraham were like vnto God. And this likenes the same Chrysostome declareth two maner of waies. First, for that as God is not the father of one nation, and not also of another: So also Abraham is not in such sorte the father of some beleuers, that he is not also the father of other beleuers. Secondly, for that as God is not our father by kindred of flesh, but by a spirituall maner. So Abraham is not in such sorte the father of all the beleuers, that he hath begotten them according to the flesh: but as we haue sayd, by a spirituall kindred. That Greeke word may signifie, Before: so that he was the father of all the beleuers before God: namely, because it can not be vnderstand by humane sense and reason, that Abraham is the father of all the beleuers, but this is vnderstand onely before God: that is, by the power of the spirite. This word also κατ' εἶδος, may signifie Before in such sort, as in the booke of Genesis the woman is sayd to be made a helper vnto the man, y she should be Benegdo, that is, before him, as if a man should say, a thing apte, and haning proportion and iust analogy vnto the man: and which shoulde euer be at hande, which maner of helpe coulde not be found for Adam amongst the other living creatures. And if a man demaund, seing that we differ from God by an infinite distance of perfection: What analogy or proportion can we haue towards him, I answer, that that cometh to passe by the helpe of faith. For by it we receiue the giftes and promises, which God hath decreed to fulfill in vs, when yet our strength and power can by no meanes be made equall with God. Suche a lyke thing haue the Philosophers of God, the first cause of all thinges: vnto whom they say by a certaine proportion and analogy answereth that which they cal the first matter: for that in power it is apt to receaue all maner of formes, which God would bring forth. So we by faith are made apt to receaue the promises of God, and so we are set before him, or ouer against him. Howe be it euerye man must diligently take heede, that he haue so muche faith as is sufficient, least hee should be overcome of the promises of God. This is that wrestling of Jacob with God. For he would not be overcome of him, but wrestled against him, and receaued the blessing.

peared in the creation of the world. For when God did onely commaund, that any thing should be, straight way it was. By which kinde of speeche is shewed the easines of creation of thinges: for in it there is no more grieue to God, then it is to vs when we call anye manne. Here is declared also, that by the sonne, whiche is the word of the father, were and are all thinges made. We also when we are regenerate, are sayd to be called.

Which about hope beleeued vnder hope.

Which about hope beleeued vnder hope. This kinde of speach seemeth at the first sight absurde. For how is it possible, that a man should be about hope, haue not withstanding hope? Chrysostome very well expoundeth this: About the hope (saith he) of man, and vnder the hope of God. And it is all one, as if a man should haue sayd, he hoped euen in thinges desperate, or elles when there was no hope at all, yet hoped he. But in that word is vsed the figure Metonymia. For, by hope, in this place we vnderstande, those thinges whiche are hoped for. The meaning is: Contrary to those thinges whiche moughte by man haue bene hoped for, he wayted for those thinges whiche were set forth by God to be hoped for. In this example of Abraham, which the Apostle hath taken in hande to entreat of, is verie aptly described the nature and property of faith. For faith is the gift of God, wherby we firmly assent vnto his promises, stryving agaynst the flesh and humayne wisdom. What it is the gift of God, Paul to the Ephesians by expresse wordes testifieth, when he sayth, that by faith we are saued, and that not of our selues: for (saith he) it is the gift of God. And euen as the Philosophers supposed, that the strengths and faculties of men are not sufficient to do all thinges absolutely and perfectly, & therefore held y we haue nede of habites or qualities, yin sodaine cases we mought be redy to do well, so that we should nede no long deliberation, and that that whiche we do, we mought do it both easely and pleasantly: so also ought we, for the receiuing of those thinges which are of God, to haue our minde and vnderstandyng strengthened by some power, from without vs, and geuen vnto vs: sayng that thorough the default of our first parent, we are most vnapt to vnderstande the hidden thinges of God. And forasmuch as those thinges, wherunto our faith hath a respect, are altogether deuine, it followeth of necessity, that to vnderstand them, we be holpen also by deuine inspiratiō. But we must now declare what is the chiefest thing wherunto our faith is directed: and that (to speake briefly) is the promise of God, wherunto by beleeuing we assent. And this promise is chiefly y wherin he promisseth, that he will thorough Christ be fauourable and mercifull vnto vs: And although in the holy scriptures are red and offred vnto vs very many promises of God, yet this one is the chiefest, for whose sake the rest are performed vnto vs, vnto whiche also are all other promises to be referred. This promise, as we haue before sayde, is that, wherein God promisseth, that he will be mercifull vnto vs for Christs sake. And although there be very many thinges which we ought to beleue, as threatnings, histories, exhortations, prayes of God, and such other like, yet ought all these thinges to be referred, to perswade vs of this promise onely. Hereby is manifest, what is the chiefest object of faith: for the common object of faith, or (as they call it) the equall object, is the word of God set forth in the holy scriptures. Beyond this object, faith extendeth not it selfe. For as Paul sayth, faith commeth of hearing, and hearing by the word of God. This thing our aduersaries can by no meanes abide: for they contend, that there are certayne thinges, I know not what, to be beleeued, which are not conteyned in the holy scriptures. But we say, y faith is an assent, whiche is geuen vnto the holy scripture, & vnto those thinges, whiche are necessarily and euidently concluded of it. Amongst other thinges they are wont to object vnto vs y perpetuall virginity of the mother of Christ: whiche they say, is to be beleeued, although it be not had in the holy scriptures. They obiekt moreover that y authority of y holy scripture depēdeth of y church, and can not be proued by the scriptures themselves. As touchinge the firste, it is sufficient for vs, that we are taught by the holy scriptures, that Christ was conceived and borne of a virgin. And aboue that to affirme, that the blessed virgin was ioyned with man as touching fellowshipp of the flesh, it were rash & presumptuous.

sumptuous. For seeing that is nether had in the holy scriptures nor yet is verely likely, why (in Gods name) ought we either to beleue it or to affirme it: And contrariwise, that she abode perpetually a virgin, soasmuch as the holy scriptures doo not by expresse wordes auouch the same, it is not to be receaued amongst those things, which are of necessity to be beleued: as are those things which are expressely contained in the holy scriptures. Ierom of this matter wrote against Heluidius. For he was woorthely to be condemned, for that he rashly affirmed, that she was not perpetually a virgine. And Augustine very well admonisheth vs, that when we come to such places where the sence of the scripture can not certainly be gathered, we shoulde not hedlong runne vnto ether parte. As touching the other objection, we haue oftentimes declared, that it is not true, which they take as graunted, that the scripture hath his authority of the Church. For the steadfastnes therof dependeth of God, and not of men, and the word was both firme and certayne befoze the Church beganne. For the Church was called by the word. And the spirit of God wrought in the hartes of them that beleued the word, and of them that red it, to acknowledge it to be no humane wordes, but altogether deuine. wherfoze fro the holy ghost came the authority vnto the word of God, and not from the Church: But they say, Augustine writeth agaynst the epistle called epistola Fundamenti. I would not beleue the Gosples except the authority of the Church had moued me therunto. But Augustine by those wordes would signify nothing els, but that we must attribute much vnto the ministry of the church which setteth forth, preacheth and inculcatheth the Gosples to all the saythfull, for which of vs hath come vnto Christ, or beleued the Gosples, but that he hath bene stirred vp by the preaching of the Gosples, which is done in the Church, and yet thereby can not be gathered that the authority of the Gosples dependeth of the Church in the mindes of the hearers. For if it lay in it, to cause the scripture to be receaued, then vndoubtedly had it long ago perswaded the Epicures and Eurkes to beleue the same. But the matter is farre otherwise. For whatsoever authority the Church hath, or the ministers thereof, the same dependeth wholly of the word of God. For if a man shoulde demaund of them, how they proue the authority of the Church, or how they are certayne that erreth not in vnderstanding of the holy scriptures, and discerning them from other writings they will answer, bicause it is gouerned by the holy ghost. But I beseech you how know ye that: Bicause Christ (they will say) hath promised that he will be with it euer vnto the end of the world. And bicause he hath also sayd, Where soeuer shall be two or three gathered together in my name there am I in the midst of them. And agayne, I will send the holy ghost the comforter which shall lede you into all truth. These are the thinges (say they) which perswade vs of the authority of the Church. But I would sayne know from whence ye receaued these thinges, if not out of the holy scriptures: Wherfoze we may contrariwise conclude, that the Church hath his authority of the scripture. Farther by this place of Paule is declared an other difference of sayth: namely, that it is a firme assent. For he setteth forth of Abraham, that he nothing doubted. And he bleth this verbe διὰ τὴν πίστιν, which signifieth, to reason with himselfe and to put doubt. In which signification the Actes of the Apostles vse the selfe same word. For it is so sayde vnto Peter, that he shoulde go vnto Cornelius the Centurion, καὶ διὰ τὴν πίστιν, that is, nothing doubting. Abraham had a respect vnto the will and power of God which made the promise: and not to his owne infirmity, or to the infirmity of his wife. Set God aside, and he had nothing whereby he coulde promise himselfe any such thing. Wherfoze, as sayth the Apostle, he was strengthened in sayth, nether doubted he through vnbeleefe which is all one, as if he had sayd. On euery side els were offered vnto him incredulity and doubting. Neither ought this sentence to be reponed, for that that we fele no such experience in our selues. For there is none, in whose minde sometymes ariseth not some doubt touching those thinges which we beleue. For this cometh not of sayth, but of our infirmity.

Which thing we may easily be instructed of by þ which we see to happen in þ habits or quality of any science, especially of the mathematical science. For therein is certainty, and that undoubtedly very great. For the conclusions there necessarily and most evidently follow of the premises. But if a man haue not perfectly learned, or absolutely attained vnto the science, he shal sometimes doubt.
And this cometh to passe not by meanes of the science, but by reason of the default of him which vnderstandeth the science. So we, because so long as we liue here, we are weake, nether can haue a full and perfect faith, therefore oftentimes do arise in vs doubts, yea euen agaynst our willes, but it is farre otherwise of the nature of an opinion which is such, that there can be no blame layde vnto vs, if we somewhat encline vnto the other part from that which we thinke to be true. And the infirmity which happeneth vnto vs, concerning faith, may come two wayes. For sometimes we firmly cleaue vnto those things which we beleue: but yet are there other things behind, which are to be beleued, which yet we perceiue not. And after this manner, they which still together with the Gospell obserued choise of meates, and other ceremonies, are in this epistle called of Paul, weake in faith: for they yet knew not, that the ceremonies of the Iewes were by Christ abrogated. Sometimes it cometh to passe, that we see in deede the things which are to be beleued: but yet we are not so perfect in faith, that we can firmly and constantly cleue vnto them. So Christ called the Apostles, men of little faith, and especially Peter, when through doubting he was almost drowned with the waues of the sea: wherefore as touching eche part, we must alwayes pray vnto God to increase our faith. By this place also is to marked, that the power of beleuing cometh from the holy ghost: when as we giue not place to so many and so great waues of doubts, beating agaynst our minde, but at the last get the vpper hand of them: which thing coulde not be done without a certayne celestiall and supernaturall strength. But in this assent of faith, we must diligently examine, both who it is which speaketh, and also what that is which is spoken, and set forth vnto vs to be beleued. For the deuill laboureth for nothing more, then to make vs to beleue, that God said that, which he sayd not. Oftentimes also those things which are spoken of God himselfe, are by false deceauers wrested to a wrong sense, and corrupted, and are so obtruded to be beleued. Wherefore seeing as touching eche part we haue nede of reuelation, we must pray vnto God, not to suffer vs to be deceaued. One of them that writeth vpon the sentences is of this opinion, that if it were most assuredly knowen, that God spake any thing, therein faith coulde haue no place.
For straight way (sayth he) by the light of nature we should know, that that ought to be true, which God hath spoken: vnles we will thinke him to be a ly-ar. But this man is wonderfull far out of the way. For we doubt not, but that the prophetes assuredly knew, that God spake in them, and yet they gaue faith, or beleued those things which they foretolde. We also assuredly know, that God spake those things which are read in the holy scriptures. And yet we beleue them. The Apostles know, that they had receaued the holy ghost. And yet for all that they wanted not faith. But that which this man sayth, should then be true, if by reason or sense we might evidently know, that God spake these things: which undoubtedly can neuer come to passe. For these things are not made knowen vnto vs, but by reuelation. But this man in steede of euidence, did put certainty. The last part which is in the definition, wherein it is sayde that this assent consisteth with the sense and wisdom of the flesh, may manifestly be declared, not only by this example of Abraham, but also by a great many other examples. God promised deliuey vnto the Israelites: and yet in the meane tyme increased their affliction: they had a greater number of bitches layd vpon them: they had no straw geuen them for theyr worke: they were harshely and cruelly beaten. And when they were now departing out of Egypt, the sea came agaynst them, on the other side were great huge rocks: and at their

their backs was Pharao at hand with a mighty host: against which he lettes it behoued & flesh to strine. And many things in like sort seemed to be against the promise made to Dauid, to moue him not to beleue the anoynting of Samuel: against which it was needeful, that he should by fayth be strengthened. The Apostles also found in Christ many tokens of infirmity, which they could not haue overcome, but by fayth. Wherefore we may conclude, that such is the nature of our fayth, that it alwayes strineth with some doubting.

Geuing the glory to God.] Here is set forth the ende wherunto fayth tendeth, namely, to aduance, and encrease the glory of God: which herein consisteth, that we conceaue a worthy estimation touching God. Abraham is sayde to haue bene in a maner an hundredth yeare olde. For as it is written in the history of Genesis the 17. chapter, he was now 99. yeares of age when this promise was made vnto him. He had no like example before his tyme, by consideration wherof he mought haue bene confirmed. For he is the first vnto whome we reade in the scriptures was restored strength to beget children. Neither is it any meruaile that by & worke of fayth, is aduanced & glory of God: soasmuch as in it for Gods sake we deny the best part of our selues: which is our mynde and reason, wherby we either assent or not assent, vnto thinges set forth vnto vs. Wherefore it is manifest, that there can nothing more excellent be offered of vs vnto God. For this is a wonderfull testification of the power and godnes of God: for his sake to seme to quench in our selues the sense of nature. But I wonder at those, which so diligently commend workes, and so highly extoll chastity, sole life, and other workes, and yet are so colde in setting forth the commendation of fayth: when as by it commeth the victory, wherby we overcome both our selues, and also the whole world. For so Iohn sayth, this is the victory, which overcommeth the world, euen our fayth. Which thing I speake not, as though I ment, that we are iustified by fayth, as it is a worke. For, it is defiled by sundry blotches of our infirmity. And Augustine sayth, that this sentence is by no meanes to be admitted, that fayth meriteth vnto vs iustification. For fayth is not (sayth he) of our selues: but as Paul to the Ephesians expressedly testifieth, it is the gift of God. Howbeit as it is a worke, it many wayes excelleth all other workes. Neither can it be expressed, how far wide the scholemen erre, when they imagine, that fayth can consist without good workes. For by their sentence, fayth should not attayne vnto the dignity of prudence: which both as the Philosophers write, and also they themselves confesse, can not be had without the rest of the vertues. What manner of thing then shall Theologicall fayth be, if it attayne not vnto the perfection of prudence? Farther, soasmuch as vertue suffreth not vice to be ioyned together with it, and they themselves contende that fayth is a vertue, how wil they haue true fayth to be in sinners, and such as are strangers fro God? But they will say, that they put fayth to be a vertue of the vnderstanding: vnto which kind of vertues vices are not repugnant. For that we see sometimes, that the most wickedst men that are, haue in them excellent sciences. But nether will this any thing helpe them, their owne sayned imagination is a let thereunto. For they imagine, that those thinges which are set forth vnto our vnderstanding, are obscure and nothing eident, and that we geue not assent vnto them, but because the wil commaundeth the vnderstanding to geue his assent, & in that thinge to geue place to the truth of God. Wherefore I will demaunde of these men, whether the worke of & wil, wherby it commaundeth & vnderstanding to geue place & to assent vnto the wordes of God, be good or euell. Undoubtedly whether they wil or no, they must be compelled to say it is good. But without charity it is not possible that the wil should bring the vnderstanding to embrace & thinges that are to be beleued. Wherefore these sonde deuises of theirs are repugnant the one to the other. But we teach no such thing, that fayth should depend of the commaundement of the wil. For how should it be moued to commaund thinges that are to be beleued, to be receaued as good and worthy of credit, except it had first receued it by vnderstanding? In dede we confesse, that those thinges which we beleue, are obscure and not very euident vnto humane reason. But they are made plaine vnto the vnderstanding by the light of the diuine reuelation, and illumination of the holy ghost. Wherefore they are by the iudgment of reason apprehended and admitted with a singular certainty, which thinges being so knowen and receaued, as it must nedes follow, the will delighteth it selfe in them, & so earnestly embraseth them, that it commaundeth vnto the other faculties of the mind, to workes agreeable vnto that truth, whiche the mind hath beleued. And by this meanes of faith springeth charity: and after it, followeth hope. For the things which we beleue and earnestly loue, with a valiant and patient minde we waite for: which thing pertayneth chiefly vnto hope. Neither let any man thinke, that this is ether against reason, or extinguishteth the nature of man, for that in beleuing we seeme to renounce humane sence: as though this were in vs a madness, as Agrippa the king sayd vnto Paul, when he preached the sayth of Christ: Much learning hath driuen thee to madness. The matter is not so: but rather by faith is brought to passe, that our reason maketh it selfe subiect vnto the doctrine of God and vnto the reuelation thereof, rather then to inferior reasonings and perswasions, which being inferior vnto the holy scriptures, man is by them rather exalted, then defected. And if a man should say that men in beleuing are madde, we will adde farther it is aboue all things done with reason. The Apostle maketh mention that God rayseth to life the dead, and that the body of Abraham was dead, and also the wombe of Sara. By which wordes Chrysostome sayth, are layde the foundations of our resurrection, which we beleue shal come. For if god could do these things, then can not he wante ether meanes or power, whereby to restore againe to life the deade. And vndoubtedly I am perswaded, that this sayth was no small helpe vnto Abraham to moue him to sacrifice his sonne, as God had required at his handes. For although hee had receaued the promise, that he should haue posterity by Isaake yet he saw that although he were slaine, yet there was still remayning place for that promise. For he beleued, that God was able to rayse him vp although he were slayne, and make him to liue agayne. And how commendable the sayth of the patriarch was: Paul declareth when he sayth, that he had not a regard to his dead body or to the dead wombe of Sara, but gaue the glory to God: being most assuredly perswaded this, that God was able to performe and bring to passe whatsoener he had promised. Ambrose by an Antithesis or contrary position declarereth the excellency of this sayth, for he compareth it with the incredulity of Zachary: vnto whome when the angel shewed the birth of Iohn Baptist, yet he remained still in vnbelife, and therefore he was reprobated of the lord, and his tongue styped, that he could not declare it, which punishment was verie conueniente for that offence. For they which beleue not, doe neither speake nor confesse. Abraham considered with himselfe, although I am now by nature past childen getting: and am become barren, yet the and might of God is not subiect vnto the impediments of creatures. For God can beyond the accustomed maner and course of nature bring to passe whatsoener he will, wherefore although I can not by mine owne strengths beget a child, yet God can adorne his promise with a miracle, whereby he may overcome the order of nature. The Rabbines of the Hebrues say, that Abram begetteth not, but Abraham begetteth. Bycause saie they in that name is put the aspiratio. He, which is a letter pertaining to the name Tetragrama to. As if it should haue ben said, the power of God being aded, he which could not beget, now begetteth childen. Augustine in his questions vpon Genesis thinketh that this place of the Apostle is not simply to be vnderstanded. For we rede, that after the death of Sara, Abraham had many childen by his wife Hetura which he afterward married. And he addereth, that the opinion of naturall philosophers is, that men of greete age can not beget childen of old women: but yet they may of young maydens. Wherefore he thinketh, that we must in this place vnderstand that the body of Abraham was dead as touching Sara his wife, which was now some score and ten yeares old, But this exposition hath not such firme cause to compel us to thinke it to be true. For in that Abraham begat children of Ceturā, Sara being now dead, that might come by this meanes, that God had now bestowed the order of nature restored vnto him strength to beget children. Neither maketh that any thing to the purpose, which Origen affirmeth, who vpon this place writeth, that the body of Abraham is vnderstand to be dead, because he now liued chastly with his wife, neither had any more fellowship with her. But he comēdeth him, for that when he had receaued the commandement of God, that he should haue issue by his wife, he agayne went in vnto her. These thinges, as it appereth he deuised of his owne head, for they can not be gathered out of the history. Now the Apostle is in hand with this, to commend the fayth of Abraham, for that he constantly gaue assent vnto the promise of God, although both his owne nature and his wifes nature were bitterly agaynst it. But whither Abraham any thing doubted, when God promised vnto him a child, the scripture seemeth to leaue in suspence. For in the 12. chapter of Genesis it is written that he laughed, and sayd, shall a child be borne to one of an hundred yeares of age? And shall Sara bring forth a child being 90. yeares of age. I would to God Ismaell might liue in thy sight. These wordes haue a shew both of ioy and of admiration, being ioynd notwithstanding to some doubting. And this scripture therfore maketh mention of these thinges, that the fayth of Abraham, which is so highly commended, should in no wise be thought to haue bene without doubtings, which are accustomed to spring of the flesh and humane sence: but because the fayth of the Patriarch ouercame these doubtings, therefore is it prayled. Neither doo we read there, that Abraham was accused of God of incredulity, as Sara was, which also laughed. And if a mā waigh the outward laughter, they were both a like. But God, which is the searcher of the hartes vnderstood right well the fayth of ether of them. Holy men although they beleued the promises of God, yet sometimes through humane weakenes they somewhat doubted and therof it oftentimes came to passe, that they required signes and miracles to confirme theyr weaknes: which thing we reade of Gedeon, and Ezechias the king. But in this place is shewed a remedy agaynst such temptacions, namely to call backe our thoughtes from humane lettes, and to fixe our eyes only vpon the power of God. Of this thinge the Angell admonished the blessed Virgine, saying, No word is impossible with God. Although it appeare not by the wordes of the virgine, that she doubted, but only asked, how that shoulde come to passe. For she doubted not, but that as the Angell had tolde her, she shoulde conceaue, and that straight way: but because she saw, that she was not as yet coupled in matrimony, although she were betrouthed, she demaunded how that should come to passe: whether she shoulde wayte till she were ioynd in matrimony, or whether it should by any other meanes come to passe. Wherefore the Angell in his answer comprehendeth two principall pointes. The one is, whether he remoueth away doubting, if peradventure there sticke any in the minde of the Virgine: for he sayth, No word is impossible with God. The second is, of the maner of conceauing. The holy ghost (sayth he) shall come vpon thee, and the power of the most highest shall shadow thee. But whereas some sayne, that she asked this, because she had vowed her virginity vnto God, it nedeth no long confusion, especially seeing we are by the history it selfe taught, that she was betrothed to a mā, neither was there at that tyme any such custome to vow virginity vnto God. But to return to our purpose, our part is to resist the doubts which arise agaynst the fayth, by the consideration of the power of God: for there can no doubt arise as touching the will of God. For of his owne accord he promisseth, whatsoever he letteth forth to be beleued: neither doubtles woulde he do it, if he would not geue it. Wherefore it followeth that they which are tempted with such doubting, are in doubt of his power. Hereof I thinke it cometh to passe, that the prayers of the Church do so oftentimes beginne with the omnipotency of God, to the ende the hartes of them that pray shoulde be confirmed, and that they should not with doubting require any thinge in their publique prayers.

Whether Abraham doubted, when he had a child promised him.

Both of the laughed Abraham & Sara.

The saints to confirme theyr fayth sometimes required miracles. A remedy agaynst weake fayth.

Whither the blessed virgin doubted.

The blessed virgine made no vow.

The prayers of the church begin at the omnipotency of God.

prayers. Of those thinges it is manifest, how gréuous a sinne it is, to doubt of the promises of God. For that is nothing els, but to make God eyther a lyar or els weake. And they which are of that mynde, can nether call vpon God, nor aske, or looke for any thing at his hands. But now forasmuch as this is the nature of faith, which the Apostle now describeth, it manifestly appeareth, that the deuill hath not sayth. For he can haue no confidence, that he is accepted of God, and besides that he knoweth right well by the naturall sharpenes of his vnderstanding, that God is omnipotent. But whereas Iames sayth, that the deuill beleueth and trembleth, to beleue, is there put to know. But the sayth which is here described pertaineth vnto men only, and to none but to those that are godly. The Apostle repeateth that this sayth was imputed vnto Abraham vnto righteousness. He did indeede before beleue, and was iustified: but the scripture sheweth now, how it was expessed, when his sayth shined forth more excellently, and more notably. For as touching this promise, both the disposition of his body, and the age of his wife were wonderfully agaynst it: which thing is not so manifestly declared in the promises, that were before geuen.

Now it is not written for him only, that it was imputed to him for righteousness, but also for vs, to whome it shalbe imputed for righteousness, which beleue in him that rayled by Iesus our Lord from the deade. who was deliuered for our sinnes, and is risen agayne for our iustification.

Now it is not written for him only.] Here Paul applieth the erample of Abraham vnto vs. For sayth he, euen as sayth profited him vnto iustification, so also shall it be imputed vnto vs vnto righteousness. This maner ought we to obserue when we come to the reading of the holy scriptures, that when we haue diligently peysed any place, we turne the eyes of our mynde to our selues, and diligently examine how those thinges which we reade pertaine vnto vs. This thing also is to be obserued that the Apostle, when he discusseth this place of controuersy touching iustification, for the iudgement of the whole disputation, sendeth the beleuers no where els but vnto the scriptures: for he sendeth them not to the fathers, to see what their iudgement is. For that we haue the scriptures, in which are all thinges playnly containned which are necessary to saluation: for Paul sayth to Timothy, All scripture inspired by God is profitable to teach, to reprove, to enstrukt, and to correct, that the man of God may be perfect and absolute, and be enstrukt to all good workes. Here are reckened fouer principall pointes, which comprehend the whole summe of Christian religion. For it entreateth ether of doctrines or of maners. And as touching doctrines, we must take hede that we confirme thinges that are good and true, and confute thinges corrupt and false. And of these thinges the Apostle sayth, that the scriptures are profitable to teach and to reprove. And as touching maners such as are good are to be perswaded by admonitions, or such as are euell are to be reprobended. And hereunto pertaineth y which the Apostle sayth, To correct and to enstrukt, And these thinges are so containned in the holy scriptures that by them a man may be made perfect. Which could in no case be counted true, if there were any thing wanting in them. Wherefore our negligence is much to be accused, which doth in such sort contemne to search the holy scriptures. The laytie and simpler sort complayne of their pastors: for seing they lye snoozing a slepe, it is not to be meruayled at, if others slepe. There can be no better remedy agaynst this so great negligence of the pastors, then that the lay men continually occuppe themselves in the scriptures, and when they are in doubt of any thing to bring it to their pastors, and to aske of them their iudgement, and to bge them. By that meanes it shall come to passe, that will they or nill they, they shalbe compelled to be diligent in study. For they should vndoubtedly at the length be ashamed, when they should see themselves not able to make answere. But the lay men say, say, they haue no leasure to study the holy scriptures: when yet to the greatesse losse of tyme they haue leasure inough for pastimes and vnprofitable trilles. Chrysostome continually in his holy sermons pricked forward all his hearers to the reading of the holy scriptures, both by many other reasons, and finally by this excellent similitude. They which haue found out (sayth he) mynes of gold or siluer, spare no paynes, digge the grounde, go vnder the earth, and sustayne the pestilent exhalations of the earth, that they maye come to small crommes of golde or of siluer. And we hauing the scriptures, a treasure most abundant and most easy to attayne vnto, neglect to exercise our selues or to take any paynes therein. We must not in these daies wayte for the pastors to inuite vs to read the scriptures. They had a great deale rather that they were utterly forbidden the people, that they might be kept of such men as were called Triumviri, as the booke of the Sibills were, that the people mought come and aske counsell of them, and they to geue them answers as it were out of an oracle. By which meanes their idleness and ease should be very well provided for. But now when they see, that that cannot be, they say that the sence of the scriptures is to be sought for out of the fathers: soasmuch as it is an infinit worke to read them ouer all, they may in the meane time at their pleasure confirme their abuses. For they shall alwayes fynd some amongst them, which may seme to fauor their sonde deuises and dreames. Neither are these men ashamed to make the oracles of God subiect to the opinions of men. But they say, that they doo this onely there, where the places are in controuersie, neither can be expounded by the scripture it selfe. Touching which matter it shall not be amisse to heare what Ierome saith. He vpon the xxij. chapter of Mattheu entreating of this sentence of the Lord, That Zachary the sonne of Barachias was slayn betwene the temple and the altar, saith, that some thought that this Zachary was the father of Iohn Baptist, which was slayne in that place, because he was a priest, and thasfor no other cause, but for that he had preached Christ. I sought oftentimes to know which of the fathers exposition this was. And at the length I found that it was Basilias exposition. For he bleth it in his sermon of the Patience of our Lord, and saith: That it was a tradition by long succession euent vnto his tyme confirmed, that Zachary being priest, dyd register the mother of Christ, after she had brought forth a chylde amongest the virgins, and when he was accused of the Iewes for the same, and rendred a reason of his so doynge, and preached besides also many thynges of Christ, the Iewes not being able any longer to beare wylh him, killed him. Touching this history Ierome in this maner pronounceth: That for as much as it hath not authority out of the holy scriptures, it is by the selfsame easines euened wherby it is proued. We see therfore by the testimony of Ierome, that the interpretations of doubtfull places are not admitted, vnles they be brought out of the scriptures and by them confirmed. And if we will overcome the difficulty of the scriptures, we must be familiarly conuersant in them day and night. And let vs remember this which the Apostle now here mencioneth, that they were not written for their sakes onely of whom is there entreated, but also for our sakes.

But in that this worde, Onely, is added, declareth, that they were written for their sakes also. For Gods pleasure is, that we should thinke wof of his elect, which self thing also turneth to our comoditie, for whē we thinke well of the, we are stirred vp to imitate them. This is moreover here hence gathered, that so often as we shall establish any doctrine or declare any commaundment of God, it shall then be aptly done when we bring proues of them by examples. For in harde and doubtfull places, proues taken of examples bring great perspicuitie. For in them both the minde and the sences are ioyned together. Farther there is no small comforte contained in this place, when we see that we are made equall with the Patriarche Abraham as touching iustification. For although he were adozned with a greatesse many giftes which we want, yet that we should by faith be adopted to be the children of God, it is no lesse geuen vnto vs, then vnto him. And although our sayth be the instrument, whereby we receiue righteousnes and the promise offred vnto vs of God, for vnto them that are of full age, by that instrument onely is righteousnes

The scripture ought not to be made subiect vnto the iudgement of men. Of Zachary slain betwene the temple and the altar.

nes geuen, yet Christ hath so much esteemed it, that he hath spoken of it no otherwise, then if it were properly the cause of iustification. For he saith: Thy faith hath made thee safe. And seynge it is saide, that faith shall be imputed vnto vs vnto righteousnes, as it was in tymes past imputed vnto Abraham, we haue a moste firme argument of the certaintie of saluation. For as Abraham behaued himselfe towards the promise of God, as touching that he should haue issue: so must we behaue our selues towards the promise of the remission of sinnes. But he was certaine, neither doubted he: wherfore, we also ought to be certaine of the saluation promised vnto vs, and by no meanes to doubt therof. This reason let vs hold fast, and not suffer it to slip from vs. But seynge Abraham had many singuler things, neither ought we to imitate him in all things, how both Paul with any strength gather, that this pointe of sayth should haue place: that as it came vnto him, so also shal it come vnto vs. For if we should take armour, and beynge priuate men make warre, shall it happen vnto vs as it did to Abraham? And to lye with our handmaidens, shall it be excused in vs, as the fellowship which Abraham had with Agar is excused in hym? And shall it be lawfull for every man to sacrifice his owne sonne because he was redy to offer by his? This doubt may thus be answered: that there is one calling which is vniuersall, and an other singuler: and when we reade the actes of the saints, we must take hede that we rashly confound them not. For those things which pertain vnto the general calling, we must imitate: but those things which pertain to the singuler calling, are rather to be reuerenced the imitated. And if thou aske, by what meanes those things are to be discerned, the difference is not hard. For whatsoeuer things thou seest that they did accordyng to the prescript of the commaundementes of God, those things haue relation vnto the general state of the faithful. But where any thing is committed, that thou seest agreeth not with the law of God, the same wholy is in them priuate and singuler. Which yet is not red wout fruite. For there we see, how God sometimes by a wonderful manner gouerneth his: as one not addicted to one maner of sauing those whom he hath elected.
Farther always in this kinde of actions, if thou come to the roote and ground, thou shalt finde many things which thou mayst imitate. Abraham was willing to sacrifice his sonne. Although the same be not lawfull for thee to do, yet do thou that which is lawfull for thee. Abraham preferred the commaundement of God before the lyfe of his onely sonne: so also oughtest thou to preferre the will of God before all naturall consanguinitie. Farther he hid al this whole matter from his wife, for that he saw she should haue bene a let, wherby he should not haue bene able to execute the commaundementes of God: so muste we also do that we remove awaye all lettes from god purposes. Finally, although he knew, that he had in Isaac recei-ued the promise of an infinite posteritie, and saw that his vntimely death was repugnant vnto the promises of God, yet ceased he not of from that which he had begonne, but permitted the successe of the promise vnto the providence of God: so also let not vs by humaine reasonings resist the commaundementes of God. All these things beynge thus well weighed, shall easily call vs from our infirmities, to shewe our selues obedient vnto God.

Which beleue in him that raised vp Iesus our Lord from the dead, who was deli-uered for our sinnes, and is risen againe for our iustification. Here is set forth a briefe and redy summe of the Gospell: for in the death of Christe are vnderstand al the miseries of Christ, which went before it: as his Passivity, preaching, labours, teaching, accusatiō, cōdemnatiō, crosse & burial. And his resarrectiō fro the dead setteth forth vnto vs al these things which followed it: as his resituti-on to life, & that eternal last glory, & chief felicity. Finally al those things which pertain therunto. The Apostle very aptly in this place maketh mention of our lord Iesus Christ, for that he is the mediator and arbiter between God and mē.
And seynge he hath hitherto spoken of sayth which is the instrumēt wherby we are iustified, it serueth very well to the purpose that he should also make mention of Christe: for he is the object of our sayth, as by whome God would communicate

municate vnto vs his righteousness. Neither could we have bene otherwise certified of the will of God, except Christ himself had entrusted vs therof. For John sayth, No man hath sene God at any time. The sonne which is in the bosome of the father, he hath declared him. For neither the prophets in the old time, neither we our selues could by any other meanes then by Christ haue knowen, that this is the will of God, that by him he is made mercifull and fauorable vnto vs. Farther there is no mā ignozant, but that there was neede of a sacrifice and price, to purge vs from our sinnes. Wherefore seeing both the death of Christ, and the shedding of his blood hath performed these thinges, vndoubtedly they ought not to be kept in silence. But here ariseth a doubt, by what meanes the Apostle may seme to seioue and to put a sonder these thinges one from the other: namely, the forgiveness of sinnes, and iustificatiō: and one the other side, the faith of the death, from the faith of the resurrection, when as it semeth that by the faith of ech part, of his death (I say) and of his Resurrection is geuen not only remission of sins but also iustification. Augustine against Faustus in his .16. booke semeth to geue his interpretation. That our faith is chiefly directed vnto the resurrection of Christ. That he died, euen the Ethnikes also confesse: but that he rose againe, they vtterly deny. And therefore forasmuch as faith is sayd to be that, whereby we are iustified, Paul would make mencio of that thing wheron it chiefly consisteth. And to confirme his sentence he citeth a place out of the 10. chapter to the Romanes: If with the mouth thou confesse the lord Jesus Christ, and with thy hart beleuest, that he was rayfed from the dead, thou shalt be saued. By which wordes it appeareth, that saluation and iustificatiō are attributed vnto the faith of the resurrection of Christ. But these thinges are not so to be taken as though our faith should not also be directed vnto the death of the Lord. It is true in dede that the Ethnikes confesse, that Christ was slayn: but they do not beleue that this was done for the sinnes of men: but for some offence he had committed or els wrongfully: but we beleue that he was crucified for the saluatiō and redemption of mankind: wherefore our faith is exercised as wel in the death of Christ as in his Resurrection. And that which he bringeth out of the 10. Chapter vnto the Romanes, maketh nothing agaynst our sentence. For who vnderstandeth not, that in the faith of the Resurrection of Christ, is also included that faith which we haue of his death and crosse: wherefore there are yet behynd two other very likely interpretations of which the first is, that in very dede by the death of Christ, was payd the price of our redemption. But, that it might be applied vnto vs, there nedeth the holy ghost, to moue vs to beleue, and Christ to geue vnto vs this holy ghost, rose againe from death, sent abrode his Apostles to preach into all partes of the world, & now also before the father, executeth the office of an intercessor, and high priest: therefore is he sayd to haue risen againe to helpe vs that we might obteyne iustification. Chrysostome semeth to lene vnto this sentence. The second exposition is, that the faith of the death and of the resurrection bringeth iustification: but Paul seioune them, aptly to declare the analogy and proportiō, betwene them. Vnto the death of Christ, answereth very wel the forgiveness of sinnes for by reason of them, death was deuē vnto vs. And as Christ as touching this corruptible life died, so also ought we, when we are iustified to dye vnto sinne. Agayne bycause iustification semeth herein to be declared in that we beginne a new life, therefore is it referred vnto the resurrection of Christ: for that he then seemed to haue begonne a celestiall and happy life. Paul vsed in a maner the selfe same form of words in this same epistle, when he saith: With the harte we beleue vnto ryghteousnesse: and with the mouth is confession made to saluation. For the faith of the harte, both worketh righteousness, and also bringeth saluation: but bycause saluation and iustification are chiefly declared in action, therefore he ascribed it to confession. But whether of these expositions is the truer, neither will I contend nor also now declare. Of those thinges which haue now bene spoken we gather a most swete consolation: for thereby we doo not only know the waight of sinne, but also we vnderstand that God bare a singular good lone towards vs: as one which gaue his only begotten son, and Faith is directed chiefly vnto the resurrection of the Lord.

Our faith is directed also vnto the death of the Lord.

In the faith of the resurrection is comprehended the faith of the death. Besides the payinge of the price, it was neede full that the redemption should be applied vnto vs.

unto the death to deliuer vs from sinnes. Farther seing Christ is sayd to haue risen from the dead for our iustification, we easily see, that we are by him called backe to a new life: vnto which yet we can not asper, except we be of him elected.

The fift Chapter.

Wherefore being iustified by fayth, we haue peace towards God, through our Lorde Iesus Christ. By whome also we haue accesse through fayth vnto this grace wherewith we stand, and reioyce, vnder the hope of the glory of God. Neither do we this only, but also we reioyce in afflictions, knowing that affliction bringeth forth patience, and patience experience, and experience hope. And hope maketh not ashamed, because the loue of God is shed abroad into our hartes by the holy ghost, which is geuen vnto vs.

The effectes of fayth and of iustification.

Wherefore being iustified by faith, we haue peace towards God. Where the Apostle beginneth by way of rehearsal to conclude, that whiche he had before proued, and together therewithall set forth the effectes of faith and of iustification. For, that vndoubtedly is an absolute or perfect doctrine, which sheweth, not only the nature of thinges, but also declareth the effectes. Now then the chiefest effect of iustification is, to deliuer vs from the terrores of death and of eternall damnation. And this is it which Paul telleth, To haue peace towards God. Farther he sheweth that of this peace springeth a certayne reioysing, not only for the felicity, which we shall obtayne, but also euen for afflictions: that therefore we are sure of the good will and loue of God towards vs, because we see Christ died for our saluation: but much more are we confirmed as touching the same, by reason of his life, which he now liueth with the father. Wherefore he compareth Christ with Adam, and sheweth, that he hath brought farre greater benefites vnto mankind, then did Adam bring losses.

Wherby we see somethyng of the hatred of the world against the godly.

What grace here signifyeth.

Seing we are now iustified by fayth (sayth he) we haue peace towards God. Sinne had seperated vs from him: and God to auenge sinne braue man out of Paradise: by meanes wherof we are become miserable and full of calamity. And agayne seing our owne conscience accuseth vs of wickednes, if we want Christ, then must we nedes abhorre God, and flye from hym, as from an auenger and punisher of sinne. And this is that hatred of the world, which Christ hath shewed to be bent agaynst him and agaynst his, when he sayd, If the worlde hate me, it will also hate you. And of the Iewes he testifieth, That they hated his father. But now, after that we be thus iustified, we haue peace towards God for that we are perswaded that he leaueth vs, and herein consisteth our whole felicity. So Dauid did not without iust cause say, that they are blessed, whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sinnes are couered. And by the name of peace is here properly signified, tranquillity of conscience. There are some which in stede of εἰρήνη, put εὐφροσύνη, and for εὐφροσύνη, that is, we haue rede εὐφροσύνη, that is, Let vs haue peace: As though Paul after that he had forth the doctrine of faith, should now entreate of sincerenes of life, and should stirre by the Romanes to mutuall loue and beneuolence one towards another. And Origen seemeth to leane to this sentence. But Chrysostome most manifestly leaneth thereunto: for he bringeth two manner of expositions. The one is, that seing we are iustified by fayth, there remaineth, that contentions be put away, and that men liue in peace one towards another. And they say, that therefore Paul spake this, because there were some which contended, that the law should be holden as necessary vnto saluation: but Paul declareth, that there is no such nede, seing we are iustified by fayth. The second exposition is, that we should exercise charity, and sinne not. But this sentence can not stand sauing by right the scope of this place, and wordes of the Apostle. For we see, that here by a briefe rehearsal rehearsall is entreated of the conclusion which is inferred of those things, which were before spoken. Farther the peace which the Apostle speaketh of, is not that peace which men haue one towarde another. For he playnly sayth towards Gods and those things which follow, we see are spoken by the indicative mode. For he sayth, By whome we haue accesse vnto this grace wherein we stande. But Chrysostome hath herein also erred, when he demandeth, whether we can be without sinne, whē as we now haue iustification, & he maketh answer vnto himselfe, that this is an easy matter. Because (sayth he) it was a harder thing, that we which were subiecte to so greuous sinnes, shoulde be deliuered from them, then that when we are iustified we shoulde beware of them. For (sayth he) it is a much greater matter to obtayne those things which we haue not, then to defende those things whyche he haue alreadye obtayned. But we haue before declared, that that (so long as we lyue here) can not be hoped for, namely, utterly to want sinne. And if any man will contend, that this may be done by the power of God, we will not be agaynst him. For God could adorne a man with so great grace, that he shoulde liue utterly without sin. But we speake according to the sentece of the scriptures, as the thing is indee, and as experience teacheth vs alwayes to happen. If we say (sayth Iohn) we haue no sinne, we deceaue our selues and the truth is not in vs. And Ierome agaynst the Pelagians derideth that power which nether is, nor hath bene, nor euer shall be put in execution. Ambrose maketh on our side, and manifestly interpreteth this place of the peace of the conscience, which we haue towarde God. Pea he herein compareth sayth and the law together: and saith, that sayth excellith the law, for that it maketh peace, which the law could not do. Although whether we write it by o. or whether by u, that is, whether we reade ex o. u. or ex u. o., that is, haue, or may haue, our expositiō hath place stil. For the Apostle ether sayth, that we now already haue that peace, or els exhorteth vs to haue it, and not any more, as we were wont before, to flye from God. But the common receaued reading by o, is a great deale better. He addeth:

That by Christ we haue accesse vnto grace wherein we stand. If by Christ we haue accesse vnto God and vnto his grace, then may we inferre of the contrary, that without Christ we flye from God. To what ende then shall we call vpon Saintes: what other reconciliatoz haue we nede of, if by Christ is genen vnto vs accesse vnto God? Because (say they) our complayntes are not brought vnto Emperours and kinges, vnles we be brought in vnto them by Dukes, Carles, or Lordes. But as we haue before declared out of Ambrose, this is done because our Princes or men, nether do they see what is done abroade in the streates, and in other mens houses. Therefore towarde them we haue nede of many mediatoz. But God seeth all thinges, there is nothing hidden from Christ. Wherefore what soeuer is attributed vnto any other, is taken away from his dignity and grace. Others contend, that we haue accesse vnto grace, by sorowes, contritiōs, teares, satisfactions, & woordes of truth. But as touching sayth, which Paul so oftentimes inculcateth, they speake not a word. And if a mā chance to vge thē, they answere y in all thinges they vnderstand sayth. And so in a thing most wayghty, and which is the chiefe poynt of the whole matter, they deale fraudulently and dalynglye. But we say with Paul, that by Christ and sayth we haue accesse vnto the grace of reconciliation. And as for repentance and woordes of charity, we say that they come as companions, which alwayes follow true sayth. Thou wilt demanda peradventure, what maner of peace & grace that is, which we haue, when as God bseth greuously to punish those sinnes, which he hath already remitted and forgiven vnto his. For so we reade that he did to Dauid. We answere, that those tribulations which God inflicteth vpon the elect, after that he hath forgiven them their sinnes, if we will speake properly, haue not the nature of punishments. For they are rather fatherly corrections: wherby the saints are the better admonished, not to fall agayne into the like sinnes, and the church is taught, how soze God hateth sinne. Wherefore in these punishments is not disturbed the peace of the elect: nether do they sometimes flye from such scourges. And this I speake of the spirite,

and not of the flesh. This thing only David desireth, that the Lord would not correct him in his fure, or in his wrath. He refused not to be fatherly chastised. But these punishments which God inflicteth vpon vs, whilst we liue here, are not in the power of the Church, that it can at pleasure and as it listeth it selfe alter, or lenise, or mitigate them: as our aduersaries haue sayned of the paynes of purgatory. Which their sayned deuise they can not confirme by any reason taken out of the holy scriptures. We must diligently also weigh the wordes of the Apostle. For as when he sayth:

That we stand in grace by fayth, he declareth that the property of fayth is, to erect and to confirme our mindes. Which property undoubtedly it hath not, but by that it cleaueth vnto the word of God. For so by it are broken the rages and tempests that rulse agaynst vs: so are we established not to wauer with euery wynde of doctrine, nor to change our opinion for euery chance of fortune. The philosophers, when they woulde amply set forth the constancie of a iust man, compared it with a fower square stone, which howsoeuer it falleth, falleth right. But fayth much more truly accomplisheth this, the doth philosophy. Christostome addeth, That the good thinges of this world whatsoeuer they be, are nether firme nor constant: For they are oftentimes assayed with many dangers, and not seldome overcome. And although whilst we liue here, we lose them not, yet when we dye, will we or nill we, we must needs forsake them. But these spirituall thinges wherof we now intreate, are both firme, and shall after death be made more ample. But the same Christostome vpon this place is of vs warely to be red: For he sayth, that Paul in making mention of those thinges, which we receaue of Christ, rehearseth many thinges. But when he commeth to those thinges which we haue of our selues, he setteth forth only one thing, namely, fayth: which (sayth he) we our selues bring of our owne. But we must surely sticke fast to this ground, that fayth also is the gift of God, and is deriued from him into vs. Out of this place also may be gathered a most firme argument, that we are iustified by fayth only. Which shall be made playne by the effect after this maner. That by which we are iustified, ought to make vs quiet before God. This thing can not workes bring to passe, but fayth only: Ergo, we are iustified by fayth, and not by workes. The maior is very playne, that we are not iustified, vntles we haue such a quiet mynde, that we abhorre not nor flye from the sight of God. And that our workes are not able to performe this, they vncleanes and vnpurenes declareth. Wherefore David hath not without cause written, Enter not into iudgement with thy seruantes Lord.

We reioyce in the hope and glory of God.] Here is declared the nature of this peace and tranquillitie of the minde: namely, that it maketh vs most assured and sure of perpetuall felicity: for we reioyce not, but for that which we now possesse. And that we euen now also possesse eternall lyfe, Christ manifestly declareth when he sayth: He that beleueth in me hath eternall lyfe. But because it is not yet full, neither as yet appeareth, therefore Paul addeth, In the hope of the glory of God. This glorie whiche we hope for, is a coniunction with God, that he maye wholly dwell and worke in vs: which thing when we shall haue attayned, we shall be adorned with the last and highest point of felicitye, neither shall there be left any place vnto misery. But when he sayth: In the hope of the glory of God. He sa- meth to speake that by preuention. For that as touching those which beleue, & com- mon opinion of men is exceedingly deceived. For the Ethenikes commonly deride Christians, for that they count themselves to be happye, when yet in the meane tyme they want not wicked affections, and are vexed with tribulations and aduer- sities. They thinke & we should weigh our felicity by those thinges which we haue of our owne. But we are of a farre other opinion: for we so far forth counte our selues happy as we are so counted of God, and that he imputeth vnto vs righteous- nes: not that we are not in the meane tyme renewed both in minde and in bodye, although we are yet vnperfect. And euen this selfe same righteousness whiche we haue now obteyned, and the renouation which is in vs, we in no case thinke to be of that force, that by it we can attayne vnto the rewarde of eternall lyfe. This

peace, and felicitie, and reioycing, of which the Apostle now intreateth, is  $\psi$ , which confirmed the Partirs, when in Chyikes quarell they did shed both their lyfe and blood. This is that hundredth folde, which is rendered also in this lyfe, & is of more value then all the riches and pleasures of this world. Wherefore when the Ethnykes deriding vs, do boast of their riches and pleasures and power, we ought not to be moued. For we easely perceauie, that they with al these their goods are miserable and wretched: but on the other side we fele our selues happy, when we haue possession of this one god thyng, although we want all those thynges whiche they so highly esteeme. And here is to be marked the order, that the Apostle useth in rehearsing the effectes of iustification. First, he setteth forth peace, wherby is declared that the battaile that sin had stirred vp against vs, is now at an end. For sin beyng by the death of Chyist blotted out, and the righteousnes of chryist being imputed vnto vs of God through faith, of enemies we are made frendes, wherby is made open vnto vs an entrance vnto his manifold grace, and to the obtaynement of innumerable benefites. For so long as  $\psi$  warre endured, we were a great way off fro God, and strangers from the promises: but now that the peace is made by the mediation, we are brought nearer, there is geuen vs free access vnto God: which access  $\psi$  Apostle woorthely putteth in the second place: as which could not haue come vnto vs, vnles we had first obteyned peace. Farther thirdly, followeth reioycing in the hope of the glory of God. For who will not now hope, that he shal be adorned with the glory of God? Whome will not so assured an expectation, of so great a thyng of the glory (I say) of God, make ioyfull and glad? And of how great force and power this reioycing in the hope of the glory of God is, that which followeth declareth.

And not that onely, but also we reioyce in afflictions. ] Of so greates force is this reioycing, that those thynges which men, especially wicked men, count for a dishonour, and from which they abhorre, and by which they iudge themselves vnhappy, those thynges (I say) Christians count for a prayse, and gladly embrace, and reioyce chiefly in them. For euen as the Planets direct their course farre otherwise then doth the S. spere (for it moueth from the East to the West, but the Planets from the West to the East) so godly men gladly embrace those thynges, & of them & in them reioyce, which the wicked fly fro, and count ignominious: which is a thyng vndoubtedly rare and worthy of admiration. For to reioyce of the promises, & for that he hath obtained the glory of God, it is not to be mar uelled at. But in afflictions to reioyce, passeth all humane reason. Farther, because it is no reioycing, vnles it be for principall & singular good thynges, which we now so assuredly possesse, that they can not be takē from vs (for otherwise it should be no true reioycing, but rather a boasting) lest our reioycing for the hope of the glory of God, should seeme bayne, because we haue not yet in very dede the fruition thereof, he addeth what good thynges God in the meane tyme whilest we liue here bestoweth vpon vs: namely, tribulations, patience, experience, and hope which confoundeth not. Vndoubtedly a very excellent and most profitable gradation, and worthy to be obserued of vs all against doubtfull and feareful tymes. But godly men sometimes sigh, are sad, and are heauy, and complayne, when they fall into afflictions, how then do they reioyce? Here is no contradiction at all. For our outward man sigheth, is heauy, is sad, the flesh complayneth. But the spirite and our inward man reioyceth, & is glad. When Dauid went forth of the city from the face of Absalon bare footed, his hed vncovered, and with many teares, outwardly there appeared in him no signification, but of misery and sorrow. For Semei, which vpbayed vnto him this misery, saw in him nothing but misery and sorrow. But who can doubt, but that he, as touching faith, and the inward man, reioyced exceedingly for the fatherly correction of God: For therunto was his minde bent, and therefore he spared Semei, when as Abisay would haue killed him. For how knowest thou (sayd he) whether the Lord hath commaunded hym to curse me? What one and y selfe same man may haue contrary affections Dauid declareth, when he saith: Serue the Lord with feare, and reioyce in him wyth trembling. But afflictions (thou wilt say) are euill: how then can we reioyce in them: That they are euill no man will deny. For they are punishments of sinne, souldiours of death, the last enemy that shall be driuen out of the world, and at the length from godly men be utterly remoued. For God shall wipe away all teares from the eyes of the saintes. We confesse that afflictions are of their owne nature euill: howbeit we say, that vnto the godly and vnto the elect of God, of whom we here speake, they are by the clemency of God, made good and profitable, For vnto the al things work vnto good. For neither do they suffer these things to theyr hurt, but to their triumph. And these things are like vnto the red sea, wherein Pharaoh was drowned, but Israel was saued: for in the wicked they stirre by desperation, but in the godly a most assured hope. They are instrumentes, whereby in vs is shewed forth the godnes and might of God, both in comfortyng vs, and also in erectyng vs. They are occasions of most excellent good things. The power of God is in our infirmitie made perfect. By these thinges as by a fatherly chastisement are corrected our daily falles: haughtines and pride is kept vnder: the flesh and wantonnes is restrained: our olde man is brought to corruption, but our inward man is renued, sluggishnes and slouthfulness is shaken of, the confession of faith is wrought out, the unbecillitie of our strengthes is vncouered: and we are prouoked moze feruently to pray and to imploze the fauour of God, and daily the better vnderstand & peruerfenes of our owne nature. Farther by afflictions we are made like vnto Christ. For it behoued Christ to suffer, and so to obteyne his kingdome, & we also ought to follo the selfe same steppes. For the kingdome of God suffreth violence, and narrow is the way which leadeth to lyfe. But euen as he after the obedience of the crosse was exalted, and had geuen vnto him a name aboue all names: so also if we shal suffer together with hym, we shal raigne also together with him, and it is a swete thyng also vnto a louer to suffer for the thing that he loueth. Hereby also we accustom our selues to patience, that beyng become as harde as the adamant stone, when we are smitten we shal rather be weary, then once bryake. For these are as it were exercises in the body of a man: by which is confirmed health, and strengthes are gotten, rather then that by them they are taken away or weakened. Wherefore the godly do vpon good consideration reioyce in afflictions.

Knowing that affliction worketh patience. ] Here is to be noted a phrase of speech much vled in the holy scriptures: whereby that which longeth vnto the thing is attributed vnto the instrument or signe: & that this maner is oftentimes vled in the sacramente, we haue many times proued by Augustines intnde: although our aduersaries are soze agaynst this. Here Paul attributeth vnto afflictions that which is the worke of God and of the holy ghost, namely to worke patience: by which affliction, sozasmuch as they are of theyr owne nature euill and odious, patience is not gotten but rather shaken away: which thing in the wicked we se to be playne: who when they are somewhat greuously afflicted: burst out into blasphemies, and also oftentimes fall into desperation. And as a phisition of thinges benemous and hurtfull composeth most healthfull medicines: so almighty God by his wisdom out of afflictions, how euill so euer they be bringeth forth most excellent vertues: amongst which is patience. This vertue pertayneth to fortitude, vnto which are referred all the thinges that the saintes suffer, whither it be in the stout bearing of afflictions, of the body or in the overcoming of reason and mortifying of the wisdom of the flesh. The Ethnikes also suffered many thinges with a valiant minde. But yet bare they them with no sound consolation. Only they sayd, that by sorow they could nether chaunge them nor let them. For they ascribed them vnto the necessity of the matter. Wherefore they sayd, that this is our lot, that as it were at a banquet we must ether drinke or depart. And if we chaunce to dye, ether after death we shal haue no fealing, or if there be any, we shal be in a better state. In this maner did they frame themselves after a sort to beare al aduersities. But in godly men the consideration of valiantnes and of patience is farre otherwise, they haue other causes and other meanes whereby to confirme themselves. For they beare

not these thinges, as though they happned rashly. But for that they know, that by a singular prouidence they come from the most louing and almighty God, from God (I say) theyr father, which with a louing minde, and by his right hand sendeth those afflictions, y<sup>e</sup> is, to the saluatio<sup>n</sup> of the Elect. And for the same cause they also with theyr hand, that is, patietly receaue them and take them in good parte, cryinge with Dauid: It is good forme, that thou hast humbled me, and with Iames, All ioy they think consisteth in those aduersities which the most good and most wise God theyr father sendeth. They alwayes lift vp the eyes of theyr minde to these promyses of Christ. Blessed are they which mourne, for they shall receaue consolation: Blessed are they that suffer persecution for righteousness sake, for theirs is the kingdome of heauen. They suffer all things valiantly: not because by sorrow they can not be changed, but because they know, that in valiantly suffering, they offer themselves an acceptable sacrifice vnto God: and perswade themselves, that they shall one day be deliuered from those euils, for which are layd vp for them most ample and euerlasting ioyes with which no sorrow, be it neuer so sorrowful can be compared. For the sufferings of this time are not worthy the glory to come, which shall be reuealed in vs. The Ethnikes oftentimes gaue ouer in the middelt of theyr miseries, because they wanted strengthes to perseuere, neither vnderstoode they from whence they should require strengthes, by reason they knew not the true God, nor theyr owne imbecility. But holy men stand fast, abide by it, and perseuer: for that knowing the infirmity of theyr owne strengthes they flye vnto Christ: who strengthning them, they are able to suffer all things: if he comfort they they doo not only perseuer, but also euen in the very seruentyes of the payne reioyce and be glad. The Apostles went from the sight of the Counsell reioysing, for that they were counted worthy to suffer contumely for the name of Christ.

Patience bringeth experience.] This experience is a certayne triall both of our selues, & of our owne strengthes, & also chiefly of the goodnes & might of God. For in this suffering of aduersities we learne how greate the corruption of our nature is, which vnles the holy ghost helpe, when it is touched with any aduersity, straight way buristeth forth into blasphemies, and complaynts agaynst the prouidence of God. Hereby we learne how broken and weakned our strengthes be by reason of sinne. For we should sincke vnder afflictions, if we were not stayed by the might of Gods helpe. Of this thing we haue an excellent example set forth in Iob: for he being deliuered of God vnto the deuill to be tried, how great blasphemies powred he out in his affliction: How much complayneth he of the prouidence and iustice of God: The light of the holy ghost had no soner illuminated him, but how agayne plucked he by his spirits: How godly and holy an opinion had he of God: The perversnes of our nature lieth hidden from vs. For the hart of man is vnsearchable. But looke how soone fyre is striken out of the flint stone, so soone buristeth forth our perversnes, when affliction oppresseth vs. And this triall (as sayth Peter) is as a fornaice vnto gold. And therfore God answered vnto Abraham, when he was now redy to sacrifice his sonne, and had his sword redy drawen and stretched out to strike him, Now I know that thou fearest God. God in depe knew that well inough before: but by that fact he brought to passe, that this obedience was the better known vnto others. For we are like vnto certayne spices, whose sauour is not smelt, vnles a man vse them wel, we are also like vnto stones, whereout is fire striken, which shew not forth that force which they haue to burne, but when they are well pressed betwene the fingers.

Experience bringeth hope.] So hath God disposed these his instrumētts that they helpe one another, and one is the cause of another. By reason of the hope of the glory of God afflictions are not troublesom vnto vs: but, God geuing vs strengthes, we beare them with a valiant minde. In this paciēce we haue a greater profe and triall of the power and goodnes of God towards vs. Therof we conceaue a greater hope. So hope engendreth and bringeth paciēce, and agayne patience hope. For when we consider, that God hath holpen vs to beare afflictions patiently, we hope, that he will also hereafter helpe vs, and at the length make vs blessed. The sicke man, for y he hath confidence in the phisition, suffereth his botche or soze to be cut. Afterward as he feeleth himselfe relieved, he more & more putteth confidence in the phisition: so that if neede were to cut his foote also, he would not be asfearde to committe himselfe to his discretion. The deuill as much as he can driueth vs to desperation, and by afflictions goeth about to perswade vs, that God is our enemy. But contrariwise the holy ghost saith, because thou hast quietly and patiently borne affliction, it ought to be a sure token vnto thee, that God in it declareth his fauor towards thee. Wherefore haue hope, for he will vndoubtedly deliuer thee. And although James putteth experience before patience, whereas Paul putteth it after, yet is there no disagreeement betwene them: For Paul meaneth that experience, which is geuen at length after the battayle, that we mought haue a full triall of our selues: and James meaneth the selfe same experience, but yet as it is gotten and engendred by the exercise of tribulations. But that which James addeth, Patience hath a perfect worke, may be expounded two maner of wayes: either that he exhorteth vs to persuerance in suffering, that our patience may be absolute and perfect, as which falleth not away: or else, that we should be of a perfect mynde towards those which afflict vs, of so perfect a mynde (I say) that we desire not to haue them recompensed for the injuries, which they do vnto vs.

And hope confoundeth not. This is a notable chayne, and an excellent connerion of Christian degrees. Of this chayne, the first linke is fastened to the post of afflictions in this worlde: from thence the godly ascend to patience: from patience to experience: and from experience to hope, which hope, forasmuch as it maketh not ashamed, but remouing all doubt attaineth to God which is our chiefe felicity, is fastened to him as of the laste linke of the chayne the highest and chiefest. This selfe same propriety of Not confounding belongeth to faith also. For none that beleueth in hym shall be confounded. And that not without cause. For what can be of more nere affinity vnto faith, then hope? The Latine interpreter turneth it, Non confundit, that is, confoundeth not. Howbeit, it mought be more properly turned, Non pudefacit, that is, maketh not ashamed. And it is a figuratiue kind of spech. For Pauls mind was to signifie, that the godly can not be frustrated, of their hope, for they whiche are frustrated, namely, when thinges fall out farre otherwyse then they hoped for, commonly are ashamed. Wherefore Paul, by shame, vnderstandeth frustration, because shame alwayes followeth it. But the Latine interpreter had a regarde to that perturbation of the mynde, whiche followeth shame. For to confounde is nothinge els, but to perturb or to trouble. Now if this sentence be true, as in deede it is moste true, namely, that this hope confoundeth not, it followeth, that it dependeth not of our woorkes. For otherwysse it shoulde oftentymes faile. But that it is true and certayne, Paul declareth not by one word only, but by thre, and those of great efficacy. For first he bleth this word knowing, which betokeneth an assured knowledge of a thing. He maketh mention also of reioycing, which can not haue place with godly and wise men, but of those good thinges which they assuredly and firmly possesse. At the last he addeth, that hope confoundeth not. And it is not without cause, that he oftentymes induceth perswasions of this certaintie, for that therese chiefly is consolation to be sought for in afflictions. When Christ hong vpon the crosse, the wicked rayled agaynst him, saying: he hoped in God, let him saue him, if he will haue him. Let him come downe from the crosse. &c. The selfe same thinges are layd agaynst vs, not only by outward enemyes, but also by our selue and outward senses, and humane wisdom. How can we resist these, but by the doctrine of the Apostle: hope confoundeth not: the hope which we haue put in the Lord maketh not ashamed. The Sophisters by this place contend to proue that hope hope springeth of merites: because Paul sayth it springeth of patience though we should thinke, that hope is geuen vnto vs by the merite of patience. But in the meane tyme they make not, that those thinges which Paul here by a certayne order disposeth, or not to compare the one to the other, as causes and effects. For who will say that afflictions are the cause of patience: and if it be not so, why should they more affirme, that patience is the cause of hope: The scripture most playnly teacheth, that he which putteth confidence in man or in any creature is accursed; for a man of whose promise we depend & assure our selues, may either dye, or alter his mynde, or also be letted, that he can not sayth fully perform that which he promised. And to put confidence either by cause of merites, or by reas of woordes, is to put hope in man. Wherefore such hope woorthely maketh ashamed: but the hope which is fixed vpon God is certaine, neyther can be deceaued. The Sophisters go about craftely to auoyd this sentence by two places of Paul, the one to the Romanes, the other to Timothe. The place to Timothe is thus, I know whome I haue beleued, and I am assured. But the other to the Romanes is thus, I am assured that neither death, nor life, nor angels, &c. By these places they thinke is ouerthrowne our sentence, for that they thinke that these wordes are to be vnderstand, not vniuersally of all beleuers, but only of Paul, and such other like which had a peculiar reuelation, that they shoulde obayne saluation. But these their enterprises are in vayne. For here is now entreated of the nature and propriety of hope: whereby is manifestly proued, that al they which are endued with it, are sure of their saluation: so that they must needs confesse, that they which doubt of their saluation either haue not the hope which longeth to a Christian, or els if they haue that hope, they must needs be assured of their saluation: But if a man shall say, what if I shall be vniworthy, and therefore God will not bestowe vpon me the chiefe reward: I answer that this is a wrangling of the conscience and is to be overcome by an assured hope. For the obayning wherof we must cleue fast vnto the word of God. Such as is this. God is saythfull, which will not suffer you to be tempted aboue your power, but will together with the temptation make a way out: & such like places of the holy scripture, wherein God promisseth that he will geue perseuerance to hym vnto the ende. And to speake briefly, the hope of the godly leneth only vnto the goodness, power, and mercy of the only God. This thing Basilus vnderstand right wel in his exposition vpon the 31. Psalme, when he interpreteth these wordes, hoping in his mercy. He sayth he) which putteth not confidence in his owne proper deedes, neyther hopeth to be iustified by workes, hath his hope of saluation onely in the mercy of God. For when he shall consider these thinges with himselfe, Beholde God, and his rewards, &c. But the schole men haue taught farre otherwise. For the Master of the sentences in the thirde booke thus defineth hope: Hope is an assured expectation of the blessednes to come, comming of the grace of God and of merites going before. Which definition how absurd it is, especially as touching the latter part it is very manifest in those, which are newly from most heinous & filthy sinnes conuerted vnto Christ. For they vndoubtedly can haue no good merites, for that before they wanted charitie, from which all our workes procede: yet there can be nothing more certaine, then the they which are conuerted vnto Christ, cannot be without hope. Yea Augustine vpon the Psalm From the depth haue I called vnto the Lorde, exhorteth them that fall, and those which lye in the depth of euils, not to cast away hope, and that by the example of the thiese and of many others. It may now be demaunded of them, by what merites hope is confirmed in these me. They customably answer, that merites do not alwayes go before hope, but alwayes go before the thing hoped for. And they so declare their opinion touching this matter, that they teach the merites go before hope either in very dede, or doubtles in thought. For men newly conuerted, commonly whilest they conceiue hope of saluation appoint in minde & in thought good workes, by which they thinke to merite the last reward. But what present hope can these good workes imagined where is treated of the nature of hope generally.

the which doubteth of saluation hath not the hope that longeth to a Christian.

They which are conuerted vnto Christ want not hope although they want workes and merites. They which are most wicked ought not to cast away all hope.

Cap. 5 A Commentarie vpon the

The certainty of hope cometh of the certainty of faith.

The certainty of hope and of faith is alike.

Faith applies those things which it becometh unto him in whom it is.

Certainty as touching the object & subject.

in þ mind, which are not yet wrought produce. For of a cause which yet is not, can not be produced an effect, which already is. We should rather contrariwise affirm: namely, that this holpe will springeth of faith and of hope, then that faith or hope should procede from it, as from the cause. But it is a sport to see, how these men turn themselves, when on the one side they say, that hope is an assured expectation, and yet on the other side they will haue this to be a most firme doctrine, that no man can be assured of his saluation, vntill it be singularly reueled vnto him of God. Here they perceiue themselves fast tied, and they confesse that it is an harde matter to vnderstande what manner of certainty the certainty of hope is. Here the poore soules swete, and go to worke, and saue and imagine many thinges. First, they teache that all certainty of hope cometh of the certainty of faith: and this in dede is not amisse. For therefore we certainly hope, because by faith, we embrace the most certain promise of God. But they go on further, and say, that by faith we generally and absolutely beleue that all the electe and predestinate shall be saued, but hope maketh vs to haue confidence that we are of the number of the electe, as though hope had a perticular knowledge vnder faith: so that that which was generally apprehended by faith, is by hope applied vnto euery one of vs a parte. Wherefore they affirme that this certainty of hope is by supposition, if we be of the number of the elect, and if we continue vnto the ende. And this kinde of certainty they will haue to consist of very likely coniectures. And at the length they conclude, that the certainty of hope is lesser then the certainty of faith. But we contrariwise make the certainty of either of them alike. For looke how much faith we haue, so much hope also haue we. For faith retaineth not with it self any part of certainty, which it deliuereth not ouer vnto hope. What is a sayned sond deuise, which they bring touching applicatio, þ by hope we should primate aple vnto our selues those things which we haue by faith generally and absolutely beleued. For we do not only beleue that God is good, or the father or autho of mans felicitie: but also euery godly man by faith assureth himselfe, that God both is & will be vnto him good, is & will be vnto him a father, is and will be vnto him the autho of felicitie. Whereof cometh that certainty of hope. And therefore is it that Paul writeth, that it can not confound. And seing faith hath a respect vnto God, as to one that speaketh the truth, and hope vnto him, as to one that is faithfull and most redy to performe his promises, and God himselfe is no lesse faithfull in performing, then true in promising, we may manifestly conclude, that hope hath as much certainty as hath faith. Neither can that any thing helpe him, which they caull at the length: namely, þ hope hath certainty as touching the object, but not as touching the subject. For when (say they) it hath a respect vnto the clemency, goodnes, grace, and power of God, there is no let in those thinges, but that euery one might be saued. And therefore on that behalfe, they put a perfect certainty. But if a man consider the subject the mynd (I say) and will of him that hopeth, for as much as this minde and will is flexible, and wanereth, and may be chaunged, it can neuer be certaine or sure of saluation. But these men seme to me to deale euen as they do, which in a siege defending their citie, diligently shut and defend all other gates, but yet in the meane tyme leaue one open, through which the enemies enter in, and waste and spoyle all, which done they perceiue that they lost all their labour. So these men take exceeding great paines, that there should seme to be no vncertainty as touching the goodnes, power, and clemency of God, or merite of Christ. Whobeyt in the meane tyme, they appoint our will to be so subject vnto chaunging, that it neither can nor ought promise vnto it selfe perseuerance no not out of the woorde of God. And so they utterly take away all certainty, so that this saying of Paul, Hope confoundeth not, can haue no place, neither doth the certainty, which they go about to establish, any thinge profite. For if we looke vpon the holy scriptures, we shall not only vnderstand, that God is generally good and mighty, but also that he is euer vnto vs good and mercifull, and therefore he will confirme our will, that it shall neuer fall away from hym. For as we haue a little before mentioned: He will not suffer vs to be

be tempted, about that which we are able to beare: but together with the temptation, will make a way out. And in the first chapter of the first to the Corinthyans. He shall confirme you vnto the ende blameles, agaynst the day of our Lord Iesus Christ. For God is faythfull by whome ye are called. There are besides a great many other testimonies in the holy scriptures which promise vnto vs both perseverance and confirmation of our will by Christ: wherefore we say that this certainty of hope is a firme cleaving vnto the promises offered vnto vs, and receaved by fayth, for that we knowe that we shall not geue ouer, but continue euen vnto the last ende. And of so greate force is this hope, that as Augustine witnesseth vnto Dardanus, and in many other places, it calleth thynges that are to come, already done: as the same Augustine very well declareth by many places of Sainte Paule, and especially vnto the Romanes, vnto the Ephesians, and vnto the Colossians. For vnto the Ephesians we are sayde, to be already risen from the deade, and to be already set at the right hande of God together with Christ in the heauenly places. Vnto the Colossians, If ye haue risen together with Christ &c. And in an other place, He hath saved vs by the laver of regeneration. And vnto the Romanes, By hope we are made safe. This certainty springeth chiefly of a worthy estimation, which by fayth we conceaue touching the constancy of God, which no vnworthines of ours can make frustrate and if we looke vpon this vnworthines withdrawing vs from this confidence, we ought agaynst hope to beleue in hope, and though it neuer so much cry out agaynst vs, we ought to haue full confidence, that we shal by Christ be made safe setting before vs our father Abraham whose steps we ought by fayth to cleave vnto, he as touching the promise that he should haue issue had no consideration vnto his age, or to his wife which was past childbearing: but had a respect only vnto him which made the promise & had a consideration vnto his might, and therefore he most firmly settled with himselfe, that that should come to passe which God had promised. So although that we be vnworthy, and that our filthyness & sinnes are a let vnto vs, yet let vs haue no distrust, but that we shal by Christ be made safe: vnles we will be infected with infidelity, from which Abraham so much abhorred: for he doubted not through vnbelieve, sayth the Apostle. Wherefore this vncertainty of our aduersaries is utterly taken away from the minds of the godly. For, for this cause (as the Apostle testifieth) would God haue vs to be iustified by fayth & not by works, that the promise should abide certaine, and vnshaken: And this is in deede to geue the glory vnto God whiche thinge Abraham did. For he notwithstanding those wonderfull great impediments, hoped, that that vndoubtedly should come to passe which God had promised. Iob also so little esteemed these lets that he sayd, Although he kill me, yet will I hope in him. By which words he declareth, that it is the part of the godly, although they be severely afflicted of God, & appeare to be hated of him, yet not to cast away hope. Wherefore him let vs imitate & if our fallinges and vnworthyness themselves a gainst vs, yet let vs not distrust. Let vs in the meane tyme defest our bices, and as much as lieth in vs amend them: but yet through them let vs by no meanes be defected from the hope of saluation. For if, when the promises of God are of freed, we should looke vpon our owne worthyness, we should be stirred by to desperation, rather then to any hope. For there is no man, whose minde is not laden with many and greuous sinnes. Farther Paul teacheth vs, that peace towards God is had by Christe, and by the fayth which is towarde him: which peace vndoubtedly should ether be none at all, or ells very troublesome if we should continually doubt of his good will towards vs. Do we not alwayes in our prayers call him father? But no sonne which followeth naturall affection, doubteth of his fathers good will towards him, How then do we call him father, whome we suspect to be our enemy. There mought be brought a great many other such like reasons for the certainty of hope. But now I will in few words declare, that the fathers also in theyr writings taught the selfe same certainty. Chrysostome upon vpon this place thus writteth: do not (saith he) though thou be neuer so vnworthy discourage thy selfe, seing thou hast so great a defence & refuge, namely, the loue or fauor of the iudge. And a little afterwarde he saith, For that cause the Apostle himselfe when he saith, hope confoundeth not, ascribeth all the things which we haue receaued, not vnto our good dedes, but vnto the loue of God. Ambrose also saith That forasmuch as it is impossible, that they which are deare vnto him, should be deceaued, he would make vs assured of the promise: because it is God, which hath promised, & hath promised to those whom he counteth for deare. Augustine in his sermō which he made vpon the mōday in the Rogation weeke: Why (saith he) doth your hand tremble, when you knocke, & why is your conscience halfe on slepe when you beg? I am the dore of life, I abhorre not him that knocketh though he be vncleane. And vpon the 41. Psalm he saith. Put not hope in thy selfe, but in thy God. For if thou putt'st hope in thy selfe, thou shalt fill thy soule full of trouble: for that it hath not yet found how it may be secure or assured of the. By these words he declareth that security which we haue, cometh not of our selues, but of God. And vpon the 27. psalm when he expoundeth these words of Paul out of the second chapter to the Ephesians, we also were by nature the childre of wrath, as are others. Why doth he say we were? Because sayth he by hope now we are not: for in deede we are so still.

 But we speake that which is better, namely, that which we are in hope, because we are certaine of our hope. For our hope is not vncertaine, so that we should doubt of it. And Chrysostome vpon the .5. chapter vnto the Romanes sayth, that we ought no les to be fully perswaded of those things which we shall receaue, then we are of those things which we haue already receaued. Cyprian also in his sermon of the pestilence, when he saue the godly fearefull to dye, many wayes confirmeth them to be sure of theyr sal-uation: and amongst all other things saith, that they are asfear'd and abhorre death which are without hope or sayth. And Bernardus wonderfully reioysseth of the death of Christ, of his wounds and crosse. In that rocke he sayth he standeth, and shall not fall for no violence done against him. He maketh mencion also of many excellent things touching this firm and constant certaintie. Wherefore those things which we haue auouched of the constancy and security of hope, agree not only with the holy scriptures, and with most sure reasons, but also with the sentences of the fathers. Now it shalbe good to define hope, that the certaintie therof may the more plainly be known. Wherefore hope is a faculty or power breathed into vs by the holy ghost, whereby we with an assured and patient minde wayte for, that the saluation begonne by Christ, and receaued of vs by sayth, should one day be perfected in vs, not for our merites, but through the mercy of god. First it is said to be instilled of the holighost, because that springeth not of nature, or of our corinal actiōs. It is indeede after faith, although not in time, yet in nature: which thing we may perceaue by epistle vnto the Hebrewes. Where it is written, that that faith is the fundatiō of things to be hoped for. For forasmuch as the things which we hope for, are not euident & manifest, but are a gret way far of fro vs they ought to cleaue fast vnto faith, whereby as by a certain base or sure post they may be staied vpon. And the hope containeth expectatiō or wayting for, the epistle to the Romanes expessedly declareth in the 8. chapter, when he sayth, The hope which is seene is not hope. For how doth a man hope for that which he seeth. But if we hope for that which we see not, we do by patience wayte for it. Neither is this to be ouerhipped, the that good thing vnto which hope hath a respect, is hard and difficile. For naturally in liuing creatures the affection of hope consisteth in the grosser part of the mynde, which they call the angry part: whereby the liuing creature is moued to labour to gette that good thing which is set before it, although there seeme to be some lettes agaynst it. For by such an affection it is stirred vpon to overcome, whatsoener let cometh in the way. The wolfe being hungry meteth with a bull: and by the lust that he hath, he cometh that pray. But when he seeth the great difficulty that hageth ouer him, for that he must haue a sore battle and confliat, he is of the angry power of the mynde, by hope stirred vpon, and is not asferd to put himselfe into danger, and to fight. And so at the length, hauing put away all lettes, he obtayneth his pray. So hath God in the nobler part of our mynde

mynde placed hope: whereby is brought to passe, that when the chiefe felicity, which is a thing both difficult, and farre of from vs, is set, before vs we should not be feared away, but by fayth haue boldnes, and accesse vnto God, as Paul sayth in the 2. chapter to the Ephesians: And soasmuch as this felicity is a great space distant from the godly, it can not be otherwyle, but that in hoping they haue some griepe, and that they in themselves sorrow, that their present condition or state should be so farre remoued from felicity. But on the other side, when they are certayne and assured, that they shall attayne vnto that end, they can not but be affected with an incredible ioye. And so this faculty of hope is mingled with the affectes of ioy and sorrow. And the Apostle hath signified vnto vs some part of the sorrow thereof in that place to the Romanes: which we haue already cited, when he sayth: Every creature groaneth, and tranyleth in payne together with vs euen vnto this present: And not only the creature, but we also which haue the first frutes of the spirit, euen we do sigh in our selues wayting for the adoption, euen the redemption of our body. And, that ioy is ioynd with the self same hope, he declareth in the 12. chapter of the selfe same epistle, saying, reioysing in hope. And although fortitude and long suffering seeme to bring vnto our myndes expectation or wayting for, yet those vertues haue not this expectation but at hopes hand, which we haue now described. Neither is it to be meruayled at, that one vertue should receaue any thing of an other vertue: for they whiche are any thing acquainted with the Chyikes know, that liberality, temperance and such other vertues, haue much helpe at the handes of prudence: for by the ayde thereof, they haue a mediocrity appoynted them to follow. This is the difference, that chiefly distinguisheth hope from fayth, namely, that by fayth we admitte and embrace the promises, offered vnto vs of God: but by the helpe of hope we patiently waite, that those promises should at the length be perfozmed vnto vs. Neither was hope for any other cause geue of God, but that we should not cease of from following after that good thing, which we perceaue can not be obtained by our owne deedes: for nether are they by any meanes to be compared wth it. For the Apostle sayth, The sufferings of this tyme are not worthy the glory to come, which shalbe reuealed in vs. For that they which are endued with hope, are assured in themselves, that that which they want in the strengthes of nature and in workes, shalbe supplied by the mercy of God, and obedience of Christ. And if a man demand, whether a pure life and holy workes can any thing auaile vnto the certaynty of hope, we will easely graunt it may, so that we exclude the bying and selling of merites. For our workes of themselves haue nothing at all, whereby they can produce hope. Howbeit the perswasion of faith, may by them conceaue an argument to confirme hope, and to reason in this sort: God hath now of hys meare liberality geuen me grace, to do this or that good worke: to put away this or that vice out of my mynde. Wherefore he will yet geue greater thinges, nether will he deny me the thinges which are remayning vnto saluation. If the Sophisters had sayd thus, they mought haue bene bozne withall: for it is not strange from the reason of the Apostle. For as we shall a little afterward see, he would haue vs by those thinges, which God hath already graunted vnto vs, to be certaynly perswaded of his perpetuall loue towarde vs. But these men haue both wrytten and taught, that hope it selfe dependeth of merites, and so dependeth, that to hope without them, they say, is presumption and rashenes. But it semeth that somewhat may be objected out of the holy scriptures, which may make agaynst this sentence of Paul wherein he sayth, that hope confoundeth not. For to Timothe it is wrytten, In my first defence no man was on my side: all men forsooke me, God grant it be not imputed vnto the: but the Lord was on my side, and I was deliuered out of the mouth of the lion: and the Lord shall deliuer me from every euill worke. Here Paul hoped that he should escape the persecution of Nero: but he was deceaued: for vnder him he was slayne. And agayne to the Phillippians whē he had sayd, that he was greatly in doubt on both those sides, for that on the one side he desired to be loosed and to be with Christ, and on the other side he saw that it was necessary for him to abide in the flesh for their sake, he abideth this: And this I am sure of, that I shall abide, and with you all continue, for your furtherance, and joy of your faith. Here also agayne it appeareth, that the Apostle hoped that he should be deliuered from that captivity: which yet followed not.

Wherefore it may seme, that that hope confounded him. To answer vnto these things we will repeat that which we before sayde, namely, that hope receaueth by certainty of sayth: and sayth hath by certainty of the worde of God. Wherefore it followeth, that eyther of them is as certayne as are the promises which are offered. And God hath symple and without condition promysed vnto vs remission of sinnes and eternall lyfe, and hath commanded that we should without all doubting both beleue and hope for them. Wherefore in these things neither sayth nor hope can deceaue vs: But touching the perilles and aduersity of this life we haue no plaine and absolute promise, but as they vse to speake, vnder dysfunction. For God hath promised that he will ether deliuer vs, or els comfort vs in the dangers, that we shall not fall away, but constantly confesse his name, or if we chaunce to fall he shall restore vs agayne, & we may attaine vnto eternal life. Wherefore it is not mete that the certainty of hope should be fixed in one of these parts only. Which thing if sometimes good men do, & springeth of humane affection and not of Christian hope, and therefore it is no mirracle if they sometimes be deceaued. But nowe to returne vnto Paul: he of a certayne greate lone hoped, to abide longer with the Philippians, & to edifie them. And for that he had not this oute of the worde of God, it easely came to passe that he was deceaued.

The promises of the forgiveness of sinnes and of eternall life is simple and without condition.

We haue no absolute promise touching the perils of this life.

Why Paul was sometimes deceaued in his hope.

In the saints arise certayne doubtles of saluation

Howe the true sayth and hope are discerned from the counter sayth.

The holy ghost is not known by any other thing then by it selfe.

But the summe of the piety belonging to the Gospel is, that we assuredly settle our selues that God loneth vs, and will at the length make vs blessed. And if sometimes the mindes of the saintes are disturbed, as though they doubted of the promises of God, or of theyr saluation, this happeneth not through the default ether of sayth or of hope: but by cause so long as we liue here, we are not perfectly furnished: wherefore this doubting springeth of the flesh & of humane wisdom: we agree in dede with our aduersaries in this, that certayne doubts arise, sometimes of saluation euen in the godly. But herein we disagree from the, for that they attribute this vnto hope: but we say that it cometh of humane infirmity only, and that it is daily to be corrected, so that let a man thinke that he hath so much profited in sayth and hope, how much he feleth himselfe & more constant and firme. But how these euills spring not of sayth or of hope, but of our owne corruption, we haue before declared by an apte similitude, and will now repete the same agayne. No man can deny but that the mathematicall sciences are most certayne. Wherefore he which hath learned them exactly, boldly pronounceth, & nothing doubteth of theyr conclusions. But he which is but meanelly instructed in this faculty, oftentimes doubteth and standeth in a perplexity, for that he hath not yet perfectly attained vnto those sciences. So also are we tossed with doubts, not through sayth or hope, but by reason we hope not nor beleue so much as is needfull. But some man will say, that we are peradventure hereby deceaued, for that in the steade of the true sayth or hope, we haue only their shadowes. For we can not easely discern the true hope and sayth from the counterfeite and fained hope and sayth. I answer, that by this instance can not be taken away the properties of sayth or of hope: for although one or two can not discern the, yet they remaine still firme in their owne nature. As we se it is in liberality and prodigality. For there are many which can not distinguish the one from the other and yet are not therefore theyr proprieties and conditions taken away. Paul in this place entreatech of the nature & propriety of hope. If thou wilt afterward demand how these faculties or powers are discerned frō the counterfeite, we answer that they are declared by the force and power of the holy ghost: which holy ghost hath in all spirituall things no other light more clere the it selfe wher by to be illustrated: which thing we se also true in the Sonne. For it is not declared red to be the Sonne, but by his owne light. Wherefore Paul vnto the Romanes ver-ry aptly sayd, It is the spirite which beareth witnes vnto our spirite, that we are the children of God. But besides this light of the holy ghost is required also the examination of our selues: whereof Paul thus speaketh in the latter epistle to the Corinthians: Try your selues whether ye be in fayth. In which triall we must make a distinctio of hope. For there is one hope which hath alwaies toynded to it repentance, and a desire of amendment of life: of which kinde of hope the Apostle speaketh when he sayth, that it confoundeth not. For it hath alwayes these companions toynded with it, namely, fayth, and charity. Wherefore when we teach the certaintie therof, we open not a window vnto vices, as our aduersaris slander vs, neither doe we stirre vp men to lose life. For this true hope stirreth not vs vp to these things: but rather impelleth vs to liue accordingly to that hope. There is an other hope which may rather be called security of the flesh: whereof Augustine thus rightly speaketh: Suche as cleaue vnto it, by hopeinge perishe. And those are they which say, God is good, & loneth vs: Christ died for our saluatiō: howsoeuer we lead our life, we shall obteyne saluation. Of this hope we must diligently beware: for it is far distant from repentance, & a desire to liue wel: & being of y nature, it vter-ly drieth away from it fayth and charity. This hope miserably deceaureth men.

Wherefore of it Paul here speaketh not. Now remaineth to se, whether the blessed spirites or soules may in heauen haue this true hope, wherewith the godly are now adorned. For on the one side we knowe that they wayte for the resurrection of the bodies, and the last iudgment: which shall be vnto them very welcome: wherefore in that behalfe they seeme not to be vterly voyde of hope. A-gayne one the other side, the Apostle vnto the Corin: describeth fayth hope, and charity: but of these three he sayth, that only charity falleth not away. By which wordes he manifestly teacheth, that true hope can haue no place when we be in heauen. And y whiche we haue sayd of the godly, may also be called in question touching Christ: for he also seemeth to haue hoped, that he should rise agayne, and that he should carpe by his humane nature into heauen. To these things we answer, that it ought not to be denied, but that both Christ hoped, and also the soules of the blessed doo yet after a sort hope. But we deny, that it is such a hope as is ours, which we haue in this life. Because, as we haue before declared out of the wordes of the Apostle, our hope hath toynded with it, as companions, sighing and sorrowe: which thinges vndoubtedly in the eternall felicity, which the blessed haue fruition of in heauen, can haue no place. Farther our hope cleaueth fast vnto fayth which engendereth an vnperfect and an obscure knowledge: for as Paul sayth vnto the Corin: We se now by a glasse in a riddle, & we know but by a part. But y saints in heauē know most perfectly & most clearly. Wherefore soasmuch as fayth, hath chiefly a respect vnto the last & chiefe good thing, there ought not to be ascribed vnto y blessed which now hold & pos-sele that good thing such a hope as is ours. For the true & proper hope can haue no place in eternall felicity. It is only so longe as we liue here geuen vnto vs as an anker: for so the epistle which is written vnto the Hebrues calleth it. For so long as we are tolled with the waues and tempests of this world, vnles our minde be confirmed and stablished by the anker of hope, our shippe will easi-if (as Paul straight way declareth) we diligently wayght the singular benefites of God. Which benefites soasmuch as they are most playnly contayned in the holy scriptures, by reading of them our hope shalbe very much confirmed. Which thing Paul most clearly taught in this epistle when he sayd, Whatsoeuer thinges are written, are written for our learning: that through patience and consolation of the scriptures we should haue hope. Which selfe same thing Dauid also sayth, They hope in thee, which haue known thy name. Wherefore seeing the nature and name of God is no where better vnderstand then in the holy scriptures, it followeth, that by the we ought to confirm our hope: which thing if we diligently obserue, our mynde shall not be discouraged, when God (as oftentimes his manner is) permitteth our doings to come even to shame: which thing we see happened in Christ our saviour. For he was so utterly forsaken of God, that he was put by on the crosse, and died a most ignominious death betwene two thieves. David also was brought to that point, that not only being expelled out of the kingdome of Israel, he was fayne to wander in desert places, but also was in a manner fast holden and closed in the handes of Saule. The selfe same thing we see very oftentimes to haue happened in other of the Saints, that they were iudged in a manner to haue bene deceaued, and to haue fallen from their hope. But the spirite of Christ giveth strength that men are able in the midst of their calamities to reioyce and to say: These things shoulde haue no power in vs, if it were not geuen the fro aboue. Which sentence Christ layd agaynst Pilate, when he boasted of his power. The 42. Psalme also hath excellently wel taught vs, how we ought to comfort our selues, and with a good hope to erect our mynde. For thus it is written: Why art thou dejected oh my soule? Why art thou so discouraged? Hope in God: for I will yet make my confession vnto him. My health is in his countenance. Pether doth God for any other cause commonly deprive his of outward helpes and aydes of this worlde, but to gather together their dispersed hope, & not to suffer it to leane vnto too many aydes. And these sondry and manifold aydes he changeth for one principall ayde, and the same most firme: to the ende we should wholly depend of him. By this difference of a firme hope, Christians much differ from Epicures and Ethnikes. For if there come any great calamity vnto them, straight way they exclaime and cry out: If there be a God that hath a care ouer these things: If there be a God that seeth these things. So they call not vpon God: but being in dispayre utterly discourage themselves. But contrariwise godly men most constantly cry vnto God: neither doubt they but that their prayers reach vp enen vnto heauē: and that God hath a care both ouer, them and all theirs. But because humane wisdom continually walleth, and faimeth, that it doubteth not indeede of the power of God, but only doubteth of his will, therefore let vs see, how of this thing Paul hath made vs certayne.

Because the loue of God is shed abroad into our hartes by the holy ghost, which is geuen vnto vs.] These wordes, signify all one as if he had sayd, hereby thou mayst gather that thy hope shall not be made frustrate, for that God loveth thee. Which loue the holy ghost hereby perswadeth thee of, for that the only sonne of God was for thy sake deliuered vnto the death. Wherefore now oughtest thou not any more to be in doubt of the will of God. It is geuen vnto the freely, and that (as it is after ward sayd) when thou wast an enemy, weak, wicked, and a sinner. All which things declare, that God loved thee not meanelly, but most abundantly. Pether hath he only geuen thee these things, but also hath geuen thee the holy ghost, that thou mightest thoroughly seele them. And this is done in regeneration: for there, whilst by fayth thou takest holde that Christ died for thee, thou art borne agayne, and made partaker of the nature of God. For enen as the spirite of man maketh a man, so the spirite of God by adoption maketh vs the children of God: whiche spirite if it were geuen vs (as sayth Chrysostome) enen now from the beginning before we laboured, undoubtedly many more things shall be geuen vnto vs, seeing that we go aboute continually to frame our selues to the will of God. Now we take holde of the roote and fountayne of all good things. From this spirite cometh that glorious resurrection, as we are taught by this epistle. For he which raysed vp Christ from the dead (sayth Paul) shall rayse vp also your mortall bodies, because of his spirite, which dwelleth in you. Pether is this life which we live in Christ counted to come from

from any els where, then from the holy ghost. For the wisdom of the flesh (saith Paul) is enmity agaynst God. But the wisdom of the spirite is life and peace. God would that we should in this life haue a pledge, and earnest peny, and a triall of the saluation to come. And therefore in those, which are in Christ, he hath engrauen and emprinted his spirite. Neither neede we (saith Ambrose) forasmuch as we are so deare vnto God, to be afraid that we should of him be deceaued. And Paul hath not without a cause made mencion of the holy ghost: for he it is, which beareth witness vnto our spirite, that we are the sonnes of God, and by him we chiefly acknowledge the thinges that are geue vs of God. For as it is written in the first to the Corinthians: We haue not receaued the spirite of this world, but the spirit which is God, to know the thinges which are geuen vs of God. But because we can not by certayne demonstracions, or by experience of the sence teach vnto the infidels this loue of God, whereof the holy ghost maketh vs assured, therefore it is sayd to be powred into our hartes. For we are in this life like strangers: which although at home they come of a noble parentage and are rich, yet so long as they are abiding amongst strange nations, they are not had in estimation. But yet they knowing their owne nobility, reioyce in their hart, and passe not by on the vayne opinions that other men haue of them. So we hauing the loue of God shed abroad into our hartes, when we are as soles & miserable men derided of the wicked, are nothing at all moued with their iudgement, being fully contented with our state and condition. Augustine somewhat otherwise expoundeth this place. For he thought, that by loue is to be vnderstand that loue wherewith we loue God: which exposition in my iudgement can haue no place. For we haue not therefore our hope vnshaken, because we loue God, but because we are loued of God. Farther the scope of Paul is, to confirme our hope by the benefit of the death of Christ: which maketh vs assured, not of our loue towards God, but contrariwise of Gods loue towards vs. Wherefore he concludeth his argument with these wordes: And God hath set forth his loue to wardes vs. &c. Although we also gladly acknowledge with Augustine, that the hope of godly men is somewhat confirmed, for that they now feele by the holy ghost, that they are inflamed with the loue of God, when they vnderstand that for their sake the sonne of God was of hym deliuered vnto the death. And that our loue is deriued of that loue of God wherewith he embraseth vs, it is playne and manifest: but as touching the sence of the Apostle the former exposition is more naturall.

For Christ when we were yet weake, according to the consideration of the time, died for the vngodly. For a man will scarce dye for a righteous man. For for a good man it may be that one dare dye. But God setteth forth his loue towards vs, seing that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for vs. Much more then being now iustified by his blood, we shalbe saued fro wrath thorough him. For if whē we wer enemies we wer reconciled vnto God by the death of his sonne much more being reconciled we shalbe saued by his life. And not only this, but we also reioyce in God through our Lord Jesus Christ: by whome we haue now receaued the attonement.

For Christ when we were yet weake &c. Now he expreth the reason wherby we may knowe, that God loueth vs: namely, for that he gaue his sonne for vs, whē we were yet weake, sinners, vngodly, & enemies. Wherefore we manifestly gather, that y hope can not confound vs, wherby we haue full confidence, y seing we are now regenerate and reconciled vnto God, we shal at the length obtaine eternall felicity. For if he vouchsafed to geue so much for enemies and sinners sake, vndoubtedly he will geue much more vnto his frindes and childre. Wherefore Paul setteth forth the benefite bestowed vpon mankind: the sonne of God (saith) which was geue vnto the death. Secondly he maketh a compariso, wher by is exceedingly confirmed the hope of the saythfull. Last of all he sheweth, that we doo not only hope, but also exceedingly reioyce of this loue of God towards vs. As touching the first part, he doth not coldly or sciledely declare how much good God hath bestowed vpon vs, when he gaue his sonne for our saluatiō: but with greate amplificatiō he setteth forth the matter, namely, that his sonne was not geuen for all men, but for those which were viterly vnworthy of all mercy. For before we wer by the benefite of God made partakers of this redemption, we could by no helpe, or force of our owne, helpe our selues. And therefore Christ is sayd to be geuen for weake ones, which wholly needed all maner of helpe. And those selfe same being wicked and vngodly refused the helpe offered vnto them. And when they were sinners, these euells daily increased more and more: For both the infirmity was increased, and the remedy grew the more in hatred by reason of theyr impiety, which more and more encreased. This also helped there vnto, for that men were now declared to be open enemies. And it was a greate matter to vndo and make void those thinges: which were once decreed. This is the meaning of these wordes, vweake, vngodly, sinners, and enemies.

For a righteous man, and for a good man. ] Seeing that all men are loth to dye, thereby is manifest, how greate was the loue of Christ towards vs, which would dye for such as once were we, as hath now bene declared.

For the righteous. ] Some hereby haue vnderstand a iust cause: For they whiche haue deserued death canne scarcely bee perswaded, too take theyr death patient.

For the Good. ] That is they more willingly dye for that which is profitable and pleasant, as the parentes for theyr chyldren, the husbands for their wyues, merchants for theyr merchandise. Origen bringeth an example of the Partirs, which suffer death for Christs sake, who is in very dede good. Others make mention of the Decians, Curtians, Codrians, and the byetherne called Phileni, which of theyr owne accorde gaue theyr liues for theyr countrey. For all these seemed to haue bene moued to geue themselves to the death, both for that which is iust, & for that which is profitable. For it was a thing iust, that they should be so kind vnto theyr countrey, in the defence thereof to be willinge to shedde theyr liues. Farther also by theyr death they seemed to preserve those, who were vnto them most deare. Andoubtedly for my part I thinke with Chrysostome, that by these wordes Iust, and Good, are simply to be vnderstand good men and iust men: although Ierome to Algasia in his 7. question taketh Iust and good substantiue, for a thing iust and good. But why Paul sayd, Scarce for a iust man, and addeth: peradventure for a good man, I thinke this to be the cause: for that they which seemed sometimes to dye for others (which thing yet very rarely happened) the thing being well considered, may be sayd to haue died for their owne sake, and not for any other mans sake. Either for: y they would winne glory, or els for that they saw that all thinges went against them: and not being able to abide that, they chose rather to die. But how farre the Decians and Curtians, and suche other like were distant from the pure loue of Christ, may be declared by many arguments. For first, they were not of that dignity, that they should be compared to Christ: wherfore, their life which they gaue, was not of like valew. Farther, would they or milde they, they should at one tyme or other haue died, and peradventure euen the selfe same tyme, when the host was like to haue bene vanquished of the enemies. But when death hangeth ouer mens beds, it commonly maketh them the more fierce and bold, as we read of Solon: for he, when he had rayled by the citizens against the Tyranne Pisistratus, being demaunded what thing made him so bold alone aboue others, to take vpon him such an enterpryse, answered, his olde age. For when he saw that he should within a while afterwarde dye, he easely perswaded himself willingly to dye for his countrey sake: but Christ not being obnoxious to death, and yet for our sakes geuing himself vnto the death, declared himselfe a much greater loue towards vs, then they did towards their countrey country. For they died for their country, which was sweet unto them; for their wives, for their children, & for their lates: but Christ would be slain for weak persons, for sinners, for enemies. Before this was set glory: for when they in such sort died, they were an admiration to all men, & were publicly highly commended & praised: but Christ died a most vile death, so that also he was reckoned amongst thieves, when as otherwise he was of all men the most innocentest. Last of all they when they died, had no consideration of God: but Christ, whatsoever he did, did it of an obedience toward the eternall God his father. Wherefore whether we looke upon our selues, or upon Christ which suffered, we can fynde no cause of his death, but the meere lone of God towardes vs: for we were so miserable and paste grace, that we coulde by no merite of ours allure God to lone vs. Further Christ was so perfect, and so heaped up with all manner of felicity, that he had no neede of that death, thereby to attayne the more commodity. And that is counted a singular and pure lone, which nether followeth his owne commodities, nor is after a sort violently drawen of the worthynes of the thing it selfe. And herein vndoubtedly Christ hath excellently well resembled his father, and declared himselfe to be the sonne of God. For he rayneth vpon the iust & the vniust, & graunteth life, & doth good to men that are conuincelous agaynst him: and as (Iohn sayth) loved vs first. Some of the Ethnik philosophers thought, that they had done a very great acte, when they were not moued with iniuries, and for that cause they were counted like vnto God: but Christ farre excelled them. For he was not only not agaynst wicked ones & his enemies, but also loued them, and so loued them, that he gaue his life for them. Wherefore soasmuch as God is constant, nether will easely chaunge his will, and seeing that he hath geuen vnto vs so much, vndoubtedly he will afterwarde geue greater thinges: and seeing that he hath once begonne to be beneficiall vnto vs, he will not cease of, vntill he haue adorned vs with all manner of benefites. He hath bene found faithfull in many promises, he promised to take vpon him humane flesh, he tooke it: to preach the Gospell, he preached it: To dye for our saluation, he died: To rise agayne from the dead, he rose agayne: To ascende vp into heauen, he ascended vp: To geue the holy ghost, he gaue it: To cal the Gentles, he hath called them. What is now behynde, but the last resurrection, and everlasting glory to be redored vnto the faithfull: vndoubtedly if he haue faithfully performed all other thinges, he will not in this one thing which is remaining breake his sayth. There were two thinges to be done (saith Chrysostome) which seemed very hard: namely, that sinners should be iustified, and that the Lord should dye for them. And forasmuch as both these thinges are now done, the thinges which are remayning shall vndoubtedly be performed. And Ambrose saith, that the thinges which are remaining to be done, are now made very easy. And where as Paul sayth:

According to the time. It may be referred vnto the death of Christ, which happened not at euery tyme, but at a tyme certayne, opportune, and appointed of God. For if all thinges haue their appoynted tyme, much moze is the same to be affirmed of the death of Christ. Wherefore Paul saith, that he was geuen, when now was come the fulnes of time. And Christ many times said, either that his houre was now come, or that it was not yet come. That particle also may be added to that which is sayd, that we were weak: namely, as the consideration of the tyme required. For when we were strangers from Christ, we lyued a weak life: which yet is not so to be taken, as though the consideration of the tyme coulde excuse that infirmity. For tyme vndoubtedly brought not that infirmity vnto vs: for men were rather made weak by their owne transgression. Although Ambrose vnderstand those wordes, According to the tyme, of the three dayes wherein Christ lay deade in the sepulchre. But it skilleth not much which of these three interpretations a man followe. But chiefly by these wordes of the Apostle we ought to consider, what estate they are in, which are not yet regenerate, nor made partakers of the death of Christ. For Paul pronounceth them to be weake, sinners, enemies, and wicked men. Where then can these woꝝkes of preparation haue place, foꝝ which our aduersaries make so much ado? But these men dreame I know not of what middle states wherein men lyue not altogether godly, noꝝ vtterly vngodly. Amongest which kinde of men they recen Cornelius the Centurion, whose almes were gratefull and acceptable, and his prayers heard of the Lord, when as yet he beleued not in Christ. But as touching him, if (as these me say) he were not yet a pertaker of the death of Christ, noꝝ by any means regenerate, vndoubtedly by the testimony of Paul he was both an enemy of God, and an vngodly person, and therfoꝝe neither he himself noꝝ his woꝝkes could be acceptable vnto God. Wherefoꝝe, we must say, that when he prayed and gaue almes, he was not vtterly a stranger from Christ, although he were not yet so fully instructed of Christ, as mought be sufficient vnto Christian religion. But we, which ar, now by the grace and benefite of God brought vnto this knowledge, ought to geue thanks vnto God foꝝ his great loue, and to lead our life in all innocencie and puritie. And this is to do that which the time requireth, lest that be byp:aided vnto our ingratitude, which Christ reproboued in the Pharisees: Namely, that they obserued the face of heauen: but yet knew not the tyme of their visitation. So Paul interpreteth that place of Esay: Behold now the acceptable tyme, behold now the day of saluation. And that which Paul here wꝛiteth, the selfe same in a maner repeateth he in the big chapiter, where he thus speaketh: If God be on our side, who shal be against vs? Seyng he hath not spared hys owne sonne, but hath deliuered hym for vs all, howe hathe he not together with him geuen vs all thinges? Who shall accuse the elect of God? It is God which iustificeth, who shall condemne? It is Christ whiche died: yea and which rose agayne, and sitteth at the right hand of the father, and maketh intercession for vs. These thinges serue wonderfully to the confirmation of our hope, as in due place we shall declare.

Nothing
more deare then children.

Why God
hath shewed so great loue towards
vs.

And God setteth forth his loue towards vs. It is rightly said, that God did then set forth his loue towards vs, when he deliuered his sonne vnto death of the crosse foꝝ our sakes. Foꝝ there is nothing to me more deare, oꝝ that they more esteeme then their children: and therfoꝝe we rede that wicked mothers, when they would testifie vnto their adulterous louers their most seruent loue, and saytbe of their perpetuall vse and company, due their owne children, foꝝ that they saw they had no other more assured argument, wherby to testifie their good will towards them. So God, when foꝝ our sakes he deliuered his sonne vnto the death, and that vnto a most shamefull death, gaue vnto vs a most sure token of his exceeding great loue towards vs. That he created the world foꝝ our sakes, was in dede a great sign of his good will towards vs, although in it rather shyned forth his power, and deuine might, and wisdom. Foꝝ it is the part of liberall and fr̄e harted Lordes, to geue and to bestow many thinges vpon their subiects. Howbeit Lordes wil neuer go so farre, that they will endaunger themselves foꝝ their seruantes sake. Wherefoꝝe when God gaue his sonne vnto the death foꝝ our sakes, therin (as Paul sayth) he most of all did set forth his loue towards vs. Which thing he therfoꝝe did, to stir vs vp to loue him agayne. God had commaunded vs in his law, that we should loue him with all our hart, with all our soule, and with all our strengthes: and that we might the willinglier performe this, he would first declare his good will towards vs: that it might appere that he loued, & cared foꝝ vs more then foꝝ himself. Foꝝ he would bye euen foꝝ our sakes: which death yet we so contemne, that we will suffer nothing foꝝ it, noꝝ restraine our selues from any commodities of the body, oꝝ delights of the flesh. His will was, that all men should be in good case, and one alone in the meane tyme to suffer: but we desire to be in good case our selues alone, although all other in the meane time perish. But it is not possible that there should be in vs so great a contempt both of our owne saluation & also of the saluation of other men, but that either we beleue not so great a benefite of God, oꝝ els we do not earnestly enough weigh it. There was neuer wower, that with so great a desire and seruent loue married his spouse, as Christ hath married vnto himselfe his church.

Neither hath any man at any tyme married a wife so unlike and unfowly for hym to toyne with all, as Christ hath done the Church. For in what estate she was before Christ met with her, Ezechiel describeth in 6. chapter, where he sayth, that she lay vpon the ground, nether was her newell string cut of, nether was she washed with water, nor powdered with salt: and there was no eye whiche hadde compassion on her. Paul also hath here, and likewise in many other places, at large declared in what estate we were before we came vnto Christ. Vnto the Ephesians he doth not only say, that we were by nature the children of wrath, but also he addeth, ye were once darknes, but now ye are light in the Lord. Vnto Titus he saith: We were as fooles, not obediēte, but wādring out of the way, geuing out selues to sundry lustes, liuing in malice and enuy, hateful, and seeking to displease one another. In the first to the Corinthians, when he had reckened a beaderoll of most haynous sinnes, he sayth, these thinges vndoubtedly were ye sometimes: but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified. Wherefore we haue the sonne of God geue vnto vs as a pledge of the loue of God. He placed not in his stede an Angell, or an Archangell, although he mought so haue done. He vouchsafed to come himselfe, and to suffer a most bitter death vpon the crosse. It behoued, that for our redemption there should be some such good thing offered vnto God, which mought ether equally or els moze please God, then all the sinnes of the worlde had displeased hym. This thing hath Christ offered for vs. And if a man demaunde why the death of Christ was so acceptable vnto God, there can no other reason be geuen, but his vnumeasurable charity and loue. God coulde indeede haue ben contented with any other thing. But his will was rather to haue this thing: not by the affliction and punishmentes of Christ to feede his eyes or mynde: for that had bene the poynt of a cruell father, nether for that he foresaw the great loue and modesty in his sonne: although these thinges were in Christ most singular, and of very great force to the father: but, as indeede I iudge, for y he saw, that by this only meanes his loue towarde vs mought be most perfectly declared, and also to set forth an example of a most holy life for men to follow. For if thou demaunde whether it were of necessity, that the sonne of God should in such sorte dye: I answer, that here is to be put no necessity of compulsion: for there is nothing in God that is by violence, nether also was there any necessity of nature. For although there are in the deuine nature many thinges of necessity, as is, that it be one, that it be three, and that it begatte a sonne, and suche other, yet were it a wickednes to thinke, that anye externe effecte cometh from him by naturall necessity: when as whatsoeuer he doth, he doth it freely, and of his owne accorde, and it is free vnto him not to do what he will not. Neither do we here put any necessity by supposition of the ende. For the saluation of mā mought haue bene wrought by many other wayes and meanes, so that his will had bene so. But it was of necessity y Christ should dye, by supposition of the deuine prouidence and counsell: for that God had decreed it should be so. And this he did chiefly to declare his infinite loue.

Much more the being now iustified by his blood, vve shalbe saued from wrath through him. For if when we were enemies, we were reconciled vnto God by the death of his sonne: much more being reconciled vve shalbe saued by his life. ] Here is brought a comparison of diuers estates, both of Christ and of vs, we were before weake, vngodly, sinners, enemies. But now our condition or estate is changed, for we are now made frendes, we are now iustified, and reconciled vnto God, Christ by his death wrought much for vs: but now he liueth and that an eternal life, wherein he reigneth with y father. It was a greater matter forsooke vs to life, to iustifie vs, and to reconcile vs vnto God, then it is to bring vs being now iustified vnto felicity, and the foresayd thinges hath he brought to passe by his death: wherefore that which remaineth he shal much moze easily accomplishe being now placed in life and in his kingdome: for that whiche remaineth is lesse, and Christ to bring this to passe for vs, is after a sort mightier then then himself, Now resteth to declare, how men not yet reconciled are called the enemies of God. Of this may two reasons be given: the one is touched in the epistle vnto the Hebrues where it is said, That it is vnpossible without faith to please God. And soasmuche as men that are strangers from Christe wante sayth, and seinge that they beleue not the oracles of God, they beare witness that God is a liar: and therefore they can not please him. An other reason is, for that they are still oppressed with vices, and by meanes of they; naturall luste they all the wayes they canne resiste the will and lawes of God. Wherefoze they are woorthelye called enemies. But Paul affirmeth, that by the death of Christe we are iustified: whiche is first vnderstande, befoze God by imputatio. Secondly also, bycause dayly is augmented in vs a new righteousnes, which in liuing holily we get, by the insauratio of our strength which we haue now receaued of the holy ghost. Although we must cleane fast only to first iustification: for in it is the key of our saluation. For the other righteousnes, soasmuche as it is vnperfect, is not able to stande befoze the iudgement seate of God. When the Apostle sayth,

That we shalbe saued from vvrath. ] By wrath he vnderstandeth not a disturbance or perturbation of the minde. For these thinges can haue no place in God. But as Augustine hath wel interpyted in his booke of the Trinity, wrath in God signifieth a iust vengeance. And God is sayd to be angry: when he sheweth forth the effectes of an angry man: which are to punishe, and to avenge. So he is sayd to repent himself, that he had made man: bycause like a man that repenteth himself, he would ouerthrowe his worke. And the reconciliatio, wherof the Apostle here speaketh, is referred to this kinde of wrath, and signifieth y the vengeance is now at an end. Contrariwise it is sayd in the Gospel of John, That the wrath of God abideth vpon him, which beleueth not in the sonne of God. wherfoze we, seing we are now reconciled vnto God by the death of his Sonne, ought to be fully perswaded in our selues, that soasmuche as the wrath of God is ended and taken away, nothing can by him be sent vpon vs, but of a frendly and fatherly minde. Otherwise afflictions and aduersities mought of they; owne nature dyne a feare into vs, and perswade vs, that God is angry with vs. Which thing, soasmuche as by the death of Christ is the reconciliation made, can by no meanes come to passe. And this reconciliation pertayneth not only to those saythfull, which then liued, when Christ died vpon the crosse, but also to all as wel those which from Adams time went befoze those seasons, as also to those which shall be euen vnto the end of the worlde. And so great was the goodnes of God in this sacrifice, that whereas therein were committed of men many horrible actes (for they both condemned an innocent man, and also most spitefully crucified the Lord of glory) yet the deuine clemency was nothing at all offended with this so great iniquity and ingratitude, but that it counted as most acceptable the obedience of Christe, and his infiniteloue, and vnmesurable patience, & accepted it for the redemption of mankinde. Now resteth to se what this so great lone of God requireth agayne at our handes: for there are many thinges which it requireth. For first euen as Christ applied all his will and endeuor to redeme vs, so is it our part on the other side, vnto the whole to addice our selues vnto him. And as he setting a side all thinges, had a care only of our saluatio, so also ought we to plucke away our minde, from all thinges & not any moze to seke our owne thinges, but only the thinges that longe vnto Christ. They may be an example vnto vs, which haue returned into fauour agayne with they; enemies: for they, lest they shoulde seme to haue done any thing counterfeately or saynedly, leue no deuoty vndone, whereby to win their new reconciled frendes: and of this thing they haue a greate care not to be thought to retaine still any remnaits of enmity or hatred closed by in the mind: as we rede Cicero, Crassus, Pompeius, and many others did. Farther also we must take hede, that seing by the mercy of God, through the death of Christ we are placed place, we doo not through wicked and filthy actes thzolve our selues do wne belong from thence. For they which after they haue once ben reconciled cease not to contaminate themselves with vices, do not only fall do wne belonge frō they: most excellent estate or condition, but also, as it is written vnto the He-breues, Do tread vnder foote the sonne of God, and do pollute his blood which was shed for them. By this place also we are taught to loue our enemies: not after the common maner, as when men say, y they wilbe wel vnto they: enemy, it is through they thinke, if they hate him not: but yet in the meane time they will take no paynes ether to bring him to amendment, or to saluation. And which is moze haynous, they are not onely not beneficall towards they: enemies, but also through they: sluggishnes they suffer they: weake bzetherne to perish, they thinke at they: finnes, nether ble they any admonitions or reprehensions, that they might be amended. There are besides infinite other instructions, which the loue of God teacheth vs. For we haue no booke stuffed with moze plentifull doctrine then the death of Christ: whiche if we diligently examine, we shall be taught in a maner al duties necessary vnto saluation. Lastlye is to be noted that these thinges which Paul in this place mencioneth, are had, although indee moze bzestly, yet fully inoughe, in the 6. chapter of the Gospell of Iohn: So God loued the world that he gaue his only begotten sonnes: that euery one that beloneth in him should not perish. Here also we heare that through the loue of God the sonne was deliuered for vs. And whereas Paul sayth, enemies, vveake, vngodly, & sinners, the same hath the Euangelist signified by this one word, vworld. And whereas Paul sayth, That thorough him vve are iustified, recōiled, and shalbe saued from vvrath, that hath the Euangelist expessed in these wordes: That he vvhich beleueth in him should not perishe.

The loue
 of God
 most plentifully teacheth vs many thinges.

And not only this, but vve also reioyce in God through our Lord Iesus Christ, by vvhome vve haue novv obtayned the reconciliation.] This was the thirde part, which the Apostle vsed in making mencion of the benefite of Christ, after that he had both layd him forth before vs, and also by amplification, as it was mete, commended him vnto vs. Wherefore Paul sayth, that so great is the gift of God, that thereof we exceedingly reioyce. We are not only (sayth he) certayne that we shall be saued, but also we reioyce, not in our selues, but in God, not through our workes, but through Iesus Christ, by whome we haue obtayned reconciliation. When he sayth, that we reioyce of this benefite of God: he priuely reprooueth those, which counted it a thinge full of shame to pro-fesse Christian religion or to wayte for saluation at the handes of a man crucified, and put to a most shamefull death. Herein (sayth Paul) is nothing vile or whereof we should be ashamed: yea rather all thinges are most honozable and full of great dignitie. For here we can looke vpon nothing which testifieth not vnto vs the singular loue of God towards vs. This sentence of Paul agreeth bery well with these wordes of Jeremy in the 9. chapter: Let not the wise man reioyce in his wisdom, nor the mighty man in his might, nor the rich man in his riches, but he which reioyseth, let him reioyce in this, that he knoweth and understandeth me which worke mercy, righteousness, and iudgement, and loue these thinges in the earth. The prophet meaneth the selfe same thing that Paul doth, namely, that no man should reioyce ether for the good thinges of the mynde, or of the body, or of fortune, but only let him reioyce of this, that he knoweth the Lord. And the vnmeasu-rable loue of God can by no other thing be better or clearer vnderstand, then by the death of Christ. This is our sayth: this is the chiefest knowledge that we can haue of the goodnes of God. Hereby we vnderstand, that God hath wrought mercy, when he would by this meanes redeme vs: to haue wrought iudgement and righteousness, whē as he would not suffer our finnes to escape unpunished, but hath so severely auenged them in Christ. But because our sayth ought not to be idle, but to repay agayne the selfe same thinges, that we haue receaued of Christ, therefore the Prophet addeth, that God both loneth and requireth the selfe same

same thinges in the earth, that is, in vs. VVhereioyce, sayth Paul, and also the p<sup>ro</sup>phete, in the knowledge & sayth of so great a gift bestowed vpon vs by God. But they reioyce not, which coldly weigh these thinges: but they which feele them inwardly in the mynde, and so feele them, that they are earnestly affected. This is to reioyce in the Lord, and not in our owne workes. Wherefore that which Paul before sayd, that the elect reioyce in tribulations, here hence dependeth: for we do not reioyce of the afflictions, as they are of themselves, but for that we feele by them, that God loneth vs. Last of all our glory herein consisteth, that we haue gotten God himselfe to loue vs, and to be our father: then which felicitye could nothing haue happened vnto vs more to be desired. Rather is this to be passed ouer, that Ambrose hath noted vpon this place: that we ought not only to geue thanks vnto God for the saluation and security which we haue receaued, but also that we reioyce in God through Iesus Christ. By which wordes we gather, that he asserteth the security of saluation as well as we: to the ende our reioysing might be concerning such thinges as we haue now assuredly in our hands. Farther also hereby it most evidently appeareth, that those wordes of the Apostle which he before spake, That the loue of God is shed abroad into our hartes, are to be vnderstand of that loue wherewith God loneth vs. For of that loue this sure token we haue, in that God hath geuen his son vnto vs. Farther the Apostle intending to make vs certayne of our saluation, and to confirme vs in our hope coulde take no argument at all of our loue towardes God: for our loue is alwayes mayned and vnperfect. And therefore if a mans hope were doubtfull and vncertayne, and should by this meanes be confirmed, and willed to be of good cheare, for that he beareth a loue towardes God, he might answer straight way, that he for that cause most of all doubteth, for that he seeth his loue to be weake and colde, and that he loneth not God so much as he ought to do: and by that occasion he can not attayne to so greate a rewarde. Wherefore Paul hath appoynted an other way, and confirmeth our hope by the gift of God. And he thought it not sufficient simply thus to say: but excellently amplifieth it by the contraries and opposites. Out of this fountayne are to be sought consolations for the afflicted, when by reason of aduersities they suspect that they are hated of God. Here ought they to call to remembrance, what ones they were before they came vnto Christ: what God did for their sakes, whē they were yet enemyes, which for their saluation woulde haue his sonne crucified. And that they haue to their head Iesus Christ in heauen, whose members, and partes they are: And let it be demaunded of them, whether Christ can hate himselfe, and destroy his owne members: Wherefore they ought to thinke that their afflictions conduce to eternall saluation, and are profitably inflicted of their louing father.

Wherefore euen as by one man sinne entred into the world, and by sinne death, and so death went ouer all men, for that all men haue sinned. For euen vnto the law was sinne in the worlde. But sinne is not imputed whilēt there is no law. But death raigneth from Adam to Moses, ouer the also that sinned not after the like maner of the transgression of Adam, which was the figure of that which was to come. But yet the gift is not so as is the offence.

VVherefore euen as by one man &c.] Some thinke that Paul therefore writeth these thinges, for that after he had by most firme reasons p<sup>ro</sup>oued, that we are not iustified by our owne workes or merites, but only by faith in Christ and by grace, now he mindeth more largely to set forth the principall pointes, of which all these argumentes which he hath hether to brought, depend, namely, sinne, the lawe, and grace: And therefore maketh this treatise aparte, wherby to declare the strength and force of the former argumentes. Which whereth it be it be so or no, let other men iudge. In myne opinion vndoubtedly these thinges may very well be knytte together with the thinges that haue bene already spoken. For a man mought thinke that the passion of Christ and his death, was profitable vnto Christ himselfe only, and not also vnto vs: for that it mought be thought that the righteousness of one man can not rebound vnto an other. But Paul will declare, that euen as the fall of the first man was spred abroad ouer all men, so the righteousness of Christ hath rebounded vpon all the beleuers: and that his benefite is of no lesse force then was the sinne of Adam. And by this meanes he declareth the way, whereby by the death & crosse of Christ we may be iustified and obtayne saluation. nether is this a small helpe to confirme our hope, when we perceauie, that if we cleue vnto Christ we shall through hym be no les endelued with the chiefest good thing, then we haue bene by Adam infected with the extreamest euill thing. Many thinges are in this place not without greate consideration set forth touching sinne. For the knowledge thereof teacheth this in vs, to cause vs not to be ingrate for the benefite which we haue receaued. For he which seeth out of what and howe great euils he hath bene deliuered, seeth also, how great is the liberality and goodnes of the deliuerer and of him that hath set him at liberty. The knowledge of sinnes setteth forth also the worthynes of the iustification receaued by Christ. Wherefore Paul enquireth from whence sinne had his beginning, what it brought, how it was knowen, and last of all, by what meanes it was driuen away. Wherefore he declareth, that sinne entred in by Adam, that it brought death, that it was knowen by the lawe: that it was driuen away and overcome by the death of Christ, and sayth in hym.

The methode of Pauls treatise.

The knowledge of sinne how it is profitable.

What thinges are reasoned of touching sinne.

Euen as by one man sinne entred into the world, and by sinne death.] Were semeth to be vsed the figure *Anantapodoton, so that on the other side there should haue bene added, So by one Iesus Christ entred in righteousness, and by righteousness, lyfe. And Origene affirmeth, that Paul would not adde this, for feare of making men slouthfull and sluggish: as though they hauing now obtained righteousness and eternall lyfe, should thinke, that they now nede no farther to consider vpon eternall lyfe. And so that cause he sayth: that the Apostle in another place added this selfe same sentence in the future temple, and not in the present perfect temple: as when he writeth vnto the Corinthians: Euen as in Adam all men die, so in Christ all men shall be quickened. But this reason is of no great force. For the holy scripture is not wont to be moued with so light daungers, to kepe in silence the benefites of God: yea rather it euery where setteth them forth al whole and in ample maner, as they are: and doth not gelde them nor shorten them of, as Origene thinketh. But as for slouthfulness and sluggishnes, they are by infinite other places of the scripture sufficiently shaken of. For there are in the holy Scriptures exhortations by promises and threatninges, whereby to stir vs vp to holines of life, and to the endenour to do good workes. And Origene also himselfe confelleth, that that which the Apostle here omitteth, he afterward faithfully addeth, when he thus writeth, Wherefore, euen as by the sinne of one man euill was spread abroad ouer all men to condemnation: so by the righteousness of one man was good spread abroad ouer all men to iustification of lyfe. And a little before, For if by the offence of one man many haue died, much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which came thorough one man Iesus Christe, hath abounded vnto many. Erasmus thinketh that this discommoditie may by another way be holpen: so that the parte answering be set after this coniunction καὶ, that is, and. And the lyke kinde of speaking he bringeth out of Matthew, in the Lordes prayer, ὡς ἐν οὐρανῷ, καὶ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς. In these wordes semeth to be wanting this coniunction οὖν, that is, So. So that the sence is, Euen as in heauen, so also in earth. And after this selfe same maner he thinketh is to be made perfect this sentence of the Apostle. Wherefore, euen as by one mā sinne entred into the world, so also by sinne entred in death. But I rather thinke that here is vsed the figure Anantapodoton. For I see, that Paul is after a sorte rapte by the force of the spirit

rite to expresse y great destruction brought in by sinne. Which being done, he most manifestly (as Origen confelleth) in the second interpretation putteth that whiche wanted in the other. But the better to vnderstand these wordes of the Apostle, we haue three thinges by him set forth, which are diligently to be peised: first, what the Apostle meaneth by sinne: Secondly, what that one man is, by whom sinne entred into the world: Thirdly, by what meanes sinne is spred abroad: As touching y first the Apostle amply and largely vseth this worde Sinne, namely to signifie whatsoeuer is repugnant vnto the law of God, and vnto his will. For thereby man departeth from the institution of nature, & from that image whereunto he was created. For God so created him at the beginning, that in him should shine forth his image: whiche thing vndoubtedly cannot be, when we resist the law of God. And this is the onely and true cause, why man is not permitted to delight himselfe with all kind of pleasures. For if he should so, he should make himself like vnto brute beasts, and not lyke vnto God his creator. For God would haue man to be in this worlde bys vickar, and therfore to be most like vnto hym. And sinne being so largely taken, comprehendeth not onely Originall sinne, that is, our depraued nature, & corrupt strengthes both of the body and of the soule, but also all those euils whiche follow of it: namely, the first motions of the mind to thinges forbidden, also wicked deliberations, noughty endeuous, and vitious customes. Wherefore, the Apostle in this one name of sinne, comprehendeth both the roote it selfe, & all the frutes thereof. Neither must we geue eare vnto them which bable, that these thinges are not sinnes. For seying the holy ghost calleth them by this name, I see no cause why, but that we also ought so to speake, and to cleaue vnto this doctrine. Farther, also that these first motions of the mynde, and corruption of nature are sinnes: the very etymology of the word plainly declareth. For this worde ἀμαρτία, that is, sinne, cometh of this verbe ἀμαρτάνω: which signifieth to erre from y marke set before vs, by what means so euer it be. And forasmuch, as this is the rule of our nature, and of all our actions, to be in all thinges very like and conforable vnto God, vndoubtedly seing we are prone vnto those thinges which are forbidden vs by the lawe of God, and are euen straight way at the first hūnt caried hedlong vnto them, we must nedes without all controuersie be sayd to sinne, that is, to erre from the scope and ende set before vs. Of the lyke signification is also the Hebrewe worde: for, that whiche is in y tonge called Chataah, that is, synne, is deriued of this verbe Chata, whiche thou shalt fynde in the booke of the Judges, the xx. chapter vsed in the selfe same sence, in whiche I before sayde in the Greeke worde, ἀμαρτάνω, is taken, that is, to erre from the marke. For there it is wrytten, of the senen hundred children of Beniamin, that they were so accustomed to throwe stones out of a sling, that they would hitte euen a heare, and nothing erre from it. Farther, experience it selfe teacheth how greate these euills are, euen in vs that are regenerate. For we are by them so letted, that we can not fulfill the law of God: and yet are we bound to obserue the same in all poyntes. We are commanded also not to lust: whiche pcept howe muche it is broken of vs by reason of our pronesse to sinnes and fyrst motions to vices, euey man hath experience thereof in himselfe, and can be a witnes vnto himselfe: And if the fathers seme sometimes to wryte, that the law may be fulfilled of me regenerate, they the spake of an obediēce begonne, & of such a fulfilling, as hath ioyned with it much imperfection. For euen they affirme, that those are perfect, and doo performe the law of God, which vnderstand theyr owne wants, so that they daily say with others, Forgene vs our trespasses: and acknowledge with Paul, that they haue a greate way farther to go. The selfe same fathers also confesse, that none can be found, no not the most holiest man that euer was, that hath all vertues absolutely: For as Jerome sayth: He which excelleth others in one vertue, oftentimes faileth in an other vertue. And he citeth Cicero which sayd, That there can not easely be found one which is most excellent either in the knowledge of the Law, or in the arte of Verbozke: but to fynde one that hath excelled in both kindes together, it was neuer hard of. Wherefore y Apostle to the end he would make playne most notably notably set forth the perfect benefite of God geuen vs by Christ, both not onely to touche Originall sinne, but also in this one word sinne cōprehēdeth all kindes of vices, which springe out of it, Now let vs see by which one mā Paul saith, that sinne had such entrance in the world. That man was the first Adam, who was as a certaine common masse or lump, wherein was conteyned all mankind: which lump beinge corrupted, we can not be brought forth into this world, but with corruption and vncleannes. And although Eue transgressed before the man, yet the beginning of sinning is ascribed vnto Adam: for that succession is attributed vnto men, and not vnto women. Howbeit Ambrose by one man vnderstode Eue. But forasmuche as this word one, is the masculine gender, the signification thereof can not but hardly and with much wresting be applied vnto the womā. Others thinke, that both as well Adam as Eue are by this commō word Man vnderstand: so that this phrase of speach differeth not much frō that, which is in the 2. chapter of the booke of Genesis, Male and female created he them. Pether do they much regard this adiectiue one, for that the scripture testifieth, that Adam and Eue were one and the selfe same fleshe. The first interpretation is moze simple and playner, and therefore I the gladlier follow it. And we ought to remember, that Paul writeth vnto Timothe, that although both these first parents sinned, yet was there not in ech one and the selfe same manner of transgression. For he sayth that Adam was not deceaued. Which selfe thinge also maye be gathered of that, which they answered vnto God, when he reproued them. For the woman whē she was asked why she did it, accused the serpent, The serpent (said she) deceaued me. But Adam when he was demaunded the same question sayd not, that he was deceaued: but answered, The woman which thou gauest me, deliuered me the aple and I did eate. This is not so to be taken, as though we should affirme that there was no error in the man, when he transgressed. For as we are playnly taught in the Church, in euery kinde of sinne alwayes happeneth some error. This thing only we are taught, that the man was not so grossely deceaued, as was the woman. And this not a little furthered the argument of Paul. For in that place he commaunded, that women should kepe silence in the Church, for that she is an instrument apt to deceates. And this he confirmed by an example of our first parentes. For she which hath once moued the man to sinne, is not likely to be able to instruct him a right: and it is not mete that she which could be seduced by the deuill, & be deceaued of the serpent, should beare degree of rule in the Church. Howbeit the booke of Ecclesiasticus sayth, that sinne had his beginning of the woman, which is not to be denied, if we consider the history of the booke of Genesis. But Paul as we haue sayd, followeth the accustomed maner of the scripture, which ascribeth succession and propagation vnto the men, and not vnto the women. For he ment not at this present to teache, whether Adam or Eue sinned first. But his minde is to declare the roote, from whence sinne was spread abroad into the world. And so also is that answered vnto, which may be objected out of the booke of wisdom, That through the enay of the Deuill sinne entred into the world. Iohn also writeth that the Deuill sinned euen from the beginning. For here is not entreated of imitation of an other mans sinne, or of the perswasion to sinning. Otherwise it is true, that the first example of sinne came from the deuill, and that he was motioner and author of transgressions. But this is not the scope of the Apostle, to teach, out of what thing as from the ground and beginning sinne was by propagation traduced into mankind. And that this was the intent of the Apostle, may be proued by that Antithesis, which he maketh betwene Christ and the first Adam. For the Lord hath not renued vs or made vs iust, only by setting forth himselfe as an example to be imitated, or by shewing himselfe a saythfull instructor, but by wholly changing vs, & renuing vs by the holy ghost and grace. Wherefore Augustine seemeth to haue very well expressed the discommodity brought in by Adam, when he sayth, that he hath brought into a consumption all mankind, by which words he signifieth, that Adam hath infected vs all with a certayne contagionnes. But the Pelagians against this sentence were wont to vse this argument: That which is not, can not hurt: but original sinne if there be any, is now by fayth in Christ, and by baptisme blot- ted out, and is no more: and therefore in children that are baptised it can not hurt. But that which these men take as graunted, namely, that in them that be- leue and are baptised original sinne is blotted out, is not absolutely true. For in euery sinne are two thinges to be considered. The action or wicked affection, which is as it were the matter: and the offence or obligation to punishment, which they call reatus, that is, guiltynes. And original sinne herein differeth from those sinnes, which they call actuall, for that in them the matter abideth not still. For so soone as a man hath either committed adultery, or spoken blas- phemy, those actions straghtway as soone as the thing is done cease to be, ne- ther are any more extant. Only there remayneth the offence agaynst God, and guiltines. Wherefore seing by fayth and repentance the obligation vnto pu- nishment, or offence agaynst God is remitted, we will easely graunt, that the whole sinne is abolished. But in original sinne the consideration is farre other- wise: for the matter thereof passeth not away. For euery one of vs hath expe- rience in himselfe, that corruption of nature remayneth in vs: seing that yet also we continually fall into sinnes, and are both in body and minde vntoward to things pertayning to God: which sinne yet vnto the faythfull are not impu- ted. For the guiltines and offence against God is in baptisme through fayth in Christ forgiven, although the matter of sinne do still remayne. Which matter, although in holy men it be broken and weakened, yet we shall not be perfectly ridde thereof, till we be deade. And forasmuch as men regenerate beget chil- dren, not by that they are regenerate, but by nature and the flesh, thereof it cometh, that the children also of the beleuers are borne obnoxious vnto ori- ginal sinne. For into them is poyzed the same vitiate and corrupt nature that is in the parents: when as yet on the other side forgiveness or imputation, which are apprehended by fayth, can not be poyzed into them. For the better expli- cation hereof, Augustine bringeth two similitudes: One is of graynes of corne: which although they are sown into the ground being purged of theyr leaues, stalkes, chaffe, and eares, yet they spring by agayne with all these thinges: whiche hereof cometh to passe, for that that cleansyng cometh not to those graines by nature, but by the arte and industry of men. And forasmuch as the corne springeth not of these principles of arte & industry, but of nature, it must nedes be, that when they are sprung by, they follow the order not of humane in- dustry but of their owne nature. The second similitude is of a man, y is circuci- sed: who notwithstanding begetteth a sonne with his foreskin. And thys hereof cometh, for that circumcision was not in the father by nature, but by a certain force added from without. And seing that children are not procreated by that out- ward force, but by an inward strength of nature, it is of necessity, that wher they are begotten they follow the order of nature. And therefore we bring forth no o- ther children, but such as we are our selues. Wherefore seing we haue in vs the contagionnes of original sinne, they vndoubtedly also can not be without it. But we can not communicate vnto our children the remission and forgiveness of that sinne. For, that is to be hoped for at Gods handes onely. The selfe same thing we see to happen in sciences and vertues: which although they be in pa- rents, yet are they not traduced vnto their children. By these thinges it plainly appeareth, wherin the Pelagians were deceived. Neither can any man for these thinges wrongly accuse vs, as though we plucke away any thing from the dig- nitie either of faith or of Baptisme. For vnto baptisme we largely graunt, that it sealeth vnto vs the remission of the guiltines and of the offence, and also grace and the holy ghost, and our grascyng into Christ, and also our right to eternall lyfe. And yet doth it not therof follow, that by it is abolished the corruption of nature, or continuall nourishment of sinne. Wherefore Paul rightly sayth: That

We are by hope saved. But it is much to be marvelled at, how h Pelagians can deny that there is originall sin in Infantes, saying they see that they daily dye. For the scripture manifestly teacheth, that the h reward of sinne is death, and the h sting of death is sinne. Wherefore from whomsoever we seclude sinne, from him also must we needs seclude death. For by the testimony of the scripture, these are compared together as the cause and the effect. But here we ought to except Christ only: who although he knew not sinne, yet died he for our sakes. But death had not dominion over him: for he of his owne accord suffered it for our sakes. But to say that there are some without sinne, although all men dye, were to loyne together things repugnant and contrary one to another. But besides this place there are a great many other places also, which proue that Infantes are not without sinne: for David sayth, Beholde in iniquities was I conceived and in sinne hath my mother conceived me. And Paul to the Ephesians calleth vs, the children of wrath by nature. And in Genesis it is written, the hart of man is euill from his infancy prone to euill. There are also to confirme this sentence a great many other places besides, which we will alleadge, when we entreate of originall sin apart by it selfe. Nowe seeing I haue declared, what the Apostle meaneth by sinne, & by which one man, it entred into h world, there remaineth to consider by what means it was spread abroad. This is a matter obscure, & very hard, & therefore I do not thinke to stand long about it. But so far as much as h word of God most plainly teacheth that such a sin there is, & that it descendeth into our posterity, although we vnderstand not h manner & way, how it is potored into h, yet we ought to gene place vnto h truth & not to be too much careful or to trouble our selues more then nedes touching the way and manner, which is hard to be knowen, and may with out danger be vnknewen. Wherefore I thinke it not amisse to declare those waies and meanes, which I haue obserued amongst h ecclesiasticall writers: whose opinions touching this matter are sower in number. The first is of those which thought, that we receaue of our parents the soules together with the bodies: that euen as God by humane seede createth the body, so also of the same createth he the soule. This sentence doth Augustine make mention of in his tenth booke vpon Genesis, ad litteram, and in many other places nether hath he at any time, that I can remember of, disallowed the same, yea rather he saith, that by this sentence may be dissolved this knotte touching originall sinne. Tertullian and many others of the old writers fauored this sentence. Whose argumentes when I diligently peruse, I iudge in dede probable: but yet not of necessity. For h which they bring out of the 46. chapter of Genesis, of the 66. soules which came out of the thigh of Jacob, may not vnaptly be expounded by the figure Synecdoche, so that by the soule, which is the principallest part of the man, is vnderstand h body, which is without all controuersie procreated of the seede of the parents. We may also by the soule vnderstand the grosser partes of the soule, as the vegetatiue part, and the sensitiue part: which no man doubteth, but that they are procreated of the seede. And that the holy scriptures sometimes vse this word soule, in that sence, Christe testifieth in the Gosple, where he sayth, He which loseth his soule for my sake, shall finde it. Another of the reasons, as Augustine, writeth in his 10. booke vpon Genesis is this: In the creation of the woman it is not written that God breathed into her a liuing soule: whereby they gather that she had of Adam not only her body, but also her soule. But this reason Augustine iudgeth to be weake. For a man mought reply vpon it and say: that it had bene once already said that God breathed a soule into Adam: and therefore there was no neede to repete the same agayne. For if God had brought in a new manner of procreation of soules, the scripture would not haue passed it ouer in silence. But seeing the scripture maketh no mention at all of any new manner, we ought to vse that which it had before expressed: especially seeing that we see that Adam sayd of his wife: This is now bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh: but added not, and soule of my soule: which vndoubtedly had bene more sweete, and had more serued to ex-

prethe the constitution of wherewith. But Augustine confesseth that the doubt is not thereby dissolved. For if we affirme, that soules are every day created, and so created, that in the bodies they growe before no seminal ratio (as he speaketh) that is, no substance of seed, then God shall not seeme to haue perfectly sealed sea all wo:ken the tenth day: when as he will every day create soules of nothing. But unto this argument may peradventure be answered, that in the body trauuced of the parentes, it is sufficient if there be found such qualities and conditions, whereby it is able to receaue a reasonable soule: and that this is that seminalis ratio before spoken of. But whatsoever is to be sayd of these arguments and they: answered, once Augustine wholly enclineth this way, that at the least he thinketh, that the soule of Christ came not from the blessed virgine by propagation: of which iudgement he sayth that others, as well as he, were, and that they anonced, that it moughte be proued by the epistle vnto the Hebrewes: for there it is sayd, that the priesthode of Christ excelled the priesthode of Aaron, for that Christ was a priest according to the order of Melchisedech. And the priesthode of Melchisedech was more excellent then the priesthode of Aaron, for that Leuy gaue tenthes vnto Melchisedech, for he was in the loynes of Abraham, who payd tithes vnto Melchisedech. But Christ also should haue bene no lesse in the loynes of Abraham, then was Leui, if he had had both his bodie and soule from hym by traduction. And so as touching thys, the dignity of eche priesthode had bene a like, when as echer of them paid in Abraham tithes to Melchisedech. But here mought they which fauour this opinion, make answer, y there was besides an other manner of difference betwene Christ and Leui: for although both of them were, both as touching the body, & also as touching y soule, in y loynes of Abraham, yet did not both of them after one, and the selfe same manner trauuce their nature from him. For Christ was borne of the Virgine, the holy ghost commyng ouer her. But Leui was begotten and borne after the common maner, as other men are procreated. Wherfore Augustine leaueh this reason, and bringeth an other out of the booke of wisdom, where it is written as he thinketh vnder the person of Christ, I haue by lot obteyned a good soule. For he thinketh that this phrase of speech can haue no place, if the soule of Christ were by way of propagation by the lawe of nature trauuced from his elders: vntill we will affirme that nature worketh by chaunce. And he thinketh y this name of lot, therfore had place in the soule of Christ, to the ende we might vnderstand that those ornaments, whiche we know were most riche and most plentiful in it, were not geuen vnto it for any merites goyng before, but of the mere mercy of God. And this was a wonderfull great ornament of the soule of Christ, to be ioyned vnto one and the selfe same substance and person with the word of God.

But this testimony, soasmuch as it is not had out of the holy scriptures that are in the Canon, is but of small force. At the length he leueh indifferent the question of the traduction of the soules, as a thing on eche side probable. And because they which are against it vse to cite this place out of the 33. Psalm, which fashioned the hart of them apart, this also he saith is weake, because they also which defend traduction of the soule, deny not, but that the soules are created of God: although they contend that the same is done by a meane. For so in the booke of Genesis we reade, that the birdes were not created of nothyng, but at the commaundement of God did issue forth out of the waters. And every one of us is sayde to be dissolved into earth, from whence we were taken: when as yet we haue not bodies immediatly out of the earth, but of the bodies of our parentes. Wherfore this sentence can not be confuted, and oerthrowen by the holy scriptures. Although I know that this is a receaued opinion in the church, y the soules are in creating infused, and in infusion created. Neither haue I for this cause reher sed these thinges, for that I meane any inuouation touching this sentence, but only that we might vnderstand, what manner of propagation of originall sinne seemed most easiely vnto the ecclesiasticall writers. And in vnde the schoolmen when they releth this sentence, leane only to phisicall & naturall reasons: For that forasmuch as the reasonable soule is, by nature spirituall & incorruptible, it cannot be sundred, which thing yet is required in generation: And for that they hold it to be the vnderstanding part, and a thing of more worthines, then that it can be taken out of the facultie and power of matter, they contend that it can not haue his being by generation, but by creation. Augustine assigneth another way or meane in his booke de nuptijs & concupiscentia, and in many other places, where he disputeth against the Delagians, of this kinde of sinne, and that is this: that this vice or sinne is supposed to passe into the children through the pleasure which the parents take in their mutuall fellowship. But this reason of propagation is grounded vpon a foundation suspected, and in my iudgement untrue. For that pleasure which is taken of procreation, is not of his owne nature euill, vntles prauitie of the affect be adioyned therunto. For if that action should of necessitie haue sinne joined with it, the holy ghost would not haue exhorted any man vnto it: which yet he doth, when he perswadech vs to matrimony, and when by Paul he admonisheth married folke to render mutuall beneuolence one to another. Whobest, amitte it were so, let vs graunt, that therein by reason of humane infirmite is some fault. Wherof shoulde follow, that only this kind of lust is deriued into the children. But the infection of originall sinne consisteth not onely in those things which pertaine to carnal pleasure, but also in other lustes as of riches, of honours, of vengeance, and finally in the whole corruption of our nature. The third way is, that God therfore createth the soule with such a sinne or defect, for that it shall be the soule of a man now damned, and set vnder the curse. Such a soule say they God createth, as is required to such a man. Euen as we see, that vnto a dogge is geuen such a soule as is mete for a dogge, and vnto the body of an asse, a soule mete for an asse. But this seemeth to be a very harde opinion: Namely, that God should contaminate with sinne a soule not yet pertaining vnto Adam: especially, seeing they can not say, that this kind of sin, is a punishment of an other sinne which went before. Wherfore this soule deulle is of every man reiecte: lest we should seme to make God absolutely the author of sinne. The fourth manner is by the consentes of many men receiued, & seemeth very likely to be true: namely, that the soule is not created with sinne, but straight way dyauoeth vnto it sinne, so soon as euer it is adioyned vnto the body deriued from Adam. For seeing the soule wanteth that grace and vertues, wherewith the soule of the first man was endued, and hath also gotten a body obnoxious vnto the curse, and hath Organes or instruments vnapt & very vnnete vnto spirituall woorkes, therefore wherreas it ought to gouerne the body, it is by it oppressed, & kept vnder, and dyauoeth vnto lustes agreeable vnto the body. For it is on eche side weakened, both by the uncleannes of the body, and also through his owne inuicibility: for that it waiteth strengths wherby to ouercome nature: of which two principall points, the corruption and prauity of whole nature dependeth. I haue now declared, so much as I thought should be sufficient for this present purpose, how the Apostle taketh this word sinne, by whome he sayth it hath spreade ouer all mankind, and what the ecclesiasticall writers haue left in writing touching the manner how it passeth from one to an other. Now is this thing only to be added, that by the world is to be vnderstand all mankind. For I like not to playe the Philosopher as doth Origene, by the world to vnderstand only those men, which live according to the affections of the flesh. For so should we seme to exclude from the meaning of the Apostle, originall sin: which thing the very nature of the wordes will not suffer. And by sinne death: and so death hath gone ouer all men. Here he declareth what sinne hath brought, which was the fourth part of our deuision: Sinne brought death: but what manner of death he meareth, can not better be vnderstand then by the contrary therof: namely, by life. And this life is of two sortes: the one is, wherby we are moued to spirituall, deuine, and celestiall good things, and this taketh place, so long as we are ioyned together with God: for vntlesse we be led by the spirit of God, we can not frame our selues to those things which passe our

Some take away other life.

Our first parentes died euen straight-way so soone as they had sinned.

A similitude.

We haue not one houre wher in we are not subiecte vnto death.

Death is not naturall vnto a man. In death is a feeling of the wrath of God.

nature. The other life is, wherby we are moued to followe those good things, which serue to preserve nature, & to defende the state of the body. And both these kindes of liues hath death which is inflicted for sin, take away. For death is nothing els, but pynation of lyfe. For so soone as euer man sinned, he was turned away fro God: & so left destitute of his grace and fauor, y he could not after ward aspire againe vnto eternall felicity. This corpporall life also may be said to be taken away by sinne: for straight way so soone as sinne was committed, the force of death and his souldioys did set vpon man: Such as are hunger, thirst, diseases, wasting away of moystures and heate, a daily quenching of the lyfe. For all those thinges lead men vnto death. And Chrysostome vpon Genesis at large entreating of this matter, sayth: That the first parentes so soone as euer they had sinned, straight way died. For the Lord straight way gaue sentence of death vpon them. And eue as they which are cōdemned vnto death, although they are kept for a tyme on lyue in prison, yet are they counted for dead: so our first parentes, although thorough the goodnes of God they liued longer, yet they were in verry dede straight way dead, after that God began accordyng to his sentence to punish them. Ambrose saith that they were sodenlye oppressed with death, for that they had after ward no day, or houre, or moment, wherin they were not obnoxious vnto death. Neither is there any man in the worlde, which can assuredly promise himselfe that he shall liue one houre. Wherefore by these thinges it is manifest, that both kindes of death were brought in by sinne. Wherefore we must beware that we assent not vnto them, which vse to say, that death is vnto a man naturall, and as a certayne rest, wherby the motion of the life is interrupted. Such opinions are to be left vnto the Ethnikes. For all the godly affirme that in death is a feeling of the wrath of God, and therefore of his owne nature it dyueth into men a certayne paine and horroz. Which thing both Christ himselfe when he prayed in the garden, and many other holy men haue declared. And if there chaunce to be any vnto whom it is pleasaunt and delectable to dye, and to be rid of their life, that they haue from els where, and not from the nature of death. And Paul to the Corinthians sayth: That death is the sting of sinne. For death other wise could be able to do nothing against vs, but that by sinne it destroyeth vs. Wherefore they which affirme that originall sinne is only a certayne weakenes, which can not condemne a man, do neither vnderstande the nature of sinne, nor this sentence of the Apostle, which we are now in hands with. Farther if of sinne cometh death, all finnes are of their owne nature to be called deadly. For in that God imputeth not some finnes vnto vs, that cometh not of the lightnes of the finnes, but of his mercy. For there can be no sinne so light which byingeth not destruction, vnles the mercy of God helpe. And yet doo we not say with the Stoikes, that all finnes are alike. For we know that Paul describeth vnto vs certayne finnes, which are so greuous, that they exclude men fro the kingdom of heauen.

For that all men haue sinned. This mought haue seemed very sharpe and harde, that for the sinne only of the first man all men should dye. But Paul sheweth, that this is iustly done, bicause all men haue sinned. About this particule, ip̄, which properly signifieth in quo, that is, in which, and is englisht, For that, is no small controuerisie how it ought to be take. Some will haue it to be referred vnto sin. But y Greke word αμαρτια which wēt before it, semeth to be against that. For it is the Feminine gender. Howbeit, it may be, that Paul had a respect vnto y other worde κατα, which is the newter gender, which word he after ward oftentimes vseth, although it be counted a fault in speache to referre the relative to things coming after. Others thinke that ip̄, ought to be referred vnto Adam. But against these men is the signification of this preposition in, which when it is ioyned with a datine case, as Erasmus sayth: is not amongst any good authoys, sounde to signifie all one with in, that is, in. Wherefore it semeth that the Latine interpreter was deceined, which turned this sence thus. In whome all men haue sinned. Howbeit the Greke scholies vnder the person of Phocius vary not from the Latine interpretation. For they expounde thys sentence ip̄ q̄ Adam, by δι q̄ Adam, that is, in which Adam

Adam, by which Adam. But touching this matter, I wil not much contend. For I thinke that it is a particule casuall, so that the sence is, Therefore hath the death gone ouer all men, because all men haue sinned. For Christostome sayth: That when Adam fell, all other men also, which did not eate of the fruite were touched. And he thinketh that Paul, as a wise Philition, hauing the disease set before him, abideth not in those things which be circumstances about it, or do follow it, but runneth to y principall ground and first cause therof. Therefore do all men die, because all men haue sinned. Neither ought we to thinke, that here is ment, that all men do sinne, by some certaine action: for, that can haue no place in children. But it is all one as if he had said, Now they are bondslauers vnto sinne, and are counted guilty therof. And when we read these things, we ought alwayes with the eye of our minde to consider wherunto they tend: namely, that we should receiue consolacion, and be made assured of our saluation, knowing that the death of Christ hath preuayled against all these things. By those things also which are written vnto the Hebrues may be declared, how we haue sinned in the fall of Adam. For there we read that Leui paid tenthes in the loynes of Abraham. After the selfe same maner also may here be vnderstand, that we were polluted in the loynes, and in the masse of Ada. The Scholies which are ascribed vnto Ierome interpretate, that sinne is committed by the imitation of Adam, which is commonly called actuall sinne. And they say moreouer, that this sinne of Adam went not ouer Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, which liued a holy life. But because they see that this is against them, Paul saith: That all haue sinned, this vniuersalitie say they is to be vnderstand with an exception. Which thing they also affirme of other such kinde of sentences: as Every man is a lier. Also, There is none which doth good, no not one. When as yet there were in the world many true and holy men, when those things were written. But whosoever was the writer of that booke, his authoritie ought not to cause vs to departe fro y truth. For, that which Paul spake vniuersally, that all haue sinned, hereby is proved, for that all men without exception dye. For experience teacheth that to be vniuersally most true. Therefore here is to be set no exceptio. Neither ought those such like kinde of speeches which they bring to moue vs: for that those sentences also are true, if we speake of men not regenerate: they are true also euen in the regenerate, if we will speake according to their corrupt and vitiate nature. Farther that here is not ment only imitation, it is manifest by the Antithesis: for Christe hath not only set forth vnto vs his righteousness to imitate, but also by the power of the holy ghost spreadeth it abroad, & poureth it into the hartes of the beleuers. Origene seemeth to expound this place very warely. For he at y beginning setteth forth certain things, which euen Erasmus confesseth to signifie Originall sinne. For he affirmeth, that in Adam we were all corrupted, as it were in a common ground: and that we were all in his loynes: as in the Epistle vnto the Hebrues, Leui is sayd to haue bene in the loynes of Abraham. Then addeth he certayne things, which pertaine vnto the sinnes of peticular men, which are called personall, and exhorteth vs to cary about with vs the image of the celestially man. These things are so taken of Erasmus, as though they were an interpretation of that which went before: when as in very deepe they wholy confirme our sentence: wherein we say, that Paul in this place taketh sinne most amply, so that it comprehendeth both the roote, and all the frutes thereof. But I meruaile how these men go aboute to plucke away originall vice from the nature of sinne. For sinne according to the common definition, they say is whatsoever is spoken, done or thought against the lawe of God, and this can haue no place in children. But they consider not that in this definition is not all sinne vniuersally contayned. And therefore we before signified, that sinne is otherwise to be defined: so that that is sayd to be sinne, which any manner of way is against the law and will of God. These men go farther and say, if this were the definition of originall sinne, namely, the withholding of grace, or pronelle to sinne, these things ought rather to be counted paynes of sinnes, then sinnes. But they should haue remembered, that God doth not alwayes punishe sinnes by outward scourges and aduersities, but sometymes also by other sinnes. Wherefore although the corruption of nature, and that lust and prouelle to sinne grafted in vs all, may after a sort be called paynes of sinnes, yet do we affirme, that they are also in very dede sinnes. But they say that these thinges remaine in vs after baptisme, and therefore can not be sinnes: vnles we will say, that sinnes are not remitted through baptisme, and sayth in Christ. But to this we answered before: that the guiltyness is forgiven vnto the beleuers, howbeit the corrupt substance remaineth; which, if Christ were not a helper vnto vs, should of his owne nature condemne vs. For seing it turneth vs away from the rule of the lawe of God, it ought to be taken to be in very dede sinne. Neither is it true which Erasmus sayth, that the discourse of Paul will not suffer these thinges to be expounded of originall sinne: for the thing it selfe teacheth otherwise. For the entent of the Apostle is to shew, from what euils the death of Christ hath deliuered vs. But that can be not do, vnles he take sinne so largely, that it also comprehend originall sinne. But whereas Paul addeth, that euen vnto the law sinne was in the world, it maketh nothing agaynst this sentence. For we say with Erasmus, that sinne is in this place taken in the selfe same sense, that it was in the sentences going before, by reason of this coniunction causall, For. Howbeit it is playne, that those thinges which are spoken pertaine as well to originall sinne, as to actuall sinnes. For neither of both these kindes, if the lawe were away, is ether imputed or acknowledged: although otherwise they both are sinnes in very dede, and also wrape vs in death: wherfore let vs not suffer this place to be wrested out of our hands, as well for that it is a good sure defence for vs, as also for that it very well agreeth with Pauls purpose, and notably setteth forth the benefite of Christ.

For euen vnto the lawe was sinne in the world. But sinne is not imputed when there is no lawe. Now declareth he that which was set forth in the third place: namely, wherence commeth the knowledge of sinne. And this knowledge he sayth is had by the lawe: and that sinne was both before the lawe and after the lawe: but it græued not all men after one and the selfe same maner: for before the lawe was geuen, sinne was not knowen, but after it was geuen, it began to be knowen. By these wordes is most manifestly gathered, that the lawe had not this force to take away sinne out of the world, but was for this cause geuen, to shew sinne. The Apostle seemeth to speake these thinges by pzeution: for a little before he had sayd, for that all men haue sinned. which mought haue bene iudged untrue, especially seing the same Paul sayd, Where no lawe is, there is no transgression. For sinne is, whatsoever disagreeth from the rule of the lawe. Wherefore he answereth, that sinne was indeede before the lawe: but it was not then imputed. And by the lawe, he vnderstandeth the lawe of Moses. For neither were they which liued before Moses tyme vtterly without a lawe: for they had the light of nature, and reasons in their conscience accusing and defending one an other, as we haue before red in the second chapter. Also the very institution of man, wherby he was bound to resemble the image of God, was a certayne lawe. For when he departed from that Image, vndoubtedly he sinned, and this lawe extended so farre, that it also included the very infantes. But when by reason that our corruption grew of more force, these thinges were obfuscated, God of his wonderfull great mercy, gaue a lawe wherby mought be reproued all kindes of sinnes. Wherefore we ought with all diligence to looke vpon it, vnles we will be ignorant of our selues. Which euen the Philosophers abhorred as a thing most euill. For otherwise we are of our owne nature so framed, that when our sinnes are layd before vs, we labour not so much to amende them, as to excuse, to extenuate, and to lenesse them: and because we would sinne the more freely, we set before vs the examples of other men. For we commonly regard not, what we ought to do, but what other men do. But if we would looke vpon the lawe, straight way would come before our eyes our condemnation. For in it is written, Cursed be every one which abideth not in all the things that are written in the booke of the lawe. And therefore God by a singular benefite gaue vnto the people prophetes, which should not onely inculcate and beat into their heades the lawe, but also expounde the same by most vehement and feruent preachings. Wherefore it is much to be lamented now a dayes, that sermones are either so rare, or els that those fewe that are, are so negligently hard. Wherefore it is not to be meruayled at, that euery where is founde so great blindness and that pernicious errors do so farre range abroade.

[Where no lawe is, sinne is not imputed.] The lattine booke hath, non imputabatur, that is, was not imputed. Peraduenture they reade, λογισται, of the verbe, λογισμαι. This imputacion or reputacion is to be referred vnto men, which were so miserable and blinde, that of themselves they could not so much as know sinnes, so farre were they of that they could beware of sins, so bitterly obscure was at that time the light of nature: but God imputed those sinnes vnto them, & that not vnto thely: for that blindness happened through their owne default. And that God imputed those sinnes vnto the, he himselfe many wayes declared. For he both by the flood destroyed the whole world, and complayned vnto Noe, that all flesh had corrupted theyr way, and that the hart of man was prynced vnto sinne euen from hys childehode. He reprimed Caine of murder: and toke vengeance vpon the Sodomites. And Caine himselfe answered, that his sinne was greater then that it could be forgiven. By which wordes we see that Caine was not bitterly ignozant of sinne, yea nether were the Egypciāns vndoubtedly ignozant of sinne. For they cast Joseph into prison for that he was suspected of adultery and so serued they the baker and the butler, for that they had sinned. Neither is it credible, that godly men as Abraham, Iob, and Iacob vnderstood not sinne, especially seeing we rede, that Iacob desired, that he might be put to death, with whome soeuer the theft which Laban sought shoulde be found. But this knoweldge which the godly had, was not in them all. It was geuen only vnto them by reason of theyr singular piety. For the common sort of people counted nothing for sinne, but only grosse sinnes, and such sinnes as were most euidently hurtfull vnto the societie of men, neyther may we easely ascribe vnto Ambrose who vpon this place sayth: that men after a sort knewe sinnes but yet they did not therefore thinke that God would auenge them: for they supposed that God would not take vengeance of sinnes. For Pharao, & Abimelech being kinges reproved Abraham, for that he sayd, that Sara was his sister, & so by that meanes had put them in greate danger, that God should haue taken vengeance vpon the for comitting adultery with an other mans wife. There mought also be brought testimonies of the Ethnikes, which sayned many thinges touching the greuous paynes of them that are in hell. But as touching this sentence of Paul we must know, that soasmuch as before the law was geuen by Moses there flozied many cities and Publike welthys, it followeth of necessity, that there were some publique lawes receaued amongst the: for other wise men could not haue liued together, and haue maintained fellowship & peace one with an other. Howbeit such lawes were neuer of that nature, that they forbade vnto men all kindes of sinne: which thing yet the Law geuen by Moses hath done: for amongst some nations, theftes, and amongst other nations, adulteries, were counted for no sinnes, nether were there by any lawes punished. Amongst the Grekes were permitted many vile & filthy thinges: neither did the Romanes lawes (which yet were much moze seuer and purer) punish all maner of sinnes. But that Law which Moses gaue, was perfect and absolute, especially if we do consider it as Christ hath expounded it. Wherefore the meaning of the Apostle in these wordes is that sinnes, although they were in very dede sins, yet were they not known amongst men, but by the prescript of the Law. By these thinges also we may see that there is something, which is of his owne nature sinne, which yet is not imputed of God, as we sayd cometh to passe in the beleuers, as touching the corruption of nature and pryncesse vnto sinnes. These thinges are of them selues

The imputation of sinnes of two sortes: ether as touching God or as touching men. The tyme of the lawe is not excluded from sinne.

Only grace ouercometh sinne.

Why the power of death is called a kingdome.

Agaynst them that deny original sinne in children.

Sinne and death are so ioyned together that they cannot be parted a sonder. Ambrose suspected the Greke booke.

Ambrose held that some had in hell a free custody, but not eternall death.

sinnes, although for Christs sake they are not imputed: as the Apostle in this place sayth, that before the Law there were many sinnes, which yet were not so imputed or counted of men. Although herein is some difference: for there the imputation is by the mercy of God remoued away, but here it is remoued away thorough the ignorance of man. Farther although it be said, Euen vnto the law, yet is not thereby the time of the law acquitted free from sinne. For the Law is not of that strength to abolish sinnes. And this was of no smal force to abate the haughtines and pride of the Jewes. For they counted themselves more holpe all the other nations, for that they had receaued a law from God. The like kinde of speech is vsed of the Ethnikes, when they write that euen vnto the tenth yere did the Grecians fight agaynst Troy: for in so saying they doubtles excluded not the tenth yere. So when Paul sayth, Sinne was in the world Euen vnto the law, he excludeth not that time which was vnder the law. And this wonderfully setteth forth the grace of Christ, which alone was able to vanquish and to driue away sinne: when as sinne was of so greate force to destroye, and had so farre and so long ranged abroad, that it could not be restrained, no not by the Law. Paul when he sayth,

That death raigned.] bleseth the figure Prosopopæia: nether ought we therfore to thinke by this word Kingdome, is ment any healthfull gouernment: Howbeit therfore he calleth by power of death a kingdome, to show that the power thereof was exceeding great, wherunto all thinges gaue place, & that it was of a wonderfull mighty force, which had brought all thinges vnder his subiectiō. The selfe same forme of speaking he bleseth agayne in this epistle, saying: Let not sinne raigne in your mortall body: as if he should haue sayd, Although ye cannot prohibe sinne to be in you, yet permite not vnto it the kingdome, and chiefe dominion, if all your endeuors and counselles should geue place and be obedient vnto that. And he therfore added, that death raigned from Adam euen to Moses, to declare, that there was sinne in the world. For death and sinne follow one the other inseparably: and sinne and death inferre and bring in one the other. Hereby are confuted those which contend, that infants are without sinne: and say, that for that cause they dye, for that by reason of the sinne of Adam they are vnder the condition of mortality, being otherwise themselves innocent, and cleane from sinne. For if this were true, the Apostle should then in this place conclude nothing. For it mought easely be answered, that although men died before the law, yet sinne at that time had not his being. Wherefore let vs say with Paul, that these two things are so ioyned together, that they can not be parted asonder.

Over them also, that sinned not after the like maner of the transgression of Adam.] These wordes were in some copies set forth affirmatiuely, by taking away this word, not. And of this reading doth Origen make mencion: and so farre is Ambrose of from disallowing it, that he thinketh one but it to be natie. And he hath a large discourse of the variety of the Greke booke: and semeth for that cause to haue them in suspicion, as corrupted in many places, after that the contentions of the heretikes grew strōg. But in the expolitio of that reading which he followeth, he semeth to speake but slenderly to the matter: for he will haue death to haue rayned ouer those onely, which in sinning were like vnto Adam: and this he saith happened in idolatry. For he affirmeth, that the sinne wherein Adam fell, was in a maner of this sorte, that he belened himselfe to be God, and preferred Sathā before God, more esteeming his counsell, then the commaundment of God. But as for others, which keeping still their faith in the only Creator, did notwithstanding sometimes fall, he thinketh not, that they fell after the like maner that Adam fell: and therfore he writeth, that they died the death of the body, & were kept in hell in a free custody eue to the coming of Christ: but in those which had imitated the sinne of Adam, eternal death wholly raigned. These things, as e uery mā may easely se, are both farre fetched, & also do much weakē the argument of the Apostle. Wherefore if this text should be red affirmatiuely, peraduenture we mought mought picke therout this sentēce, to vnderstā, y death raigned ouer al mē, which sinned after the like māner of the transgressiō of Adam: for that he hauing sinned, it was all one, as if all men had bene present, and sinned together with him. But let vs leaue this reādinge and folloꝝ the common reādinge: and especially seinge Chrysostome, Theophilactus, and the Greeke Scholies pronounce these woordes negatiuely: And so this is the sence, that those menne which were before the lawe, although they sinned not after that manner, that Adam fell, who besides the lawe of nature, had also a certain commaundement prescribed him, yet they also were obnoxious vnto death. But Augustine applieth these woordes vnto infantes, which die and haue sinne: although they sinne not after the selfe same manner, that Adam sinned. And so, Not to sinne after the like manner of the transgression of Adam, is nothing els, but not to haue sinne actuall and personall, as they call it. But I woulde thinke that in these woordes may be comprehended both infantes and others that are of age, both those before the law, and those after the law, and those vnder grace, as many as are so rude and blockishe, that they are vtterly ignorant of the commaundementes of God: of whiche kinde of men it is not incredible, but that there maye some be founde in the worlde. And in this case vndoubtedly all men dye, although they know not the commaundement prescribed them of God, as Adam did.

Rude and blockishe men and infantes sinne not after the same manner that Adam did.

Which was the figure of that which was to come. ] By y which was to come, we may vnderstand all that which afterward happened in all men, which proceeded from Adam: which were as wel as he, obnoxious vnto the curse and vnto death. So the first father was a figure and foire of all his posteritye. Howbeit we maye moze simply and moze aptly referre this vnto Christ. For in that comparison Paul wonderfully much delighted. Chrysostome also leaneth thys way, and sayth, that the Apostle, with great conninge, and manifold and sondry wayes handleth these woordes, Of one, and one: to make vs to vnderstande, that those thinges are to be compared together, which haue come vnto vs by one Adam, and by one Christ. And this is very woorthy of noting in Chrysostome that he sayth, Euen as Adam was the cause of death vnto al men, although they did not eate of the tree, so Christ was made vnto his a conciliator of righteousness, although they themselues had wrought no righteousness. In which place he moste manifestly declareth, that we are not iustified by our woorkes. He sayth moreover, That by this discourse of the Apostle we are throughly fensed agaynst the Jewes, if they chaunce to deride vs, for that we beleue, that by one Christe was redeemed the whole world. For we wyll object agayne vnto them, that they also confesse, that by one Adam was all thinges corrupted: which seemeth to be a great deale more absurde, if we looke vpon humane reason, then to say, that by one Christ all men haue bene holpen. In this place the Apostle beginneth to entreate of that, whiche was the fourth parte, of this diuision: namely, by whome sinne was excluded. And this he declareth was brought to passe by Christ, whome he maketh like vnto Adam. This similitude is to be taken generally that euen as all men depend of Adam, so all also in theyr order depende of Christ: and as the one merited for all his, so also did the other. But perticulerly and speciallye there is greate difference. For Adam broughte in sinne, death, and damnation: but Christe broughte in righteousness, life, and grace. There is difference also in y propagation. For Adam by the generation of the flesh potwreth his euels into men: but Christ by sayth. And therefore Paul when he had sayd, that Adam was a tipe of that whiche was to come, as it were by way of correction added,

Adam a figure of Christ.

An analogy betwene Adam and Christ. An excellent comparison of Christosome. A strong argument agaynst the Jewes.

The similitude betwene Adam and Christe is to be taken generally.

But yet the gifte is not so, as is the sinne. ] Wherefore betweene Adam and Christe is to be put rather a certaine analogye and proportion: then a true similitude. But to make those thinges which follow moze playne we will deuide in to thre partes, al this whole comparison, which consisteth of similitudes, of contraries, and of thinges compared together. Firste the Apostle plainely teacheth, that the sinne of Adam is not so as is the gifte: for the gifte many wayes excelleth and passeth the sinne. Secondly he expresseth wherin consisteth this victorie: namely, in this, that whereas Adam had by one sinne corrupted all mankind, Christe hath Betweene Christ and Adam is not a true similitude but an analogy or proportion.

not onely abolished that one sinne, but also a greate many other sinnes, whiche we haue since committed. Last of all he declareth, what that aboundance of good things is, which Christ hath brought vnto his elect. As touching the firste, this we muste know, that Christ is so compared with Adam, that he is alwayes made the superior. Neither is this to be passed ouer, that Paul expresseth sinne by two names, ἀμαρτία, & ἁμαρτία. By which names this we learne, that they which sinne, doo first erre, and after ward fall. For these two are thorowly knitte together. Wherefore the comon saying is, he that followeth a blind man must needs fall. This also let vs obserue, that Paul in this comparison continually in a maner bleth these wordes χάρις, & ἔλεος. That is grace: δωρεῖα, & δυσπῆλον: that is, gift, to declare, that our saluation commeth not vnto vs of any of our owne dignity, or of woorks, but onely of the meere mercy of God. The wordes are thus:

For if thorow the offence of one, many be dead, muche more the grace of God, and the gifte by Grace, whiche is by one man Jesus Christ, hath abounded vnto many.

What grace is with the scholmen.

For if through the offence of one, When he sayth that thorow the sinne of one man many haue died, he taketh not away or altereth that whiche he before wrote, namely, that death had gone ouer all. For this worde Many, oughte in this place to be of asmuch force, as if he had sayd All, euen by the testimony of Origene also. Wherefore that abideth firme, which was before auouched, That all men haue sinned: & that all are therefore subiecte vnto death. By Grace he vnderstandeth the fauour of God, whereby sinnes are forgiven. This word Gift peraduenture significeth the holy Ghost, and other good thinges, which men by the holy Ghost obteyne. But the schoole men say that Grace is a quality powred into our hartes by God, whereby we lead an holy & godly life: and by this grace saye they is a man iustified. But that kind of iustification shoulde pertaine vnto the law. For it shoulde consist of those thinges which are in vs. Wherefore the true iustification, whereof is now intreated, commeth from Christe, of whome thorow sayth, and the grace or fauour of God we take holde: not that we deny the other kinde of grace. For we put both kinds: namely both the instauration of the beleuers to liue vprightly, and also the imputation of righteousness by Christ: whereunto whole and perfect iustification cleaueth: that that might be true which we reade in Iohn, that we haue receaued grace for grace: and by that grace, whereby Christ was of valew before the father, we are receaued into his grace. The nature of y<sup>e</sup> Antithesis required, y<sup>e</sup> euen as he had sayd, that thorow the offence of one mā, many haue died, so he should on the other side haue sayd, that through the righteousness of one, the fauor of God hath abounded vpon many. But he would rather put Grace and gifte: for that these two thinges are the fountaines and rootes of righteousness, and of euery good thinge, whiche we by righteousness obteyne. And he therefore saith, that it abounded (whiche in the Greeke is ἐπελάμβανεν) to geue vs to vnderstand, that there was more grace bestowed vpon men, then shoulde be sufficient to extinguish sinne. For, for that we haue obteyned forgiveness of sinnes, wee are also bozne againe, and we rise againe wyth Christe, and are sanctified, and adopted into the childeyn of God, and are made the brethren of Christe, and fellow heires wyth hym, & are grafted into his members, & are ioyned wth hym as the body with the head: no other wise, then if vnto a man hauing a sore wound, should be geue such a plaister or medicine, as should not onely heale the wounde, but also make the whole body more stronger, and much sayzer then it was before. Chrysostome addeth an other similitude of a man far indebted, which hauing not wherewithal to pay, is cast into prison with his wife, childeyn, & all his familie: vnto whom commeth some mighty monarch or emperour, and dispatcheth not onely the money which he ought to other men, but also taketh him out of prison, leadeth him vnto his courte, exalteth him to dignitie, placeth him in a kingdom, and heapeth him vp with all maner of riches: so hath Christ dealt with vs miserable mortall men. reth these two thinges together, to merite vnto others condemnation, and to merite vnto others saluation. And he saith: that it semeth far moze strange from reason, to merite vnto an other condemnation, then to merite saluation. Wherefoze, the conning handling of Paul is much to be commended, which declareth that that is done, which semed to be moze absurde, that we mighte the easelier vnderstande that Christ hath merited vnto vs remission of sinnes. For we see this oftentimes to happen, that a man is deliuered out of misery, at the request or for fauor of some excellent and noble man.

It is more strange so reason to merite vnto an other condemnation, then saluation.

Neither is the gift so, as is that which entred by one that sinned. For the iudgement came of one offence vnto condemnation: but the gift is of many offences to iustification.

Neither is the gift so, &c. } Here teacheth he that whiche was the seconde parte of our deuision: namely, that herein consisteth that excellency of Christ, wher by he farre passed Adam, for that he hath not onely abolished one sinne which was brought in by Adam, but also hath taken away infinite other sinnes. Kēima, that is iudgement, signifieth in this place guiltines. But that which is added, ē hōs, that is of one, it is doubtfull whither it ought to be referred vnto the sinne, or vnto man. But bicause to which of either it be referred, it commeth all to one effect, it skilleth not much whether way it be expounded. Paul vnto iudgement semeth to oppose y gift: and vnto condemnation, iustification. Neither let vs meruail, that he so long tarieth in this place, and doth with so great diligence handle, and as it were polish one and the selfe same thing. For it is an excellent foundatiō of our saluation. And therfoze to the end it should not slippe from vs, it was requisite, that it shoulde be plainly and exactly set forth. Howbeit, here ariseth vnto vs a doubt not to be neglected. For seeing that the sinne of Adam hath so corrupted man, y our whole kind of his owne nature can now do nothing els but sinne, and whatsoever sinnes haue afterward followed, are the fruites of that transgression: the sinne of Adam may seme to haue bene of no lesse force to destroy, then the grace of Christe to restore. To dissolue this doubt, we confesse that of the offence of the first parent, and of originall sinne dispersed abrode into euery one of vs, do spring other sinnes. Howbeit, this is to be noted, that all wicked actes are not so of necessitie knit with originall sinne, that they streightway procede therof. For otherwise we should all commit so many and the selfe same sinnes. And that this is not true, both the thing it selfe, & also experience teacheth. Wherefoze Paul considered, that thorough our counsels & deliberations, are after a sort infinite sinnes added vnto that first fault, but y grace of God through Iesus Christ hath not onely remoued away that one sinne, which is in vs by nature, but also hath from (in a maner) infinite other sinnes brought vs vnto righteousness, & hath after a sorte for one ill turne, rendred vnto vs thre good. For he hath both abolished that one sinne which is in vs by nature, and hath remoued away infinite other sinnes, which we haue committed since, and hath restored vs to a righteous life. Howbeit there is again objected, that the sinne of Adam is deriued into moze, then the righteousness of Christ. For we are all infected in Adam, but we are not all deliuered in Christ. For many shall be condemned vnto euerlasting destruction. Here is to be answered, that Paul referred not his power to the number of them which shal either be damned, or be saued: but only vnto the effects which haue come both from Adam and from Christ. Unless we will say, that there are moze saued by the grace of Christ, then haue perished by originall sinne drawn from Adam. For only certaine infants perish by meanes of it, but they which are of full age, and condemned, perish not by meanes of it only, but also by reason of actual sinnes, which they haue moreouer committed, neither haue they much wherof to complaine of Adam: but they which are saued, are saued only by the benefit and grace of Christ. Wherefoze Christ saueth moze, then Adam destroyeth. Farther, thoughall men are not brought to saluation, yet the merite and grace of Christ, was of it selfe sufficient for all men. But why all men are not predestinate vnto saluation, can not be rendred a reason perticularly. But we ought to iudge of that

Why Paul tarieth so long in this place.

All other sinnes are not of necessitie knit with originall sinne.

The sinne of Adam reacheth to moze then the righteousness of Christ. This comparison is not as touching the number, but as touching the effects.

The grace of Christ of his owne nature is sufficient for all men.

The benefite of Christ is of more might to saue the sinne of Adam to destroy.

Prooues that Christ is of more might then sinne. Two kingdomes to be considered.

The desperation of Lapis is contumelious blasphemy against Christ. Here is not spoken of sin against the holy ghost. The sinne which remaineth in the regenerate declareth the might of Christ.

The philosophers vnderstand not that there is sin in vs, and yet we are iust.

power which Christ hath to saue, not by the hidden counsell of God, which we can not vnderstand, but by the forme of the promise which is had in the scriptures. And that promise is generall, neither is it by kind of speache drawen vnto one man more then vnto another. Wherefore the Apostle for this cause with so many wordes teacheth, that the benefite of Christ was of more might to saue, then the sinne of Adam was to destroy, for that this doctrine is exceeding necessary. And therfore let vs beware, that we neuer suffer it to slip away from vs: for this is continually to be opposed vnto the greuousnes of our sinnes, and vnto the infirmities, wherby, as experience teacheth vs, we continually fall. For there is none, which if he cast his eyes vpon his sinnes, and vpon the infirmities wherewith he is infected, is not straight way discouraged and utterly in dispaire, vntill he looke vpon the might and victorie of Christ: for therein only he comforteth himselfe, and conceiueth an assured hope of his saluation. And by two things chiefly is made manifest the power and efficacy of Christ against sinne: First, for that he bringeth to passe, that the haynous wicked actes which we haue committed are not imputed: Secondly, for that through the holy ghost he giveth vnto vs strengths, wherby we are restored, and the rages of our naturall lust are broken. Christ fought against sinne, wherfore we must needs make him either superiour vnto sinne, or equall, or els lesse. To say that he was lesse, is both false and impious: for then it should follow that he was overcome of sinne. If we make him equall, then will it follow, that sinne is not yet vanquished: for then should they haue left, leauing the victorie vncertaine. But saying it is said, that sinne is overcome, then followeth that which Paul saith: namely, that Christ was mightier then it. Two kingdomes are to be set before our eyes, the kingdom of Christ, & the kingdom of Satan. That Christes kingdome got the victorie, Christ himselfe declareth in the Gospel, where he sayth: That the strong armed man so long time liued quietly and peaceably, till such time as a stronger then he came vpon him. For then was he overcome, and the other which was mightier then he, carried away his spoiles & armor. Wherfore we must warily take heed lest being to much intentiue to those sins which we haue committed, we desperately say to Guin, Our sinne is greater then that it can be forgiven. For this were contumelious blasphemy against Christ to say, that there is some sinne to be found, which can not be overcome of him. But here is no mete place to declare, why sinne against the holy ghost is not forgiven, neither also maketh it any thing to the purpose: for we speake of them which are converted vnto Christ, which can haue no place in those which sinne against the holy ghost. Neither doth this a litle helpe to the acknowledging of the victorie of Christ, that sinne still after a sort abideth in the regenerate. For although there be sinne in them, yet Christ by his power overthroweth it, so that it can not hurt. For sinne is now taken prisoner and broken: as sometimes enemies are take on liue of emperours or Captaines, & reserued on liue against a triumphe & one & the selfe same day may be both vnto the Emperour for a triumphe & vnto the enemies conquered, better destruction. Christ shall come to iudge, & that in the sight of the whole world triumph. And as it is written vnto the Cor. The last enemy death shall be destroyed, and together with him, sinne his continuall companion. But that in the meane time we haue sinne in vs it is nothing prejudiciall vnto our saluation. And it is the Gospel to beleue, that sinne is remitted and forgiven vs, although it still abide in vs. Howbeit neither the wisdom of the flesh nor philosophy can attayne to the knowledge of this. For philosophy pronounceth none to be iust, strong, wise, and temperate, but he which hath gotten these vertues by often actions, and bright workes. But we contrariwise in the kingdom of Christ affirme, that a sinfull man, though he be neuer so wicked, so sone as he is converted vnto Christ, and with a true faith taketh hold of him, is straight way before God iust. By δικαιωσις, the Apostle in this place vnderstandeth, iustification, of this verbe δικαιωσας, which signifieth, to be pronounced iust, & to be acquitted. Although in this selfe same epistle in the 1. chapter we rede, which when they knew the righteousness of God, how that they which committed such thinges are worthy of death yet doo not only the same, but also consent vnto them them that do them. That which is there turned in latine, Iusticiam, and in englishe Righteousnes, is in the Greke δικαιοσυνη, and signifieth in that place a law prescribed of God. Neither is it to be misapprehended, that these significations are so changed: for they are not utterly differing one from the other. For some times they are compared together as the cause and the effect. For therefore amongst men is a man acquitted of the iudge, for that he hath done thinges iust, and hath bene obedient vnto the lawes. But thus can not we be before God. For we are not absolved from him, for that we haue fulfilled his commaundements. Only Christ hath fulfilled them. Wherefore not only he himselfe is iustified, but also his righteousness, & performance of the law is adiudged vnto vs, forasmuch as we are counted amongst his members. Here he beginneth to expresse by which was the third part of our diuision by what meanes Christ hath placed in his elect those good thinges, which he hath brought vnto vs: and these good thinges are in them most plentifull, and also most firme and stable. This he gathereth of the Antithesis: for euen as Adam brought in sinne and death, and so brought them in, that they haue reigned: so Christ hath geue vnto his, life, grace, and righteousness, not after any common sort, but most liberally and abundantly.

For if thorough the offence of one, death reigned thorough one, much more shall they, which receaue the aboundance of grace, & of the gifte of righteousness, raigne in life thorough one Jesus Christ.

For if thorough the offence &c.] This reason is thus to be declared: If Adam could so poure in sin & death into men, that they reigned in them: much more is the same to be graunted vnto Christ. And the amplification of the wordes is in this sort. It is a greater matter, & of more efficacy to say plenty & aboundance of grace, then simply to say, grace. And this hath a greater emphasis, to say, the gift of righteousness, then if he had sayd, righteousness simply. For when it is called the gift of righteousness, there is signified, that it cometh freely. Farther it is of more efficacy to raigne in life, then after a sort to obteyne life. But what force this word of reigning hath one eche side, may thus be vnderstand. Let vs set before our eyes a man that is a stranger from Christ. In him doth sinne not only abide, but also mightely raigne: that although he sometimes haue excellent endeuors, and now and then doth some mozell workes in shew most goodly, yet he can by no meanes shake of that tyranny: but whatsoever he doth, it worketh vnto him vnto death and condemnation. This is, sinne and death to raigne in a man. On the other side let vs set before vs a godly man and one grafted into Christ. This man hath life and righteousness, and so hath them, that they raigne in him: wherefore although his nature be vncleane, and his affections corrupted, and he sometimes falleth, yet notwithstanding standeth he agaynst all these thinges, and is brought to saluation. Wherefore by this place we are taught, that life followeth righteousness: as before we learned, that death followeth sinne. And thereof it cometh, that the scriptures very oftentimes ioyn life with faith: for by faith we take hold of righteousness. And this order of the scripture Paul confirmeth, when he so often reherseth this sentence of Abauek the Prophet. The iust man liueth by faith. Christ also sayth, He that beleueth in the sonne of God, hath eternall life. And this is eternall life to acknowledge thee to be the true God, & Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent. The Apostle hath now in a maner in these wordes finished the comparison which he set forth betweene Adam and Christ. In which place this is not to be passed ouer, to put you in minde of a certaine reason, which the Greke Scholies vse, to proue that Christ was of more might to helpe men, then Adam was to destroy men. By cause death, say they, taking his beginning at Adam, had as a fellow worker with it the sinne of vs all, to preuaile against vs all, for other wise it could not haue preuailed, if men had kept themselves pure from all vncleannes. But the grace of Christ hath come vnto vs all, euen without our helpe of working. And they say, that this thing is made playne by the grace of the Resurrection: which shall extend his effect, not only vpon the faithfull, which may indeede seeme to haue brought sayth, but also vpon the unbelieuers: namely, vpon Jewes and Grecians, which had no sayth. But that is of greater force, which requirerh no helpe at our handes, then that which needeth vs to worke therewithall, to make it of efficacy. These thinges are set forth vnder the name of Oecumenus, but they are in any wise to be auoyded. For it is false, that the sinne of Adam should not hurte mankind, vntill men had wrought together by reason of theyr sinnes. For an infant when he is borne, by what meanes can he helpe that original sinne which cleaueth vnto him. But if he by in the sinne he incurreth damnation, and perissheth everlastingly. Farther whereas they say, that the grace of Christ pertayneth vnto me, although they worke not together wth it, this may after a sort haue place in the conuersion of a sinner. For a sinner calleth not vnto himselfe the grace of god, but rather by his impiety resisteth it. But when grace is once come, he is not moued of it agaynst his will. For of an vntwilling person, he is made willing. But the Greke Scholies w<sup>re</sup>st not this sentence this way, but apply it to the last resurrection, wherein the vngodly shall without any their merite or working together be rayled by from the dead. But this if it be rightly waighed of vs, pertayneth vnto the most grauous punishment of them, and not to a benefite or grace. For seing Christ sayd truly of Iudas, It had ben good for him, that he had neuer ben borne, we also of them may say most truly, that it should be good for them, that they neuer rise agayne from the dead. Wherefore let vs leaue this reason, and follow that which Paul bringeth as a reason most firme, and most true.

Wherefore euen as by the offence of one man, euill came on all men to condemnation. So by the righteousness of one, good was spread abroad on all men to the iustification of life. For as by one mans disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many also be made righteous.

Here he bringeth a conclusion of those thinges which he before spake. Neither doth he only conclude, and repete the thinges which he had before spok<sup>e</sup>, but also exp<sup>re</sup>ssedly declareth, what that one sinne is, which was brought in by one man: and one the other side what that righteousness is, by which Christ hath made vs iust. And hereunto tend all these thinges, to make vs to vnderstand that we are iustified, not by workes, but by faith, and by that meanes are we made more certaine and assured of our saluation. And in this sentence there is a want, which must be supplied. For thus he speaketh. Euen as by the offence of one man, on all men to condemnation, here is to be vnderstand, euill or hurt was spread abroad. And when he addeth, So by the righteousness of one, on all men to the iustification of life, here also is to be vnderstand, Good was spread abroad, or saluation. Here againe we haue these contraries καταίνα & δικαιοσυνη, that is, offence, & righteousness. Of which the one pertaineth vnto Adam, and the other vnto Christ. Neither w<sup>re</sup>th this an emphasis, that he sayth, iustification of life. For it is as much as if he had sayd, The vitall or lively iustification. For the Hebrewes be accustomed to pronounce notew<sup>er</sup>th abstractions by the genuine case of the substantiue. This thing also is to be noted in this sentence, that Paul exp<sup>re</sup>ssedly sayth, that sinne hath rebounded vpon all men vnto condemnation. Whereby it is manifest, that when he before sayd, That thorough the sinne of one man, many haue died, by this word many, he vnderstande, All men. Which word also he did exp<sup>re</sup>ssedly put in the beginninge of this comparison. Whiche I therefore speake, because Ambrose and Origen, seeme to affirme, that death and sin haue not reigned ouer all those that haue come of Adam: for that many of them acknowledged God, and were deliuered from the tyranny of sinne. But this is to confound the benefite of Christ with the hurt of Adam. For in that some were deliuered from death, that could not haue happened vnto the, but by the death of Christ, which they

they belened should come: which benefite although they obtayned, yet doch it not thereof follow, that they before they were deliuered by Christ, had not as touching their nature and themselves, perished in Adam. But these fathers seme therefore to haue inclined this way, for that they weighed the matter according to the number of men. For when they saw, that all men are not saued by Christ, least he should seme inferiour vnto Adam, they denped that in Adam all had perished. Therefore they held, that on eche side are some to be exempted, that both Christ may haue his number apart by himselfe, and also Adam his by himselfe. And it is possible, that this also moued them, that Paul hath before and also in this place sayd not, All, but many, But this manner of exposition is bitterly agaynst Pauls sentence: for he, euen as he putteth death common vnto all men that are bozne of Adam, so also maketh he liue common vnto them. Neither doch Paul to proue the might or power of Christ lene vnto the number of those men which shalbe saued, but to the weight of the effect. For he sayth, that it is a greater matter to blot out infinite sinnes, then it is to bring in one sinne. Oftentimes also he expessedly blith that particle of vniuersality. And as touching that which moued them, we answer with Augustine, that the meaning of the Apostle is, that all that are bozne of Adam do perishe: and contrariwise that all that are regenerate by Christ are saued. And eue as no man is brought forth as touching the fleshe, but by Adam: so is no man bozne agayne but by Christ. If after this manner these wordes of vniuersality be applied, the analogy betwene Christ and Adam shalbe clere and playne.

Euen as by the disobedience of one man,] Here the Apostle expessedly declareth what that one sin was, which he said entred into the world by one man, and by meanes whereof death went ouer all men, and this, sayth he, was the disobedience of the first man, which he signified to haue bene communicated vnto all in, wher he sayth, that by it many are made sinners. And contrariwise he reacheth, what that good thing was, which through one Iesus Christ recovered health vnto men. And this he sayth was the obedience of Christ. Of which writing vnto the Philippians, he sayth, that Christ humbled himselfe, and became obedient vnto the father to the death, euen to the death of the crosse. How obedient also he was vnto the eternall father, those thinges likewise declare, which he spake when he finished by his prayers in the garden, being now at the very point to be taken of the Iewes, saying, Not my will be done, but thine. But Adam did far otherwise: for he would not geue credite vnto the wordes of God, neither cōtēted he himselfe with his prouidence, as his duty was: for he desired to know good and euill, as though he ment to prescribe those thinges vnto himselfe, and to follow those thinges which he knew to be either good or euill. But he ought to haue done farre otherwise, to haue counted those thinges only for good or euill, which God by his word had prescribed vnto him. Of which thing Christ hath left vnto vs an example to looke vpon, when as he wholly submitted hymselfe vnto the will and prouidence of God. For when he should suffer death, and that a most greuous and most cruell and most shamefull death, he had fixed before his eyes only the wordes of God, which pronounced, that that death should be gratefull and acceptable vnto God, and also healthfull vnto mankind. Obedience is (as we now speake of) a faculty or power whereby godly men doo wth a willing mynde execute the commandementes of God, although as touching the cōsideratiō of this world they iudge, that the same will not be profitable vnto the, neither do they thoughtly vnderstand the reason of the. But contrariwise disobedience is a vice, which causeth us not to execute the commandementes of God, either because they are troublesome, or els because we can not attaine vnto the reason of them. And that which is in this place said: That by the obedience of one man, many are made iust, very wel agreeth with that which is had vnto the Ephe. That we are acceptable vnto God in the beloued. And the beloued is Christ. After the selfe same manner Esay saith in his 53. chapter, when that the Apostle here saith, that though the obedience of Christ, whereby he hath for our sakes suffered death, is spread abroad the multitude of the faithful, which are called Christs seede and posteritie long to continue. And the Propheete addeth, My righteous seruants shall iustifie many for he shall beare their iniquitie. Wherefore this obedience of Christ hath merited vnto him, to be made the captayne of the select of God vnto eternall life. As on the contrary side, Adam by reason of his disobedience leadeth to destruction all those that are borne of him according to the flesh.

Originall
sinne proper vnto euery man.

Here let vs note, that forasmuch as the Apostle saith: that by y disobedience of one man, many are made sinners, by these wordes is gathered an argument agaynst those, which thinke that originall sinne is not proper vnto euery man: but that it was but one onely sinne, and that the same was in Adam, whereby we are obnoxious and bound vnto death and damnation. For seying it is said, that they are made sinners, it must needs be, that they themselves either haue sinne, or els at the least wayes had sinne. For no man is called a sinner for an other mans fault. Although Christostome vpon this place interpreteth these wordes more hardly, the can wel and aptly be vnderstanded. For thus he writeth: But that by his disobedience an other man should be made a sinner, what consequence can it haue? For there canne be no paynes due vnto him, as one which is not guiltye, vnles he become a sinner of himselfe.

What meaneth it then, that he sayth in this place, many are made sinners? I thinke it sig-nifieth, that they are obnoxious to punishment, and condemned to death. In this sentence this I like not, that he interpreteth this worde sinners, for obnoxious to punishment and condemned to death: as though he should by the way signifie, that they haue in themselves nothing that is vile or uncleane, which can either offend God, or be called sinne. And a litte after ward, We will not thinke it muche (saith he) to declare, that of this death and condemnation we haue not onely not receiued any losse, if we liue soberly and chastly, but also we haue thereby gotten much gayne. What also is harde, to say that we haue gotten no hurt of originall death and condemnation. For lust and the great corruption of nature, hath thowto the transgression of Adam broke into all mankind. I graunt in deede, that which he addeth: namely, that it is an excellent gift, in this mortall body to liue holily and chastly: and farther also, that by the discommodities of our mortallitie, we haue occasions of martirdome, and of other vertues. But this I consider, that these thinges are the benefites of the goodnes of God. Of which benefites, although Adam thowto his fall sometymes gaue occasion, yet it doth not therof follow, that he hath not hurt vs, or that we being by him made sinners, haue not felt great losse. Now forasmuch as those thinges which follow, pertayne vnto the law, before we come vnto them, it shall not be amisse fro our purpose, to declare what is to be thought touching originall sinne.

First, we will consider whether there be any originall sinne or no: for there are some which utterly deny that there is any such thinge. When wil we declare, what it is. Lastly what proprieties it hath, and howe it is by succession traduced to our posterity: and also by what meanes it is forgiven. As touching the firste, we must remember, that both in the holy scriptures, and also among the fathers, it is called by sondry names. For in this epistle the 7. chap. it is called sinne, and the lawe of the members, and lust. Of others it is called, The want of originall righteousness, a corruption of nature, an euell inclination, a nourisher of euell, a weaknes of nature, the lawe of the flesh, and other suche like. The Pelagians long since denied this sinne: and so do the Anabaptistes euen nowe in our dayes. These in a manner are the argumentes, which they alleadge against it: First, they say, that the fall of Adam was sufficientely punished in himselfe: and that there is no cause, why God shoulde reuenge it in his posterity: specially seing it is written in Namm the Prophet, That God doth not punish one and the selfe same thing twice. For it sufficeth him that he hath once punished. Againe it is also written, That the sonne shall not beare the bodye, when it is formed in the wombe, is the image and manshipp of God, and hath nothing which ought to be reprobated: yea rather which is not woorthy of high admiration: and the soule also is either created or potwored in of God. And the manner of propagation cannot be counted euell, because matrimony is commended in the holy scriptures, and from the beginninge God commaunded mā to procreat children. Wherefore among so many aides of innocency, they demaund thow what churches or hoales sinne could creepe in. They alleadge mozeouer, that Paul in his firste epistle to the Cor: when he exhorte the faithfull wife, to abide with the vnfaithfull husband, if he will abide with her, among other thinges saith, your children are holy. But they could not be holy, if they wer bozn in sinne. Wherefore (say they) they which are bozne of faithfull parentes cannot contract vnto themselves original sinne. Farther they affirme that it is a common sayinge, that sinne is a thinge spoken, done, or lusted contrarie to the lawe of God, and that there is no sinne except it be voluntary. And as John saith in his .i. epistle the .4. chap: Sinne is iniquity: vnto which is opposite, equity, or right, and there can be no other equity or right assigned, then that which is contained in the law: and so is sinne a trasgression of the law: all which thinges cannot happen in infantes when they are bozne. And they say mozeouer that it seemeth not agreeable, whiche some say, namely, that this sinne is potwored in through the flesh or body. For the flesh and the body are of theyr owne nature thinges insensible, nether can they be counted a subiect mete for sinne. And to establishe theyr faigned inuencion, they adde, that those thinges whiche Paul speaketh in this place, are to be drawen to those sinnes whiche are called actuall. And where it is said that by one man sinne entred into the world, it is to be vnderstand (say they) because of imitation and example, whiche the posterity followed. With these and like argumentes were they led to deny that there is any original sinne. But as for death and afflictions of this life, whiche are commonly alleadged for tokens to confirme original sinne, they say that they consist of natural causes: as are the temperatures of the elementes and humors. And that therfore it is a vaine inuencion to draw them to the fall of Adam. And they thinke it to be a thinge moste absurde, to counte that for sinne, whiche can by no meanes be auoyded. Lastly they say, if by that meanes it should be saide, that we haue sinned in Adam, because we were in his loynes, euen as in the Epistle to the Hebrues it is sayde of Leni, that he paide tenthes in the loynes of Abraham: after the like and selfe same maner we may say that we were in the loynes of other our elders, from whome we haue by procreation discended: wherefore there is no cause why the sinne of Adam shoulde moze flow abroade into vs, then the sinne of our graundfathers, greate graundfathers, and of all our elders. And by that meanes they esteeme should seeme most vnhappy, which should be bozne in the latter times. For they should beare the iniquities of all their elders. These thinges alleadge they to proue, that there is no original sinne. But we on the contrarie parte will by manye testimonies of the scriptures proue that there is such a sinne. In the booke of Gen: the vi. chap: God speaketh thus: My spirit shall not alwaies strine in mā, because he is but flesh. Again, The imagination of the thoughtes of theyr hartes is onely euell alwayes. And in the viii. chapter, The imagination of theyr hart is euell, euen fro their childhode. These wordes declare, that there sticketh some vice in our nature, whē we are brought forth. David also saith, Beholde in iniquities was I conceived, and in sins bath my mother conceived me: then which testimony there can be nothing moze euident. Jeremy also in his .i. chap: saith, that the hart of man is wicked, peruerse, and stubborne. And the same Jeremy, and also Job do curse that day, wherein they were bozne into the world: because they saw that together with them was brought forth the original and fountaine of all vices. And Job hath a most manifest testimony of the vncleanness of our natiuitie: For this he saith: Who can make that cleane, which is conceived of vncleane seeder? And our sauiour saith Except a man be borne againe of water, and the holyghost, he shall not enter into the kingdome of beauen. And euen as a potter doth not make new agayne any vessel, vnles he se that the same was ill made before:

It is proued by testimonies of the scripture that there is original sinne.

So Christ would not haue vs generated agayne, except he saw that we were before unhappely generated. Which thing he testifieth also in an other place saying: That which is borne of flesh, is flesh: and that which is borne of spirite, is spirite. By which words he would haue vs to vnderstand that therefore the regeneration of the spirite was necessary, because we had before but only a carnall generation. Paul in the 6. chap. to the Rom. sayth: That therefore we must not abide in sinne, because we are now dead vnto it. And that thing he proueth by Baptisme. For what soeuer we be (sayth he) that are baptised in Christ Iesu, we are baptised in his death, to this end that we should dye vnto sinne: and that our old man should be crucified, and the body of sinne abolished. And for as much as children are baptised, euen thereby we haue a testimony that there is sinne in them. For otherwise the nature of Baptisme, as it is there described of Paul, should not consist. The same reason hath he also in his epistle to the Colossians, where he sayth, that we are Circumcised with circumcision not made with handes, in making cleane the sinfull body of the flesh, beinge buried together with Christ in Baptisme. He compareth Baptisme with Circumcision: & saith, that they which are baptised, are made cleane from the body of sinne. Neither is it to be doubted, but that they which are baptised, are baptised into the remission of sinnes. And assuredly the circumcision, which in the old law was geuen vnto Children, was correspondent vnto our Baptisme. And as touching circumcision, it is written, The soule whose flesh of the foreskinne is not circumcised the eighth day, let it dye the death. Wherefore seeing children haue neede of the sacrament of regeneration, it followeth of necessity, that they are borne subiect vnto sinne. Paul to the Ephesians sayth, That we are by nature the children of wrath. But our nature could not be odious vnto God, vnles it were contaminated with sinne. And in the same place Paul doth with most greuous wordes describe the wickednes of this wrath: how that we walke after the prince of this world, who is of efficacy in our hartes because of stubbernes, and for that cause we do the will of the flesh, and of our mynde. Augustine, also citeth a place out of the first epistle to the Corinthis. that Christ died for all men. Wherefore it followeth that all men were dead, and had neede of his death. But it is a wicked thing, to exclude children out of the number of them, for whome Christ dyed. If thou demaund what maner ones they were for whome Christ died, the Apostle hath sufficiently declared that in this epistle, when he sayd, that they were weake, enemies of god, vngodly, and sinners. Amongest whome also we ought to reken young children, if we will say that Christ died for them. Farther it seemeth, that Originall sinne is most manifestly taught by the 7. chap. of this epistle. For there it is thus written: The law is spirituall, but I am carnall, sold vnder sinne. And it is added: The good thing which I would, I doo not, but the euill which I would not, that I doo. Neither doo I worke that, but sinne which dwelleth in me. He maketh mention also of the law of members, wherewith he complayneth that he was drawen captiue and agaynst his will. And in the 8. chap. he sayth, that the wisdom of the flesh is enmity against God: neither is it subiect vnto the law of God: yea neither can it be. The death also which young children dye, doth sufficiently testefye, that there sticketh sinne in them, except we will say that God punisheth them without desert. Farther this selfe place, which we are now in hand with, conteyneth a most manifest testimony of Originall sin. For thus it is written, that by one man sinne entred into the world, & that all men haue sinned, none excepted, and that the sinne of one man is spread abroad amongst all men: and that for the disobedience of one man, many are made sinners. Farther, they which are grafted in Christ, are toward the latter end of this epistle, called wild olive trees: by which metaphoze is signified, that man had degenerated from the good institution of nature. And if so be that we haue departed from our nature, vndoubtedly we are spotted with originall sinne. And before, Paul so accused all mankind, that he sayd: There is none iust, there is none that vnderstandeth, or seeketh after God: All haue declined, and therewith all are become vnprofitable, there is none that doth good, no nor one. &c. All which thinges sufficiently declare the corruption of mans mans nature. By these testimonies of scriptures it is manifest inough, as I thinke, that there is Originall sinne.

Now in order I should confute the argumentes of the aduersaries. But first I thought it good to declare the definition of originall sinne. For it being diligently marked and knowen, many thinges shall by the way be vnderstanded, which serue much to confute their reasons. First we will recite the opinions of other men: then will we declare, what we thinke thereof. The Pelagians affirmed, that the sinne of Adam hath not spred abroade into his posterity, but only by imitation. Augustine strived vehemently agaynst these men, and proueth by many argumentes, that originall sinne is not only the imitation of the sinne of Adam. For if Paul would haue sayd, that the first sinne was after that maner spred abroade, he would not haue sayde, that it came fro Adam, but rather from the deuill. For he was the first, that gaue a forme and example to sinne. Wherefore Christ in Iohn sayth, that the Iewes, which boasted that they came of their father Abraham, were rather the children of the deuill, because they did his workes. For the deuill was a manqueller euen fro the beginning: and they sought to kill hym which had not euill deserued at their handes. And to this Augustine citeth that which is witten in the 2. chapter of the booke of wisdom, that through enuy of the deuill, death entred into the world: and that they do imitate him, which are on his side. Vnto which sentence neuertheles I do not much attribute: partly because that booke is not Canonickall: and partly because in the Greke text there is some ambiguity. For this verbe, do imitate, is not there witten, but παράδειγμα, that is, haue experience of that death. Howbeit the reason is firme, that of the deuill came the first example of sinning. Farther this opinion is hereby cofuted, because Paul maketh an Antichesis, betwene Christ and Adam. But the righteousness of Christ is not only set forth vnto vs to be imitated: but also that they which beleue in hym, should be changed in mynde, corrected in spirite, and amended in all their strengthes. Wherefore it is agayne required on the other side by the nature of the Antichesis, that besides the euill example, which Adam gaue vnto his posterity, he hath also corrupted their nature, and as Augustine writeth in his booke of the merites and remission of sinnes, tabe quadam tabificauerit, that is, hath with a certayne corruption corrupted it. Thirdly this also maketh agaynst the Pelagians, namely, that euen the very infants do dye. For as Paule sayth vnto the Romanes in the 6. chapter: The reward of sinne is death: but the gift of God is eternall life, through Iesus Christ our Lord. And in the 15. chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians. The weapon (saith he) of death is sinne. Lastly the baptisme which is genen to little ones, can not blot out of them the sinne of imitation. Wherefore of necessity, we ought to affirme that there is some other kinde of sinne in them, except we will haue them to be baptised in vayne.

There is also an other opinion (which the Master of the Sentences reciteth in the 2. dist: the 30.) which was of such which thought that originall sinne is only a guiltines, or blame for an offence, or obligation wherunto we are bound by reason of the sinne of Adam. So these men do not acknowledge, that there is truly and in very dede any fault or sinne in those which are bozne: but only a certayne guiltines and obligation, that they should dye and be condemned for the sinne of Adam. This opinion semeth Pighius in a maner to haue reuined. For he denieth that originall sinne is in very dede sinne, because it is neither transgression of the law, nor yet voluntary. Wherefore he affirmeth it to be nothing els, then the sinne of Adam: for which we that are his posterity are made guilty of damnation, and death, and are become exiles from the kingdom of heaue. But as for death and afflictions of this life, and lustes of the flesh, and other such like afflictions, he saith that they come of principles of nature: so that he is so farre of from saying, that all these thinges are sinnes, that he both affirmeth them to be the workes of God. For he sayth, that God is the au-

The Pelagians say that the sin of Adam was spred abroade only by imitation.

Adam brought not forth the first example of sinning but the deuill.

The righteousness of Christ is not only set forth to be imitated.

The sinne of imitation can not be blotted out of young children.

Pighius maketh originall sinne rather an obligation then a fault. He maketh death to come of the principles of nature.

tho: of nature: and that these things follow the humors & temperature of the body: and that thing which we see happeneth in brute beasts, happeneth also in men as touching the flesh and grosser powers of the mynde: as to desire those things which are preservative, pleasant, and profitable, whether they be agreeable to reason, or against it: and to avoid things contrary. Wherefore he maketh original sinne to be only the transgression of Adam. Unto which one transgression he will have all vs to be borne obnoxious, not for any time, or fault, or corruption which we have in our selues. And he saith moreover that those which dye, being obnoxious only to this sinne of Adam, shall not be afflicted in an other life with sensible payne. For he imagineth (although he dare not openly assume it) that they shall either in this world, or els in some other very delicious place, be happy through a certayne naturall blessednes, wherein they shall lyue praising God, and geuing thanks, although they be banished from the kingdome of heauen: of which discomfort neuertheless (as he dreameth) they shall nothing complaine, or be sad therefore. For this were to strive against the will of God, which a man can not do without sinne. But forasmuch as whilest they liued here, they had no wicked will, it is not to be thought that they shall have such a wicked will in the lyfe to come. And that they shall not suffer any sensible paine, he thinketh he proueth very well, and that by two reasons. First, because they haue committed no euill, neither haue they contaminated themselves with any forwardnes. Secondly, because in this life is required no repentance or contrition for original sinne. And of this fained deuise, this pretence hath he, because sinne ought not to be taken, but after the true and proper maner: that is, that it be a thing spoken, done or lusted against the law of GOD: and that it be voluntary, and not obtruded to any against their will, but such which may be eschued. But forasmuch as these things haue not place in little infantes, there can therefore be no sinne in them. Howbeit, he saith, that he denieth not, but that there is original sinne: for he saith, that it is the sinne of Adam, for which all we are condemned, & must die. But therefore I said he sought pretences, because in very dede I see, that he was moued to speake these things for another cause. For he, attributing so much vnto free will, and hauing of that matter written so many things against vs, and considering also that the same could not consist, if he should apertly graunt origi-nall sinne, as it is set forth of all the godly, hath for that cause founde out this new deuised sentence: which yet (as I haue said) is not utterly so new, for it is both touched and also reiected by the maister of the sentences. But to colour his fond deuise more beautifully, he bringeth a similitude of a noble and liberal prince, which doth not onely set at liberty some one of his seruantes, but also geueth vnto him great authoritie, and enricheth him with possessions, which also shall come vnto his po-steritie: and the Prince geueth him in charge this thyng onely, that he faithfully obserue some certayne commaundementes: which if he transgresse, then he to be assured, that all his riches and possessions shall be taken from him: and himselfe to returne to his olde bondage. This seruant being vnwise and vngate, violateth the commaundements of his prince: and by that meanes is not onely himselfe made a seruant as he was before, but also bringeth forth children to bondage. But those children haue nothing wherof to complaine of the severity of the prince: but rather to geue thanks, because he dealt so liberally with their father. But for their father they may be exceedingly sorry, because he lost those ornaments both from himselfe, and also from his posteritie. Yea, what if this also be added, that the liberalitie of the prince was so great, that he also allured the posteritie of the vngate seruant to those selfe same benefites, and also to farre greater, and so allured them, that of his owne accorde, he sent his sonne to prouoke them: So (saith he) is it with vs. Adam was so created of GOD, that he shoulde be partaker of that supernaturall felici-tie. Who yet when he contemned the commaundementes of GOD, was spoiled of all those supernaturall giftes, and left to the olde estate of his nature. And in that estate also are we procreated, and so because of his sinne we are condemned

and do die, and are made exiles from the kingdome of heauen, suffering many discomforts, which are deriued from the groundes of our nature. Wherefore we may complaine of our first parent, but not of God. For he was most liberal towards him: especially, seying he called vs againe vnto himselfe (which is the chiefe felicity) by his onely sonne, and would haue hym to suffer death for our saluation.

But against this opinion maketh that chiefly which we haue already twice before reherſed: namely, that infanten do die. For death hath no right where as is no sinne: vntill we will say, that God punisheth the innocent. And this reason is confirmed by that argument of Paul, whereby he proued, that sinne was before the law. Because death (saith he) reigned from Adam euen to Moses. But by Pigghius opinion this might be counted a very weake reason. For a mā might say, although they died, yet thereby it followeth not, that they had sinne. For death happened vnto them thorough Adam, for whose sinne they became mortall. Farther doth not Paul confesse, that there is sinne in nature, when he affirmeth, that sinne dwelleth in himselfe, and confesseth, that the law of the members draweth him captiue; and such other like: And that is nothing which Pigghius objecteth: namely, that those thinges come of the principles of nature: for these principles are not of nature being perfect, but of nature corrupte and vitiated. Neither ought he in this thyng to bring a similitude from brute beastes. For man is created, to be farre excellenter then brute beastes, & to beare rule ouer the. Man had in dede in himselfe principles to desire thinges pleasat & profitable: but not against reason & the worde of God. For to haue those affections outragious and violent, belongeth not to men, but to brute beastes. Farther our soule being immortal & geuen by inspiration of God, required a body meete for it, namely, such which might be preserved for euer: that the soule should not any time be compelled to be without it. Wherefore we ought not to flye vnto the principles of nature: for it was not framed such as now we haue it. Now if Pigghius do sayne that God created in vs these lustes and wicked affections, the is he blasphemous and contumelious againste him: whiche faultes he vnworthely goeth about to lay to our charge. For soasmuche as God is good, and moste iuste, and moste iuste, and hath also created man vnto the highest felicity, he woulde not haue geuen him those thinges, whereby he should be withdrauen from that felicity: which should entise him to do against his commandementes: whiche of theyr owne accord are filthy, and should lead vs captiues into the lawe of sinne & of death. For these thinges if they ought to be mortified and crucified, as vndoubt edly they ought, we must needes graunt, that they are vices and hatefull vnto God. Neither is that of so great force, that he sayth, that they are not properly sinnes: vnles euen as colde is called slouthfull, because it maketh menne slouthfull: so these thinges because they allure men to sinne, may therefore after a sort be called sinnes. Or euen as the scripture calleth that a hand, which is made with the hand: or speech is called the tounge, because it is pronounced by the ministry of the tounge: so these thinges may be called sinnes, because they procede from sinne. These similitudes do nothinge helpe Pigghius cause: for although Augustine vsed sometimes so to speake, yet he would haue it to be vnderstand of those defaultes and vices, which are in mā after Baptisme. In which thing how farre we agree with him, we haue els where declared: and peraduenture after ward will farther declare.

But Augustine plainly affirmeth, that before baptisme they are sinnes: Yea the holy Ghoste also in Paul calleth the sinnes: and the nature of sinne agreeth wpyth them. For so we haue defined sinne, that it pertaineth to all those thinges, whatsoeuer they be, that are againste the lawe of God. For as Iohn sayth, sinne is iniquitie. And who seeth not, that it is a thing vniuste, that the fleshe should haue the spirite subiect vnto it: and that our soule should not be obediēte vnto the worde of God. Wherefore soasmuche as all these thinges do stirre vs vp to transgresse, and to rebell against the worde of God, they are both vniust, & also ought to be called sinnes. Farther the wordes of David are most plainly against Pigghius, when he sayth: Beholde I was conceived in iniquities, and in sinnes hath my mother conceived me.

Death hath no right where as is no sinne.

The Apostle confesseth that sin dwelleth in himselfe. We haue not the principles of nature perfect but vitiated. The consideration of man and of brute beasts is not alike.

The bodye ought to be agreeable vnto the soule. It is blasphemy to make God the author of wicked affections.

Evill affections soasmuche as they ought to be mortified, are sinnes.

The nature of sinne is extended to all thinges that are against the lawe of God. Wherein iniquity consisteth.

wicked lust, and these vices were the woordes of nature, undoubtedly that holy man would not haue complained of them. And what other thinge mente the Apostle Paul, when he wrote vnto the Ephesians, That we are by nature the childre of wrath, but that there is sinne in euery one of vs. Polybreit Pighius doth by a peruerse interpretation go about to wrest this testimonie from vs. For he saith, that, to be by nature the children of wrath, is nothinge els but to be the children of wrath by a certayne course of birth: because we are so borne into the worlde. And he bringeth this similitude that some are called bondmen by nature: which is nothinge els, then that they were borne in that state to be bond. But we neither can nor oughte to be contente with this fained deuise: for the anger of God is not prouoked, but iustly.

The anger of God is not prouoked but iustly.

Seruant by nature haue something in the that is apt for seruitude.

For it is not such, that it can be incensed either rashely or by chaunce. Wherefore there must needs be some wicked thinge in our nature, to the auengement whereof the anger of God is stirred vp. And that similitude of his, serueth not to his purpose: for they which are sayd to be borne bondmen by nature, haue also by nature some thing in them, which is apt for bondage. For if we geue credite vnto Aristotle writing in his politiques, bondmen by nature are they, which excell in strength of body, but are dull and slow in reason, and thereof it cometh, that they are more meete to serue, then to beare rule ouer others, or to liue at liberty. The Apostle also sufficiently declareth, why he calleth vs by nature the children of wrath: namely because by nature we seeme prone and ready to stirre vp the anger of God, and walke according to the prince of this world, and because the Deuell is of efficacy in our hartes by reason of incredulitie, and also because we do the will of the flesh and of our minde. These are the thinges, which make vs by nature the children of wrath. And how can it be denied that there is sinne in our nature, when as Christ will haue vs to be regenerated? For vnles we were brought forth wicked, what should we neede to be made new again? Further in the 8. chap: of the booke of Genesis it is manifestly said, That the imagination of mans harte is euill, euen from his very childehoode. And how dare Pighius say, that that is the woorde of God, and a good thinge, whiche the holy Ghost expressly calleth euill? But least he should seeme to say nothing, he sayneth that God spake that of mercy: as though he would by that meanes excuse men, and testifie that he would no more destroy the earth with water, because men were so brought forth and theyr cogitations tended to euill, and that euen from theyr very childehoode. But in taking this for an excuse, he is much deceaued. For the better and more natie sence of this place is thought to be this, that God would make a covenant with Noah, that he would neuer destroy the world agayne with water, although other wise men were such, that they deserued it, and the imagination of theyr hartes is euill euen from theyr childehoode. These wordes excuse not mans nature from sinne, but rather note it to be vicious and corrupt: which yet God of his mercy would spare. Lastly we learne of Paul, that by the disobedience of one man, many are made sinners: which declareth, that in those which are borne of Adam there is sinne, by reason of which they ought to be called sinners. But Pighius thinketh to anoyde this, because they are sometimes called sinners by reason of the guiltines, although the acte of the sinne be past, and be no more extant. Although it be so, yet he can neuer shew out of the scriptures, that any is called a sinner, but ether he hath sinne in himselfe, or els undoubtedly he hath before committed sin: vnles he will say, that God maketh men guilty without any sin committed of them. Further Pighius considereth not, that by this his sayned inuencion is brought in a middle sentence touching the state of them, which dye only in the guiltines of Adam: when as the scriptures do manifestly teach vs, that in the last iudgement there shalbe no meane: But men shalbe ether committed to eternall fire, or els haue the fruition of eternall felicity. And it is rashenes to procede farther in those thinges, then is reueled in the holy scriptures. Wherefore they deale more moderately, and worke more wisely which leaue all this matter to the deuine prouidence. But it is a spozte to se, what solenne reasons they

That which the holy Ghost calleth euill is not the woorde of God.

A declaration of a place of Genesis.

He that is called a sinner either hath sinne actually in him or els he hath before committed sin. Pighius maketh a middle estate betwene the damned & the blessed.

are which moue Pigghius. They shall not be punished (sayth he) with any sensible payne: bycause they haue not contaminated themselves with any wicked will in this life. What is this to the purpose? For it is sufficient that they haue a wicked nature: for they were prone to sinne, although by reason of age they could in acte not sinne. The young wolfe is killed of every man: who yet might excuse it self, for that it hath not yet killed any shepe, or done any harme vnto the flock. Yet is it iust that it should be killed, bycause it hath the nature of a wolfe, and would do these thinges, if it were permitted to liue. To this, Pigghius addeth an other argumer: for y, for original sin, grief, or contritiō is not required. But how can he prone this? For all holy men haue greuously mourned, for that they were oppressed with this vice. Dauid the selfe same time when he was most repentant, did burst forth into these wordes: Behold I was conceaued in iniquities. Paul so bewailed this vice, that he cried out: O vnhappye man that I am: who shall deliuer me fro this body subiect vnto death? & whē Pigghius saith, y these shall be content with theyr estate, he bringeth none other reason, then that if they should strue against the will of God, and be soze for the sentence denounced vpon them: they should sinne, which thing we ought not to deme of them, forasmuch as in thys life they committed no sinne. But here ought to be demaunded of Pigghius, whether infantēs haue an vpright will in this life. This must he of necessity deny, forasmuch as by reason of age they coulde not haue it. Which if it be so, how dare he ascribe it vnto them in the life to come? It is much more probable that they shall there haue an euell will, wherof there was here in them a beginning: the that they shall haue there a good will of whiche there was here in them no sparcke at all. But that similitude which he bringeth of the liberal prince, which did not only make his seruant free, but also exalted him to great honours, is not of his owne inuention. For Egidius of Rome a schole deuine hath the same: who yet together with vs acknowledgeth the vice of nature, & the wickednes that is planted in vs from the beginning. Howbest this thing we ought to examine and try out, lest like as costly hangings couer the faultes of a wal, so this argument by his shew and outward payniture do hide some error, & dangerously deceaue vs. He setteth forth vnto vs Adam as a bondeman, who from the beginning was made free by God, and enriched with most excellent gistes, and so enriched, that they should come also to his posterity if he had obeyed the commaundement of God and the law: but if he neglected to do that, he himselfe with all his posterity should returne to his old estate of seruitude. In this lieth hid the error of Pigghius: for he saimeth vnto himselfe a man, which from the beginning had a nature subject to corruptions, and bound to the seruitude of vnrasonable affectiōs which thing is not true. For God made man perfect: not that he should be like a brute beast. He had in dede lusts to thinges pleasant and preseruatice: but yet not such as should allure him agaynst the worde of God, and right reason. And he had a body geuen him, which mought haue endured for ever. Wherefore when he sinned, he fell not into his olde estate but broughte vnto himselfe a new infelicity. This shall suffice at this present as touching that second opinion. The thirde opinion is, that the lust or concupiscence whiche is spreade abroad in the flesh and members, is originall sinne. Of which opinion was Augustine, as appeareth by his booke of the merites and remission of sinnes, and by many other places: whome the Scholēmen haue interpreted to haue ment not onely of the concupiscence of the grosser partes of the mind, but also of y forwardnes of the will. But Pigghius repugneth and saith, that Augustine appointed only the concupiscence of the flesh and of the members to be originall sinne: as though Augustine ment not, that by the wickednes of the affectiōs both the minde is blinded, and the will corrupted. For forasmuch as all these vices are ioyned together one with an other, he would by one word comprehend them all. And he vled the name of concupiscence, bycause in it doth moze plainely appeare and shine forth the power of this disease. Wherefore Hugo de sacramentis writeth, that originall sinne is that, which we drawe from our natiuitie thorough ignorance into our minde, and thorough concupiscence into our flesh. Lastly Christ

Nether did Augustine by lust, vnderstand the acte of lusting: but the ability, prones and redy disposition to do euill. Which vices are not alwayes knowen in children, but so farre forth as they age doth better it. For so is there no difference betweene one that can se being in a deepe darke place, and betweene one that is starke blind. But as sone as euer ether light cometh, or that it is day, the blinde mans fault is easely sene. The wolke befoze he come to age declareth not hys nature and rapacity. The scorpion stingeth not alwayes: howbest he alwayes beareth the sting, wherewith to sting. The serpent so long as he is frozen with colde in the winter, is handled without danger: not bycause he then hath no venom, but bycause he is not then able to poyze it out. And he saith, that this concupiscence is drawen by generation, bycause we haue all sinned in Adam. For he thinketh that all mankind was in Adam as in one lombe. And bycause in him nature is corrupt by reason of sinne, we can not drawe thereof but onely a corrupt nature. For of thorns are not gathered grapes, nor of brambles, figges.

The opinion of certain Schol-
men.

But he chiefly thinketh that this concupiscence is traduced into Adams posterity by the seruientnes of the pleasure, which happeneth in procreation. Howbeit it some of the Scholmen of the wiser sorte iudged, that although there should happen no wickednes of lust in the accompanying of the parentes, yet the child should not want originall sinne, bycause it was in the first man, as it were in seminali ratione (as they speake) that is, in the nature of the seede. If thou demand of Augustine, whither he thinketh that this concupiscence, which he saith is originall sinne, be voluntary, he answereth, that it may be caled voluntary, bicause the sinne which our first parentes committed was voluntary: but in vs it can not be called voluntary, bycause we haue not taken it vpon vs by our owne election, excepte peraduenture it may so be called, bycause it is not put into vs violently.

Piggbius against Augustine.

Piggbius inueigheth against this opiniõ: for thus he saith, If the sinne of the first man hath corrupted mans nature, such an effect ought to be naturall vnto sin. For there was nothing in that first transgressiõ, which had the meane to corrupte nature, more then other sinnes. Wherefore wee shall of necessity graunt, that our nature is corrupted, not only by the faulte of the the first parentes, but also by the sinnes of all our progenitozs: which thing semeth verie absurd vnto Piggbius, that we should be so much the more corrupt, how much we are after them. But this chiefe point, whether the sinnes of all parentes be traduced into their posterity, I omitte at this present, and will speake thereof

Corruption is not the naturall effect of sin.

to ward the ende, so much as shalbe thought mete. In the meane tyme I deny that, which this man taketh for a grounde, namely, that corruption is the naturall effect of sin. For the reason thereof is rather taken of the iustice of GOD: whereby the grace of the spirite and heauenly giftes, wherewith man was endowd befoze hys fall, were remoued from hym when he had sinned. And thys wyth drawing of grace, came of the iustice of GOD, although the blame bee to bee ascribed to the transgression of the first man: least a man shoulde straight way say that God is the cause of sinne. For when he had once withdrawen his giftes, wherewith he had adozned man straight way vices and corruptions followed of their owne accord, which were befoze farre from the condicion of man. Piggbius also demandeth howe sinne hath the power to corrupt nature: whither it be for that it is a priuation, or els by reason of the matter or subiecte of priuation. But it seemeth that it can not be for that it is priuation: for soasmuch as it is nothing, it can worke nothing: nether can it be by reason of that action, which is subiecte vnto priuation, as was the wicked election thorough the will of the first man: for Adam when he did eate the forbidden fruite, desired not this, neither was this his will, to corrupt his owne nature and the nature of his posterity. This is a very weake argument. For we see that oftentimes many things follow men against their will and vnwares: which things though they would not, are yet ioyned together with theyr actions. They which immoderately gorge themselves with meate and drinke, do it not with this mind and purpose, to bring vnto themselves the gout. But it followeth of his owne accord. So although Adam would not haue these things to happen, yet when he had sinned, they happened of theyr owne accord. But saith he, seeing that this luste hapeneth by a certaine necessity of birth, and not by choice or election, it cannot haue the nature of a fault or sinne. But this therfore he saith, for that he taketh sinne more narrowly and straightly then he ought to do, for he will haue sin to be a thing voluntary, and a thinge spoken, done, or lusted, against the law of God. But if he take sinne for iniquity (as Iohn hath described it) he shall see that in lust, may be founde the nature of sinne. For it is vniust, that the body should not obey the minde in honest thinges, & that lustes should be against the mind, and beare dominion ouer it, and that reason, should be against God, and abhorre from his commaundements. These things seinge they are vniuste, whether they happen vnto vs with our willes or of necessity, vndoubtedly they are sinnes. But this man which objecteth these thinges, doth he not see, that he must also of necessity graunt, that the posterity of Adam is guilty of his sinne, and that not willinge and against their mind: which thinge is most of all against the word of God: for it is written in the Prophet: The Sonne shall not beare the iniquity of the father: also, The soule which sinneth, it shall dye. Which sayinge vndoubtedly were false if we beleue Pigghius: forasmuche as children do dye and are guilty of eternall damnation, although they haue not sinned. Vnto which absurdity we are not compelled: which do put in euery man that is boyn sinne, and a cause why he shoulde die and be condemned. Pigghius also thinketh it contumelious and blasphemous against God, for that he suffreth sinne to be planted in them that are bozne, when as they can do no otherwise, but to be bozne in suche sorte affected, as we see all other menne that are bozne to be affected. But let Paul answer to this obiection: who in this Epistle saith: *O man what art thou, which answerest vnto God? Hath not the potter power ouer his clay, to make of one and the selfe same lombe one vessel for honor, and an other for contumely? Let Esay also answer: who saith, that it is not mete that an erthe pot should dispute with other erthe pots of the worke of his maker. God is not such a one to be brought into order by our reason: which should come to passe if we should measure his iustice by the rule of our iudgement. And forasmuch as there passeth no day, wherein happeneth not somewhat in the gouernment of worldly thinges which we find fault with & accuse, & satisfieth not our wisdom, why then shall we confesse God to be iust? For who can assigne a cause, why so much grace is not geue vnto him which peariseth for ever, as is to an other which is fained? I know that these men are accustomed to say, that God doth therein no vniustice, because he by no law is bound to distribute one & the selfe same and equal grace vnto al men. But vndoubtedly humane prudence will not there stay. For it will complaine and saye, that although he be not bound by the prescripte of mans law: yet by the law of his goodnes he ought to be one and the selfe same vnto al men. Farther what humane wisdom can see, what that iustice of God is, that some are taken away being yet infants and children, that theyr hartes should not be peruered with malice, and so to attain to saluation: whereas other are kept safe till they come to ripe age, wherein to deserue vnto themselves destruction: when as otherwise they mought haue bene they had bene taken away in theyr infancy? Here we ought to haue in reuerence & to worship the secretes of the iudgement of God: and not to desire to correct them, or to amende them, accordinge to the prescripte of our lawes. Cato beinge an Ethnike when he tooke Pompeius parte, because he iudged it iustier then Cesars, at the last the victorie declining, and Pompey beinge discomfited & put to flight, looked vp to heauen, and cried out, that in thinges deuine there is greates obscurenes. For he thought it a thing vnworthy, that the prouidence of God should suffer Cesar to haue the upper hand. And I my selfe when I consider these things am* much delighted whith Augustine answereth which he vseth agaynst the Pelagi-ans, when he was in hand with this selfe same cause, which we are now in hand with. For the Pelagians objected vnto him two argumentes somewhat subtile and hard. One was, how it can be, that God, which of his goodnes forgiveth vs our owne sinnes, will impute vnto any other mens sinnes? An other was, if Adam by originall sinne condemneth men bntwaies, and agaynst their will, why doth not Christ also, to yē ende he might in no part be inferiour vnto Adam, saue the vnbeleuers? To these thinges Augustine answereth, what if I were so dull, that I could not straight way confute these reasons, shoulde I therefore geue euer a whit the the les credit vnto the holy scripture? Yea rather it is much more conuenient, for me to acknowledge myne owne rudenes, then to ascribe vnto the holy scriptures.

But afterward he dissolueth both the argumentes. For to the first he answereth, that God is the chiefe good thing, nether doth he (as these men alleadge) in originall sinne impute vnto vs an other mans sinne, but our owne iniquity, which sticketh vnto our nature, euen from the very beginning. To the other he saith, that Christ saue also those that are vniwillig: for he wayteth not for them to will, but of his owne accord commeth vnto sinners, both vniwillig, and resisting. And he also bringeth many infants to felicity, which as yet beleue not, neither by reason of age can haue sayth whereby to beleue.
Therefore do I alleage these thinges, to shewe that it is lawfull for me if I will to vse the same answer, which this father vseth first, and to say vnto Pigghius: Let vs suffer God to defend himselfe: he nedeth none of our defence, that he shoulde not be counted vniust or cruell. Let vs beleue the scriptures, which crye euery where, that we are borne corrupt and vitiate. Which thing also both death and an infinite heape of miseries do manifestly declare vnto vs: which thinges vndoubtedly God would not lay vpon the childre of Adam, vnles there were in them some sinne deseruing punishment. But they which discend not into themselves, neither behold their owne nature, how redy it is to all wickednes, those (I say) know not what this concupiscence meaneth. Howbeit many of the Ethnikes Philosophers saw it. For they do meruaile how in so excellent a nature there can be so greāt wickednes, selfe lone, and desire of pleasures.
And they so acknowledge these euils, that they iudged it very nedefull that children shoulde haue correction and discipline: and to correct this naturall malice they gaue counsell to sustaine labours, and excercises, and many other hard and greuous thinges. But they saw not the cause and fountayne of these euils. For that can be perceaued only by the word of God. Farther this Pig-ghius reasoneth and sayth, that this desire which Augustine calleth concupiscence is a worke of nature and of God: and therefore it can not be counted sinne. But we haue before answered, that it cometh not from the groundes of nature as it was instituted by God, but of nature corrupted. For man, when he was created, was made right, and (and as the scripture sayth) to the Image of God.
Therefore that desire of thinges pleasant and preleruatiue in Adam, when he was first created, was not outragious or behement, to be agaynst right, reason, and the word of God: for, that followed afterward. Therefore we ought not to call it the worke of God (as Pigghius sayth) but the wickednes of sinne, and corruption of affections. Therefore Augustine calleth Iulianus the Pelagian an vnthamfull praiser of concupiscence. For he (which thing Pigghius also doth) commended it as a notable worke of God. Moreover Pigghius is agaynst Augustine for this cause, namely, because he sayth that concupiscence is sinne before baptisme, but after baptisme he denieth it: when as (sayth he) the concupiscence is one, and the selfe same, and God, is the selfe same, and his lawe the selfe same. Therefore he concludeth, that ether it must be sinne in both or els in neither. But here Pigghius exceedingly erreth two maner of wayes: first because he thinketh, that in regeneration is made no mutation: especially seeing that he can not deny, but that in it cometh the remedy of Christ, and his righteousnes is applied, and the guiltines taken away. For that God imputeth not that com-

concupiscence which remaineth after regeneration. Moreover also the holy ghost is given, that the might of concupiscence myght be broken, so that although it abide in vs, yet it shoulde not beare rule in vs. For to this thynge Paulerhozteth vs, when he sayth, Let not sinne raigne in your mortall body. On the other side also he is deceaued, in that he supposeth, that Augustine thinketh, that the concupiscence which remaineth after baptisme, is viterly no sinne and especially if it be considered alone and by it selfe. For by most expresse wordes he sayth, that of hys owne nature it is sinne, because it is disobedience, against which we ought continually to strue. But when he denieth it to be sinne, the same is to be vnderstand, as touching the guiltines therof: for that is without doubt taken away in regeneration. For so it comth to passe, that God, although it be in very dede sinne, doth yet not impute it for sinne. Farther Augustine, compareth concupiscence with those sinnes, are called actuall, & being compared with them it may be said, that it is no sinne. For it is far from the haynousnes of them. But I meruaile how Pigghius could be so bold to say, that Augustine without testi- many of the scriptures, affirmeth lust, to be Originall sinne, when as he, in his dis- putations against the Belagians, doth mightely defend his sentence by the holye scriptures. But why he calleth Originall sinne concupiscence, this is the cause, for that Originall doth most of all declare it selfe by the grosser lustes of the mynde & of the flesh. Now I thinke it good to see, what other men haue thought touchyng this. For besides this opinion there is also an other sentece, which is of those, which say, that Originall sinne, is the want of Originall iustice. Anselmus was of this o- pinion in his booke de partu virginis, and he drew many scholasticall authoers in- to this his sentence. And these men by Originall iustice vnderstand nothing elles, then the right constitucion of man, when the body obeyeth the soule, and the infe- riour partes of the soule obey the superiour partes, & the mind is subiect vnto God & to his law. In this iustice was Adam created: & if he had abode, all we should haue liued continually in it. But forasmuch as he fell, all we are depriued of it. The want of this righteousness they affirme to be Originall sinne. But to make their sentece more plaine, they say, that not euery defect or want is sinne or euill. For although a stone want iustice, yet shall not therfore the stone be called vniust or euill. But when the thing is apte & mete, to receiue that which it wanteth, then such a defect or want is called euill: as it happeneth in the eye, when it is depriued of y<sup>e</sup> faculty of seing. And yet we do not therfore say, y<sup>e</sup> in the eye is blame or sinne: for then co- meth sinne, when, by reason of such a want, followeth a struing and resistyng a- gainst the law of God. Pigghius condemneth this sentence also. For he saith it is no sinne, if a man kepe not the gift which he hath not receined. For it may be, that he which is bozne hauing his health and being whole of body and limmes, may fall into a disease, or lose one of his members, or become maymed: which defectes or wantes, yet there is no man will call faultes or sinnes: but this similitude serueth not to the purpose. For a disease or lamenes of the body serueth nothing, eyther to the obseruyng or violating of the law of God. But that which they call the wante of originall iustice, bringeth of necessitie with it, the breach of the law of God. More- over he contendeth, y<sup>e</sup> the losse of originall iustice, in children is not sinne: because it was not lost thorough their default, But this agayne is to call God to accompt. But God is ἀδύνατος: that is, not to be compelled to order, neither ought he to be ordered by humane lawes. But let Pigghius conferre that his opinion with this which he impugne. This affirmeth that God condemneth vice and corruption, which it putteth to be in children newly bozne. But Pigghius maketh children gil- ty, and condemneth them of that fault and sinne, which is not in them: But onely is that which Adam our first parent committed. For other wise he counteth those children most innocent. But whether of these is more farre from reason, & more abhorreth euen also from humane lawes: to punish an innocent for an other mā's sinne, or to condemne him, which hath in himselfe a cause why to be condemned? Undoubtedly they that consider the thing it selfe diligently, will say that the sen-

Cap. 5 A Commentarie vpon the

The sense of Anselmus better then the opinion of Pighius.

By what law they that are borne are bound to haue originall righteousness. What is the nature of the image of God.

A trimme reason concerning the image of God.

Augustine is defended The faculties of the minde are the image of God, but not when they are spoiled of vertues. The law of tence of Anselmus is for many causes better, then this opinio of Pighius. For we know that to be true, which Ecclesiastes saith: namely, That God made man right. But when he had once sinned, straight way followed crookednes. For he doth no more now behold God and heauenly thinges: but is perpetually made crooked to earthly and carnall thinges, and is made subiect vnto the necessity of concupiscence. And this is to want Originall iustice. For actions or doings are not taken away from men, but the power to vse them well is taken away. As we see happeneth in those that haue the palsey. They do in dede moue the hand, but bicause y power is hurt, wherby to gouerne that motion, they moue it deformedly, and weakely. This happeneth also in vs. For, soasmuch as the deuine righteousness is wanting in vs, the ground is corrupt, wherby our workes ought to be rightly ordered & accomplished. But (saith Pighius) to want this gift, cannot be sinne in yong childre. For they are not bound by any debt or bond to haue it. And if the aduersaries (saith he) wil say other wise, let them shew some law, wherby we that are borne are bound. Which thing (saith he) seing they cannot do, let them cease to say, that this wante of Originall iustice is sinne. But we canne alledge not one lawe onely, but also thre lawes. The first is, the institution of man. God made man after his owne image and similitude. Wherefore we ought to be such. For God doth iustly require that in our nature, which he made. And the image of God doth herein chiefly consist, to be endued with deuine proprieties: namely, with iustice, wisdom, goodnes, and patience. But contrarywise Pighius crieth oute, that this is not the nature of the image of God: for he sayth that it consisteth in vnderstanding, memory and will: as Augustine hath taught in his booke de Trinitate, and in many other places. These thinges in dede do the Scholemen teach: but we wil proue that the matter is far otherwise, both by the scriptures, and by the sentences of the fathers. Firste in the Epistle to y Ephesians it is thus written. Put away the old man concerning the conuersatio in time past, which is corrupted though the concupiscences of error: but be renued in the spirit of your mind & put on the new man which after God is created in righteousness & holines of truth. And to the Colossians the 3. chap. Ye haue put on the new man, which is renued in knowlege after the image of him that created him. And a little afterwarde, he expreleth y condicions of this image saying, Put ye on tender mercy, goodnes, modesty, kindnes, gentleness, long suffering, forbearing one an other, & forgoing one an other. And in y 8. chap. to the Rom. Those which he foreknew, he also hath predestinate to be made like vnto the image of his son. All these things sufficiently declare, what that image of God is, which the holy scriptures set forth vnto vs, in the creation & instauration of man. Neither abhorred the fathers from this sentence. Irenaeus in his 5. booke saith, that by the powring into vs of the holy ghost, man is made spirituall, euen as he was created of God. And Tertullian against Marcian saith, that that is the image of God, which hath the selfe same motions and senses with God. And the reason which perswadeth vs therunto is, that man was therefore at the beginning made like vnto the image of God, to be ruler ouer all thinges created, as it were a certaine vicar of God. And no man can doubt, but that God will haue his creatures well gouerned. For he continually commaundeth vs not to abuse them: and we are bound by a lawe to referre all those thinges, wherby we are holpen, vnto God, as from whome all things do flow. But the good vse, and right administration of thinges, can not be had, vnlesse we be endued with those condicions, whiche we haue sayde are required vnto the Image of God. But in that Augustine assigneth the Image of God to bee in the vnderstandyng, memory and will, wee saye that he therefore did it, to set forth vnto vs some form or example of the deuine persons, in what case they are one to an other. But he oughte not so to be vnderstanded, as though he would make these faculties of the mind, being naked and spoiled of these vertues, which we haue declared, the image of God. Wherefore we haue a law geuen vnto vs either by the institution, or by the restitution of man, which Paul commaundeth, and by this bond we are bound to haue originall iustice, whiche we haue losse. We haue also the law of nature, & to liue agreeably vnto it (as Cicero saith in his 3. booke de finibus) is the principall and last end of mans estate. And this lawe dependeth of that other law which we before put: For it cometh of no other thinge, that we haue in our mind cogitations, accusing, and defending on an other, but onely for that they are taken of the worthines of nature, as it was instituted of God. For whatsoever Philosophers, or lawgeuers haue witten of the offices of mannes life, the same wholly dependeth of the fountaines of our constitution. For those preceptes cannot come out of a corrupt nature, out of selfe loue, and malice, whereby we are prone to euil: but they come of that forme of vpright nature, which they imagine is required of the dignity of man, and which we know by the scriptures was instituted of God, and commaunded of vs to be renewed. And to this pertaineth (as some say) that law of the mind, against which the law of the members resisteth. There is also a third law, which God would haue put in writing: namely, Thou shalt not lust. Which precept, although our aduersaries wrest vnto actual sinnes, yet we wil in the 7. chapt. of this Epistle declare, that it also belongeth to originall sinne: and that God would by the commaundement haue all manner of wicked lust utterly cutte off from men, Wherefore we haue now lawes, whiche so longe as they be in force, wyll perpetuallie bynde vs, and make vs debtors, all our lyfe tyme to performe that righteousnes whiche they require. It is true in dede, that infantes feele not these lawes, and by that meanes sinne lyeth a slepe in them as Augustine sayth in his 2. booke of the merites and remission of sinnes, following y which is spoken of. Paul sayth: *I liued sometimes without a law: not y there was at any time no law prescribed vnto Paul: but because in his childehode, by reaso of age, he felt it not. Wherefore sinne (sayth Paul) was dead, which Augustine interpreteth, was on slepe. But when the commaundement came, y is, when I began to know y law, sinne reuiued. He had sin in him before: but forasmuch as it was not felt, it seemed dead. Now appeareth how those thinges which we haue spoken agree with the holie scriptures. Yet still Pighius vrgeth, that these thinges nothing pertaine vnto infantes: for they oughte not to haue a law prescribed vnto them which can not be auoyded. But in so saying, he vnderstandeth not the meaning of the holie scriptures: for they sufficiently declare, that those thinges which are commaunded in the law, can not perfectly be performed of vs: when as yet they are most severely commaunded. Paul saith in this epistle, That which was impossible vnto the law, forasmuch as it was weakened through the flesh, God sending his sonne &c. By these wordes it most manifestly appeareth, that we cannot performe the law, as it is commaunded. For if we could, we should be iustified by works: neither had Christ needed to haue suffered death for vs. There are also other offices of the Law, for which it is witten, For it is profitable to direct the actions of y godly, but it is most profitable to declare sin. For by the law (sayth Paul) cometh the knowledg of sin. Again I was ignorant of lust, vnlesse the law had sayd, Thou shalt not lust. Farther by the law, sinne is also increased, & doth more lead vs, & greuouslier oppresse vs. For the law is entered in, that sin should abound: & to the Corint. The power of sin is the law. And al these things led to this end, y ma should as it were by a Scholmaster be brought vnto Christ, and implore his ayd, and desire to haue strenght geuen him: whereby at the least in some part, and with an obedience now begon to performe those thinges which are commaunded: and that those thinges wherein he faileth might not be imputed vnto him, but might be made whole by the righteousnes of Christ. Augustine in his first booke against Iulianus reponeth the Pelagians, for that they thoughte that they had taught some great point of doctrine, when they taught, that God commaundeth not those thinges, whiche can not be doone: and he declareth those to be the endes of the lawe whiche we haue now expessed. Pea and Augustine also in his bookes of confessions maketh mencion of those sinnes, which euen suckinge infantes do committe. Agaynst which no ma ca say they could resist. And they should not be sins, vnles they wer referred to some law, which is by them violated. Neither doth y any thing helpe Pighius, or put away their sinnes, for that they vnderstand them not. For that* nature requireth originall righteousnes.

The offices of the law of nature are had of the institution of man.

By this precept, thou shalt not lust, is condemned the want of originall righteousnes. Infantes feele not these lawes which is filthy, although it seeme not so to vs, yet of his owne nature is it filthy. Διόχρον γὰρ (as he saith) τοῦτο διόχρον καὶ ὁκνῶ, καὶ μὴ δόκω. ὅ is, That which is filthy is filthy whether it seeme so or no. This opinion of Anselmus concerning the lacke and want of originall iustice, doth in very deepe nothing differre from the sentence of Augustine, wherein he calleth originall sinne luste: but that which in Anselmus is spoken somewhat more expessedlye is more obscurely wrapped in the word concupiscence. But because this want of originall iustice may so be taken, as though we vnderstode onely the priuation of the giftes of God, without any vice of nature, therefore it shall be good to set forth a more full definition of originall sinne.

Originall sinne therefore is the corruption of the whole nature of man, trauced by generation from the fall of our first parent into his posterity, which corruption, were it not for the benefite of Christ, aduogeth al men bozne therein in a manner to infinite euills, and to eternall damnation. In this definition are contained al kinds of causes. We haue for the matter or subject, all the partes & strengthes of man: The forme, is the deprauation of them al: The efficiēt cause is the will of Adam which sinned: The instrument, is the propagation of traducation, which is done thorough the flesh. The end and effect, is eternall damnation together with all the discomoditis of thys life. And hereof sprange sondry names of this sinne: so that sometimes it is called a defect or want, sometimes peruerlenes, sometimes vice, sometymes a disease, sometymes contagiousnes, sometymes malice, and Augustine calleth it an affected quality, and ἀραξία that is a disorder. And that the whole mā is corrupt, hereby appeareth, because he was to this ende created, to cleaue vnto God, as to the chiefe good. But now he vnderstandeth not things pertayning vnto God, nor with patience waiteth for the promises which are set forth in scriptures: but w grief he harkeneth vnto the preceptes of God: and the paynes & rewardes he utterly cōtemneth. The affections rebelling agaynst sound reason do wantonly deride the word of God. The body neglecteth to obey the soule. All these thinges, although they be experimēts of naturall corruption, yet are they also confirmed by testimonies of the holy scriptures. Of the corruption of vnderstanding Paul sayth, The carnall man vnderstandeth not those thinges which are of the spirite of God: yea he can not: because they are foolishenes vnto him. In which wordes let vs marke by the way agaynst Pigghins, that the lawe was geuen of such thinges which of vs can not be perfozmed. For the lawe doth chiefly commaund vs to haue knowledge in thinges pertayning to God, which thinges yet Paul apertly affirmeth, that the carnall man can not vnderstand. And to our purpose, we see that Paul affirmeth, that this blindnes or ignorance is grafted in man, and that of nature: for we can not imagine, that it commeth by reason of tyme or age. For the elder in yeares a man is, so much the more and more is he instructed concerning God. Wherefore in that he is carnall, and vnapt to vnderstand thinges pertayning to God, it commeth of his corrupt nature. And this corruption is of so great waight, that Augustine in his 3. booke agaynst Iulianus the 12. chapter sayth, that by it the image of God is alienated from the life of man, by reason of the blindnes of the harte: which blindnes (he sayth) is sinne, neither is it very agreeable with the nature of man. The same Augustine (in his 1. booke of the merites and remission of sinnes, the 30. chapter, where he bringeth these wordes of Dauid, Remember not the sinnes of my youth, and my ignorances) maketh mencion of most thicke darkenes of ignorance, which is in the hartes of infantes being yet in their mothers wombe: who know not why, from whence, and when they were thrust in there. For the infant lyeth in the mothers belly vnlearned, vndocible, not able to vnderstand the commaundement, being ignorant where he is, what he is, of whome he was created, and of whome he was begotten. All which thinges were far from the nature of man as it was first created: and are rather vices of nature. For Adam was not so created, but he was both able to vnderstand the commaundement of God, and could also geue names vnto his wife and to all other li-

ming creatures. But in infantes we must wayte a long tyme, that they may by little and little as it were digest this doctrine. Farther, that this ignorance is to be counted sinne, Reticius the most auncient byshop of Aucion is a witness (as Augustine testifieth of him in his first booke agaynst Iulianus) For when he speaketh of baptisme, thus he writeth: That it is the principall indulgence in the Church, wherein we put away all the waight of the olde crime, and we blot out the olde wicked actes of our ignorance, and put of the olde man with his naturall wicked actes. By these wordes we see that wicked actes are naturall in vs, and that the finnes of ignorance are blotted out in baptisme. Wherefore soasmuch as infants are baptised, it is manifest by the authoritie of this father, that they haue sinnes, and that their olde ignorance is blotted out in baptisme. Now concerning the will, let vs see whether it also be corrupt or no. The Apostle beareth manifest witness of it, that the sence and wisdom of the fleshe is enmity agaynst God. And vnder this sentence he comprehendeth all the affectiōs of men which are not yet regenerate. But I meruaile at the impudency of Pigghius, who because he would by some meanes vntwape himselfe, sayth, that this place is to be vnderstand of the sence of the letter, which he contendeth is agaynst God, nether can it be subdued vnto him. For both the wordes that go before, and the wordes that follow, are manifestly agaynst hym. For Paul straight way addeth the difference betweene men which are in the fleshe, and them which are in the spirite. Wherefore it playnely appeareth, that he entreateth not of the diuersity of the sence of the scripture, but of the variety of men. The wordes that go next before that sentence are, that which was impossible vnto the lawe, in as much as it was weake by reason of the fleshe, God sending his sonne in the similitude of sinfull fleshe, by sinne, condemned sinne in the fleshe, that the righteousness of the lawe might be fulfilled in vs. These wordes also testify that Paul speaketh of vs, and not of the spirite or letter of the scriptures. For in vs is that weakenes, whereby the lawe was weakened, that it coulde not bringe vs to saluation: and by Christ the righteousness of the lawe beginneth to be fulfilled in vs. Neither ought we to harken vnto them, which both in this place, and also in many other, will that by fleshe we should vnderstand only the grosser part of the mynde. For Paul when to the Galatians he rehearseth the workes of the fleshe, doth not only number amongst them adulteryes, fornications, wantonnes and other such lyke, but also idolatry, whiche no man can deny, but that it pertayneth vnto the mynde, and not vnto the fleshe. And Christ when he sayth, That which is borne of fleshe is fleshe, and that which is borne of the spirite, is spirite, exhorteth vs to regeneration, whiche vndoubtedly pertayneth not only to the substance of the bodye, or grosser partes of the mynde, but also chiefly vnto the will, and mynde. And when he sayde vnto Peter, Blessed art thou Simon Bariona: for flesh and bloud hath not reueled these thynges vnto thee, he signified, that he had not learned those thinges of naturall knowledge, but of the spirite of God. For vnder the name of fleshe, he comprehendeth those things which pertaine vnto the mynde and reason. Neither yet do we say (as Pigghius fondly canilleth) that in the chiefest part of the minde, is nothing but fleshe. For we know, though Pigghius had not told vs, that the soule is a spirite: which yet before regeneration is in the scriptures called fleshe: because when as it ought to make the fleshe, that is, his grosser partes spirituall, and to bring it to the obedience of a minde instructed by the worde of God, it rather declineth vnto the pleasures thereof, and so is made carnall. But they obiection vnto vs that which is written to the Galatians: The flesh lusteth against the spirite: and the spirite agaynst the fleshe: as though this coulde not be possible, if we leue nothing vncorrupted in the mindes of men. But vnto this obiection we thus easily aunswer: First, that Paul speaketh those wordes of the beleuers, which are already regenerate: which thing those wordes which followe do sufficiently declare: That ye should do, not those thinges which ye would: by which wordes he declareth, if they had obtained a right will of the spirite of Christ, which yet they were not able to

to perforce by reason of the daily conflicts of the minde, and their great infirmity. Wherefore the Apostle in that place ment nothing els, then that whatsoever is in vs which is not perfectly regenerate, altogether rebelleth against the spirite of God. Farther also we deny not, but that sometimes there is some such battaile in men which are not yet regenerate, not because their minde is not carnall, & prone to vices: but because in it remaine still grauen the lawes of nature, and because in it is some illustration of the spirite of God: although it be not such an illustration which can either iustifie, or worke an healtful alteration. Farther, that reason is corrupted in vs, Pauls wordes sufficiently declare, wherein he admonisheth vs, to put on the new man, which he saith ought continually to be renewed in vs. How forasmuch as he will haue a man to be so utterly chaunged, and a man consisteth not onely of body and affections of the flesh, but also, and that much more, of mind, will and reason, it followeth of necessity, that these things also were corrupte in him. For other wise what nede haue they to be renewed? Neither is it of so great force, if a man say that these things ought to be vnderstand of those which are of full age, which thorough their owne choyse and voluntary sinnes haue corrupted these things in themselves. For I would aske, why all men vniuersally that are not regenerate, haue so contaminated themselves, that there is not one of them all found innocent? Undoubtedly, vnto this question can nothing els be answered, but that in them, euen streight way from the beginning the first groundes were corrupted and defiled. Augustine also teacheth that we are onely so far forth regenerate, as we are made like vnto Christ. For in that we are unlike vnto him in the same we are not regenerate, but retainne still in vs the olde man. Wherefore let vs see, whether euen from the very beginning our minde, will, and reason, be lyke vnto Christ: For if they be found unlike, we must nedes conclude that they are corrupt and pertaine vnto the olde man. And as touching the corruption of the inferior partes of the minde, daily experience sufficiently teacheth vs. Farther, this is proper to the inferior partes of the minde, to be dispersed into the members, and to poure themselves thoroughout all the partes of the flesh: which cannot agree with the minde and reasonable part, which are spirituall and vnderstandible. The body also hath fallen from his nature, so that it is rebellious and repugnant vnto the minde. Whiche thyng also Paul teacheth, when he cryeth out: O unhappy man that I am, who shall deliuer me from the body of this death? And again when he saith: I feeble an other law in my members. Lastly, that the whole man with all his strengthes is utterly corrupte, the commaundement of Christ sufficiently proueth, in that he commaundeth vs to denye our selues. If that our nature were innocent and perfect, we should not nede to deny it. For good things are to be retained and not to be put away. With this our definition of originall sinne, wel agreeth the want of originall iustice. Also with it agreeth the description of Augustine, wherein he saith, that it is the concupiscence of the flesh: so that either of them be rightly vnderstanded. The chiefe of the scholemen acknowledged this doctrine, as Thomas, Scotus, and in especiall Bonauentura. These appoint for the materiall part in this sinne, the corruption of nature, or concupiscence: and for the formal part, the want of originall righteousness: and so of these two opinions, which we haue now rehearsed, they make but one. But yet some of our men will haue guiltines or imputation of God to be the formal part. But forasmuch as that thing is utterly separated from sinne, I rather leane to that sentence, which putteth for the forme, the battaile and rebellion against the law of God. For, that is the principall cause why the vices of nature are to be called sinnes. Neither ought we to geue eare vnto them, which continually cry out, that our nature is good. For we graunt that to be true concerning nature, as it was first instituted, but not after that it fell. For it is in deede good, but yet so that it hath some corruption ioyned with it. But when these men say, that concupiscence is also good, they must pardon vs if we rather beleue Paul, then them. But he saith: I know that there dwelleth no good in me, that is, in my flesh. And streight way, when I would do good, I finde by the law, that euill is ad-

ioyned vnto me. Here he calleth concupiscence euill. To the Galathians also he sufficiently proueth it to be euill, when he aduonisheth vs to crucifie it. It is false also which they say: namely, that it alwayes desireth thinges profitable and preseruation: for we haue experience, that it is euermore prone to thinges hurtfull, and to those thinges which chiefly are enemies vnto life. Farther if nature were so innocent and good, as these men sayne it to be, why should God so greuously punish it? Amongst all kinde of creatures we see none in a maner moze full of misery then man, if we looke vpon his natiuitie, infancy, childhood, education, and discipline. All thinges are ful of teares, sorrow, sighing, infirmity, and labours. With the body he must labour to get his liuing, the mind is perpetually vexed with troublesome affections, the hart is moued with sundry motions, and the body afflicted with diuers diseases. All which thinges when some diligently weighed, they say: That Nature is not a mother, but a stepmother. I will not speake how the bodies and mindes of infants and children are sometymes deliuered vnto the deuill to be vexed. For so we read in the Gospell, that a child was so vexed of the Deuill, that he sometymes threw hym into the fire, and sometymes into the water. Wherefore the severity of God doth in such sort count the nature of man to be innocent, that it greuously punisheth it. Farther the Ethnikes (it should seme) saw moze in this thing then these deuines. For Plato in his 2. booke of a publike wealth, saith: That men are of nature euill: as which can not be led, to kepe iustice of theyr owne accord: but onely not to suffer iniury. And Socrates sheweth, that vertues cannot be had, vnles men (as it is sayde the Poetes were) be inspired with some deuine power. And Cicero in his 3. booke of a publike wealth (as Augustine citeth him in his 4. booke against Iulianus) sayth: That man is borne into the world of nature his stepmother beyng naked, frayle and weake of body, hauing a mynde vexed wyth grieues, subiect to feares, weake to labors, prone to lustes, wherby is ouerwhelmed the loue of God, and also the wyt, and mynde. Ecclesiasticall writers also leane to this opiniõ: whose consentes being many, Augustine gathereth together in his first booke against Iulianus. Of Ireneus and Tertullian we haue already spoken. Ciprianus also sayth, that Christe hath healed the woundes whiche Adam inflicted, and the poysons wherewith the Deuill had infected our nature. Cyprianus acknowledgeth the infirmitye deriued from the sinne of the fyrste parente: wherebye we are so prouoked to sinne, that none can flatter hymselfe of hys owne innocencye. For who can boaste that he hath a chaste harte? For as Iohn sayth: If we saye we haue no sinne, we deceyue our selues, and the truth is not in vs. Agayne Cyprianus in hys Epistle to Fidus, teacheth, that infants oughte to be baptised, that they perishe not for euer. Augustine also citeth the Bishop Reticus: whose wordes we haue before rehearsed. He citeth also Olympius a bishoppe of Spayne, who saith: That the sinne of the first man was so disperfed in the budde, that sinne is borne together wyth man. He also citeth Hilarius, who writeth thus of the fleshe of Christ: Therefore seying he was sent in the similitude of sinnefull fleshe, so had he also sin. But because all fleshe is of sinne: namely, of the sinne deryued fro the first parent Adam, he was sent in the similitude of sinnefull flesh: so that there was not in hym sinne, but the similitude of sinnefull flesh. The same father in an other place expounding the vbiq. Psalme, vbi geth this sentence of Dauid. Behold in iniquities was I conceived, and in sinnes hath my mother conceaued me. Also in his Homilie vpon the booke of Job, he saith: That the body is a matter of malice: whiche can not be sayd to haue bene so from the first constitution. And Ambrose vpon Luke saith: that the body is a stinking puddle, and an harbor of sinnes: but by the benefite of Christ it is chaunged into the temple of God, and made a holy place of vertues. The same father against the Nouatians saith that our byrth is in sinne: and in his apologie of Dauid he saith: that before we are borne, we are blotted wyth contagiousnes: and before we haue the vse of light, we receaue originall iniustice: & are conceaued in iniquity. And of the Lord he saith, It was mete that he which should not haue in his body the sinne of falling, should fele no naturall contagiousnes of generation. Wherefore worthely did Dauid bewaile in him selfe the corruptions of nature: & forthat that filthines bega in mā first before life. The same Ambrose of the Arke of Noab: Whome then hath he now pronounced a iust man, but hym which is free from these bondes? Whome doth the bondes of common nature not hold. Also vpon the Gospell of Luke he sayth, That the infants which are baptised, are by the washinges of the healthfull ministry reformed from malitiousnes. Jerome vpon Ionas the prophete sayth, that little infantes are subiect vnto the sinne of Adam. And yf it should not be thought that he speaketh it only of guiltines, vpon the 18. and 41. chap of Ezechieill he vnderstandeth, that not euen a child which is but a day old is without sinne. He vnderstandeth this also, Who can make that cleane, which is conceived of vnclane seed? Gregorius Nazianzenus saith, The image of God shall pouge the spot of bodely inundacion: & afterward: Haue in reuerence the nativity, whereby thou art deliuered fro the bondes of thyne earthly nativity: And increating of baptism, by this (sayth he) the spots of the first nativity are purged, by which we are concealed in iniquities, and our mothers bath in sinnes begotten vs. Augustine defendeth Basilus Magnus. For the Pelagians would haue him to seme to be one theyr side. For he writeth against the Panichies, that euill is not a substance, but a conuersation, which cometh only of the will: which saying he vnderstandeth of those which haue gotten the infection of conuersation by their owne will: which conuersation he sayth may easely be seperated from the will of them that be sicke. For if it could not be seperated from it, euill should be a substantiall part thereof. All these thinges Augustine affirmeth to be vprightly spoken. For the Panichies affirmed, that euill is a certaine substance, and that that euill was the beginning of all thinges in the world. But Basilus one the contrary side sayth, that that euill is in a good thing, and that it happened to be euill, thorough the will of the man and woman which sinned. But in that he sayth, that it may easely be seperated from the will, he ascribeth it not to our strenghts, but to the mercy of God. And whereas he sayth that there shalbe left no tokens thereof, that also doo we hope for: but not in this life, but in the life to come. But that he acknowledged originall sinne, his sermon concerning fast sufficiently testifieth. For thus he sayth, If Eue had fasted from the tree, we should not now haue needed this fast. For they that are whole haue no neede of a phisition, but they that are sicke. We haue bene sicke thorough that sinne: let vs be healed by repentance. But repentance without fasting is vaine. By these wordes, Basilus affirmeth, that by reason of the sin of Adam we are not whole. Whereouer he citeth the 12. Bishoppes of the East which condemned Pelagius. Vnto which ought Origen also to be added, who, whē he interpreteth y sentēce of Paul which we haue rehearsed, namely, Death hath gone ouer all men, saith, that Abel, Enoch, Mathusale, and Noah sinned. But as for other fathers he sayth he will not reckon, because they haue euery one sinned. For there is not one cleane from filthynes, although he haue liued but one day only. But he speaketh more manifestly vpon the 6. chap. of this epistle whē he sayth, that Baptisme ought to be geuen vnto infantes by the Apostolicall tradition: because the Apostles knew that there were in all men, naturall corruptions of sinne, which ought to be washed away by water and the spirite. And Chrysostome vpon Genesis entreating this question, why men are now afrayd of beastes, and are hurte of them, when as they were created to be lordes ouer them, this thinge (he sayth) happeneth by reason of sinne, and by cause (saith he) we haue fallen from confidence and honour. And thereby Augustine proueth, that the nature of infantes is fallen, because beastes do not spare them. The same Chrysostome expounding y place wher we are now in bad with, sayth, That that sinne, whiche came thorough the disobedience of Adam hath contaminated all. He hath also many other places, which serue for the confirmation of this sentence. And yet the Pelagians were not ashamed, and especially Iulianus to cite this father for a witness, as though he made with them, because in his sermon of those that are baptised, rehearsing many giftes of Baptisme, namely, that they which are Baptised do not onely receaue remission of sinnes, but also are made childre and heires of God, brethern of Christ, and his fellow heires, members and temples of God, and instrumentes of the holy ghost, addeth at the last, Seest thou howe manye are the giftes of Baptisme? And some thinke that the heauenlye grace grace consisteth in the remission of sinnes. But we haue reckened verie manye high commendacions, and for that cause we baptise children beinge infantes: when as yet they are not defiled wth sinne, that to them myghte be geuen or addeed ryghteousnesse, boynes, adoption, inheritaunce, and brotherhoode of Chryste, to bee hys members. By these wordes Iulianus thoughte, that Chrysostome ment that there was no originall sinne. But Augustine sayth, that these his words are to be vnderstand of sinne, which they haue committed by their owne proper deliberation: from which sinne children are without doubt free, and after this maner they may be called innocentes. According to which sentence Paul writeth of those two brethren, before they had done any euill or good: when as yet none at all is accepted from that which the Apostle sayd, By the sinne of one man, sinne came on all men to condemnation, and also, By the disobedience of one man, many are made sinners. By this it appeareth how ware we ought to be in reading of the fathers. For sometymes we reade in them that infantes haue not proper sinnes of their owne: when as yet they do in especiall acknowledge in them the vices of nature, that is originall sinne. But to haue proper sinnes may be vnderstand two maner of wayes: Either it may be vnderstand of those sinnes, which they haue committed of their owne proper will, and free choise: and after this maner that sentence of Chrysostome concerning infantes, is counted true: Or els proper sinnes are called proper vices of nature, wherewith we are both defiled and condemned: which sinnes can not be seioyned from infantes, sozasmuch as they are bozne in them, as David manifestly proueth. Farther Augustine hath noted in the wordes of Chrysostome, which are in the Greke tongue, that there it is written sinnes in the plurall number, and not sinne in the singular number, as Iulianus had cited that place. For thus it is written in Greke, ὅτι τοῦτο ἔχουσιν τὰ παῖδες βαπτίζομεν, καὶ τοὶ ἀμαρτωλοὶ οὐκ ἔχοντες that is, for this cause we baptise infantes, when as yet they haue no sinnes. Whiche wordes ἀμαρτωλοὶ, that is, sinnes, being in the plural number, is (as Augustine thinketh) most apely applied vnto those sinnes, which are called actuall. And he addeth, that the auncient fathers disputed not so largely of originall sinne, because the Pelagians were not yet sprong vp which impugne it. These so many sentences of the fathers ought Pighius diligently to haue weighed: especially seeing he counteth them for Egles, which see most sharply, and do alwayes lye vnto the booy. But me thinketh he reckoneth them as counters, wherewith men cast accompt: which being put in sondry places do sometymes signify a pounce, and sometymes a peny, as it pleaseh him that calleth the accompt. So Pighius wyl sometymes haue the authority of the fathers most ample, and sometymes if they please him not very well, he will haue it to be none at all. And so sometymes he reuerenseth them as egles, and sometimes he dispiseth them as Jays. But in this thing he seemeth to contemne the iudgement of his owne Romish Church, which other wise he enery where maketh equall awen with God him selfe. For, that Church doth in such maner acknowledge originall sinne, that it suffereth not infantes dying without baptism to be buried, no not euen in the churchyard of Christians: and commaundeth that the deuill be by exorcismes expelled out of infantes, when they are brought to baptism, because it indugeth them to be the bondslaves of the deuill. Which thing I do not therfore speake, thereby either to allow those exorcismes, or that I would haue them still retayned. For that ought to be obtayned of God by prayers, and we ought not to do it, thereby to go about by a miracle to heale a man possessed with a deuill. For sozasmuch as at this day there is no such gift in the Church, there is no cause why we should desire to retayne it. Neither do we imagine that infantes which are not yet baptised, are possessed of the deuill. Innocent also bishoppe of Rome, which liued in Augustines tyme, condemning Pelagius concerning originall sinne, was of the same mynde that we are of. We ought not to extenuate this euill: otherwise we shall extenuate the benefite of Christ. And they which acknowledge not this spot, are neither sorry for it, neither yet do they seeke remedy.

Infantes may be called innocentes as touching sinne which they haue committed of their own proper deliberation.

We must be great warines in reading of the fathers.

To haue proper sinnes may be vnderstande two maner of wayes.

medy of Christ. Undoubtedly in this thinge Piggbius hath proceeded farther then eue the Pelagians. For they denied only the propagatio of sinne through Adam: But Piggbius crieth out, that that sentence is wicked, and blasphemous and contumelious agaynst God. Agayne it sufficed them to say, that Infantes dy ing without Baptisme, are both shut out of the kingdome of heauen, and also placed in the paynes of hell: but this man dreameth, that they shalbe happy through a certayne naturall blessednes, yea and so happy, that they shal blesse, praise and loue God, with all their mynde, with all their hart, and with all their strengthes. But now let vs see, howe he goeth aboute to darken and to ob scure this definitio which we haue before put. First he saith, that by these dark nes and corruptions of nature we vnderstand, either mere pnuations of the giftes of God, or certayne thinges positue. If we vnderstand them to be pnu ations, then knowe I what we meane. But your debatinges are nothing els, but tragicall names, and vayne wordes. But if we will haue them to be thinges positue, then so much as in an infant that is newly borne, there is nothing but the soule and the body, which are cleane, and haue nature and God for their autho, from whence or by what haue these pestilences burst forth, which we make mention of. The answer, first, that the pnuations which we here put are not like negations which take away the whole: as when we say, that Cen taurus or Scilla are not: but we saye that they are such that they leaue the sub iect mayned, vnprofitable and deformed: as it appeareth in an eye which want eth sight, and in the hand of one which hath the palsey, which is euer shaking.
In such maner is originall sinne in vs. The powers indeede and actions of the minde remayne, but they want their brightness, and therefore are wicked and corrupt. But Piggbius still erreteth, because he sayneth that the nature of man hath of it selfe a certayne naturall integritie whereunto were added those su pernaturall giftes geuen vnto the first parent. But after sinne, when those giftes were taken away, man fell into his olde estate. But this is a mere dreame: for the nature of man was instituted of God in such sort as was convenient for it.
Therefore the giftes being taken away, it is corrupted and hurt: and so much as it strageth from his constitution, it is subject vnto sinne. Farther we say not that originall sinne is only this pnuation, but also it comprehendeth thinges positue, as pronesse to euill, violence of nature agaynst the worde of God, and such other like. And therefore Bernardus sayth, that in the coniunction of the soule with the body, it is euen as if it shoulde fall vpon an heape of most sharpe potehardes, and hurting stones. But amonge the Scholemen Gulielmus Parisiensis in his booke called Summa de vitiis & virtutibus, bringeth this similitude: That the soule is in such maner let down into the body, as if a man shoulde fall into a myre, depe and stony place, and so shoulde both be drowned, be arayed with myre, and also be hurt.
So, saith he, by originall sinne we are drowned into the darkenes of ignorance, we are defiled with luster, and as touching the powers and facultyes of the mynde we are woun ded. But in that Piggbius saith, that both the body and the soule are good thinges, and haue God for their autho, I graunt that: And when he afterwarde deman deth, howe the soule they be corrupted, I answer with Paul: By one man which fell: and that by procreation, as a little here afterwarde shalbe declared. But whereas he sayth, that they can by no meanes be corrupted, for that God is the autho of them, it is an strong reason. For they which are of full age haue both body and soule which are the workes of God, and are continually preserved by his power: but yet may they be vitiated and corrupted. If he say that that conuinceth of mans will and free choise, so also answer we, that the same may come of other causes, namely through propagation, & lede. Therefore Piggbius argueth fro that which is not the cause, as though it were the cause. For this is his meaning, if men be corrupted, they can not be done but by will & free election, whiche thing is not true. All the argumentes which he obiecteth agaynst vs do springe of this, that he sayth, that he vnderstandeth not how this corruption should

Should be deuised into our posterity: and how it is possible that Infantes should be bounde by any lawe: and how there can be a lawe gotten of that thing, which we can not auoyd. But soasmuch as the holy scriptures do speake, testifie and teach these thinges, it is no matter how much Pigghius ether vnderstandeth, or not vnderstandeth. For we beleue many thinges, which we perceiue not, nor know by any sure reason. Which yet ought not to be of any such force, that euerie man should obtrude vnto vs thinges to beleue, whatsoeuer they thinke god vpon this pretence, because although they cannot be vnderstand by reason, yet they ought to be comprehended by faith, soasmuch as God can bring to passe farre greater thinges. For first, that thinge which we seeke to be beleued, ought to be proued by the holpe scriptures. And then although we can not attayne vnto it, yet let vs leane to faith, and laye aside reason. And by our definition it followeth not, that in nature, or in Ethnikes there is left no goodnes. Onely thus we affirme, that this vice would destroye all, if God by Christ brought not a remedye in the regenerate. Also in those which are not regenerate, God is sometymes present, and illustrateth them with excellent and heroicall vertues: wherewith original sinne is bydeled, and publike wealths & Empires are retained at the leasse in some ciuill order. Socrates would not goe out of prison, when he moughte: Aristides when he was exiled, wished vnto his citisens, that they might neuer be in such euill case, to haue any cause to remember him, Phocion euen now going to his death, and being demaunded if he would any thing vnto his sonne, I would (saide he) that he neuer remember the iniury done to me. The publike wealth of Rome had Curtians, Scipios, & Catos, men full of ciuill honesty, and great louers of vertue. Which duetie, although, as they were in men which knew not God, they were sinnes, yet were they bydeles of originall sinne & of nature corrupted: lest all thinges should be turned upside down, good lawes should fall to ruine, and the lighte of nature in a manner should be extinguished. Nowe seeing we haue confirmed Originall synne by the testimonies of the scriptures, and haue confuted the opinion of Pigghius, and haue reiected their opinion, which thinke originall sinne to be onely a guiltines, and obligation contracted thorough the sinne of Adam, and seeing we haue alleaged Augustines definition, that originall sinne is the concupiscence of the flesh, and Anselmus definition, that it is the want of originall iustice, and lastly seeing we haue proued our definition largely, and by many testimonies: now resteth for vs to prosecute those thinges which we put forth in the thirde place: namely, of the conditions and proprieties of originall sinne: how it is spread abroad, how it is abolished, in what sorte the remnants thereof are in men regenerate, and what payne is due thereunto. And concerning the manner how it spreadeth into our posteritie, we haue before rehersed sundry opinions. The first of those opinions was of the traduction of soules: which we shewed by Augustines iudgement to be easier then the rest, although it be not receiued of all men: An other opinion was, which Augustine followeth: namely, that originall sinne is traduced by the lust and inordinate pleasure of such as procreate. This opinion hath two errors: First, because it putteth this euill in procreation, as if it were of necessity: which yet may be seperated from it. And euen the scholemen themselves graunt, that he which should be begotten without the corrupt affection of his parentes, should yet neuertheless contract originall sinne. For to it they say it is sufficient, that he was in Adam, as in his first seede. An other error is, for that then originall sinne should consist onely in the filthy affection of lust: when as in verie deede (as it is saide) it comprehendeth the corruption of the whole nature. Others thought, that God created the soule euill, because it should be a part of a man created and set vnder the curse. But because this seemeth to be repugnant vnto the nature of creation, that it should be called a filthines, therefore that opinion is also reiected. The last opinion is of most men receiued, and it is, that the soule contracteth originall sinne by his coniunction with the body, which is already infected and corrupted of our parentes: so that if we be demaunded what is the place thereof, or (as they commonly speake) what is his subiect, we answer: that the place ther-of is in the fleshe, as in the roote and beginning: then out of that fountayne it also possesseth the soule: and so it is extended thoroughout the whole man. Wherefore, seede is the instrument, whereby this sinne is traduced from the parentes into the children. Pighius obiebeth, that vices can not be deriued by seede into the posterity, vnles peradventure, it be those vices which cleaue and sticke in the body of the parent: as we see happeneth in the leprosie, in the falling sickenes, and other diseases of the body. Neither doth nature suffer, that in the very substance of seede, sinne should haue place, that by it, it should be traduced into the children. Here we answer, first, that it is not true, that onely the diseases of the body of the parentes are deriued into the children. For we see many conditions of the minde, deriued from the parentes into the children: As wit, fury, ambition, gentlenes, hautesnes, & such other. To the other we graunt in deede, that the euill qualitie of corruption which is brought by the seede, as it is in the seede, is not sinne. But yet that letteth not, but that the corruption brought into the children by seede, as by an instrument, may haue in it the nature of sinne. As the qualities which we haue now reherfed, do not make the seede it selfe wittie, docible, or conuentous: but yet those qualities brought vnto the child conceived, do make him such a one. But whether God may be put the author thereof, they commonly say, that the deformitye and vnrighteousnes which is in this sinne, is dyatton out of nature already corrupted: which as it was created of God, was not so vitiated, and so they graunte, that whatsoever is good in nature, the same to be of God. And whatsoever is therein euill, so as much as it is nothing els but a defect or want, of it, it is not of necessity to put an efficient cause. For that which is but a want, it is not of necessity that it should be made: for if it should be made, it should also remayne in it. But this is not enough. We agree in deede with them, that God is the author of the subject, or of the thing layd vnder the defect or want. But in that they say, that this defect it selfe hath not an efficient cause, therein we agree not with them. For there ought to be something to remoue or prohibite that perfectio which is wanting, and to withhold the grace and giftes, where with our nature was endued at the beginning. Wherefore we must needs referre this priuation or defecte vnto God, which giveth not perfection utterly without want: which thing he euer more doth by his iust iudgement, although it be not alwayes manifest vnto vs. And it is most certayne by the scriptures, neither can it be denied, but that God punisheth sinnes by sins. But yet they are not so layd on vs of god, & they should be sinnes as they depende of him: for whatsoever God doth, the same without all controuersy is both righte and iuste. And euen punishments, so farre forth as they are punishments, pertaine to the nature of goodnes. Howbeit as they procede from vs, they are sinnes. For we do not affirme, that God by himselfe when he createth the soule, corrupteth it. For it contracteth the filthines of sin from a corrupt body where vnto it is adioyned. But in this thing humane wise dome is muche offended. For it thinketh, that by no meanes there ought to be made any suche confunction. For it seemeth to be like, as if a man should cast a precious thinge into an vncleane vessel. It seemeth also vnjust, that the soule which hath done nether good nor euill, should be ioyned with a body, from which it should contract originall sinne. Yea rather, if it should be so, men ought to absteyne from procreation. As they that are leproous are also exhorted to absteyne if it be possible, from procreation, lest by it they should continue to infect humane nature. And because the end wherunto man is instituted, is eternall felicity: it seemeth not agreeable, that the soule should be placed in that body whereby it should be called backe from the end prescribed. And as it is vnjust, that the soule which hath not offended should be punished in hell fire: so also seemeth it vnjust, if it should be cast into that body, wherein it incurreth not payne, as in hell, but sinne and hatred of God, which are thinges more greuous, and doth so incurre them, that it can by no meanes auoyde them. These thinges are so hard and obscure, that they can not fully be satisfied by mans reason. There are indeede certaine consolations gathered out of Ecclesiasticall writers, which doo only mitigate and lenesse these objections, so much as is sufficient for goodly myndes: but not so much as mans reason requireth. For the soule is toynd with an uncleane and infected body; in consideration of the whole worlde: that the kinde of man which is the chiefest, should not be wanting in it. God ceareth not of from his office. He letteth not the course of nature: but the body being now made, according to his prescribed order he createth the soule: and will rather a man to be, although he be not borne without sinne; then to be nothing. And though he generate al those things which he gaue at the beginning, yet of his mercy he geneth many of them. If further he hath set forth the remedye of Christ our mediator, by whome the sinne which we haue contracted should be purged. Which corruption dyueth the Elect, before their conuersion, vnto Christ: that feeling the strenght of their disease they may receaue medicine of him. And then after they are once graced into Christ, they haue this sinne lesse to strue and to wastle agaynst; that at the last they might carry away the victories and triumphes. But thou wilt say, God wrought by some other meanes haue saued mankind, that it should not be abolished, if he had created an other man pure and perfect, that Adam being dead without issue, all that other mans posterity should be procreated without corruption. There is no doubt but that God could haue done this, if he had would. But this had not bene to erect one that had fallen, to saue that which was spilled, and to redeme him which had utterly perished. God would shew forme of his goodnes, that notwithstanding the corruption of nature, he might saue from destruction, as many as he had chosen. For he would not utterly breake the brused reede, nor quench the smoking flare. For he would bring forth Christ, as it were an other Adam: which might in such sort saue his, as the other had destroyed them. These and such like things led Gregorius to crye out: O happy fault, which deserved to haue such a redeemer. Which wordes I would not gladly pronounce, forasmuch as I see nothing in y<sup>e</sup> matter, which is not miserable e to be lamented. For in y<sup>e</sup> so great saluatio<sup>n</sup> solowed, y<sup>e</sup> same is to be ascribed to the goodnes of God, and not to the sinne of Adam. For of it is deriued not so greate a good thing, but only by accidens, that is by chance. These things although they can not satisfy the objections whiche we haue put, so much as humane reason would require, yet by them we haue somewhat after a sorte to answere them. The coniunction of the soule with the corrupt body, maketh nothing to the destruction of the elect. For in Christ as well the body as the soule is reuined. And as by the body the soule is infected, so by faith in Christ, which is in the mynde, the soule together with the body is repayed. The order of nature requireth, that an innocent soule whiche hath done nother good nor euill, should be toynd with a corrupte body: except the body should be left without a soule, and the worlde depriued of the kinde of man. And if we go aboute to ex-postulate with God, there shalbe no measure, or ende. For an infinite number of soules would complaine, for that they were created, and were not predestinate to be saued: which yet neuer deserved it. Many would complaine, for that they were borne of vngodlye, unbeleuinge, and barbarous parentes and died in their tender age, whereby they coulde come to no knowledge of God.

And a man might inuent a thousand such kinde of complaints. As touching procreation we say, that it is laudable, forasmuch as it consisteth of lawfull matrimony. In it is to be considered the man whiche is begotten, that is, (as they call it) the effect proper and naturall. But man is a good creature of God: and sinne or corruption is added per accidens, that is, by chance. And this euill hath a remedye, which thinge happeneth not in the leprosy, and other vneu-rable diseases. We graunt also, that man is created to the ende to attayne to eternall felicity. And whereas it is sayde, that he is by the sinne of the body called backe from this ende, we on the contrary say, that he is by the selfe same stirred vp to Christ. Lastly we graunt, that it may seme a thing vntowardly, & the innocent soule should haue his place in hell: for y<sup>e</sup> there, there is no redemption to be hoped for. But being put in a body, though it be neuer so corrupt, yet it may attayne both redemption, and also saluation: Now let vs bringe reasons, firmly and surely to proue, that originall sinne is spread abroad into men by seede and generation. And we will therefore declare it by the holy scriptures, because many are agaynst it, and thinke it to be a thing altogether rayned. First Paul sayth, that sinne by one man entred into the world. Wherefore let vs consider how men depend of Adam, thereby to be partakers of his sinne. And there can no other way be found, then seede and generation. Furthermore, forasmuch as the Apostle to the Ephesians sayth, that we are by nature the children of wrath, and nature (as the naturall philosophers affirme) is the beginning of motion, we must needs haue recourse vnto seede and generation: for they are the ground of our motiō and beginning. But David more expessedly declareth this thing, when he sayth, Behold I was conceived in iniquities, and in sinnes hath my mother conceived me. By which wordes he apertly teacheth, that this sinne is introduced by generation. But that is farre more manifest whiche Iob saith: Who can make that cleane, which is borne of vncleane seede? By this place the infected seede of our elders is reprobued as vncleane, how much sooner Pigghins cryeth out agaynst it. But now let vs on the contrary side diligently consider, by what meanes this sinne may be taken away. Euen as it was brought in by one man, so also is it remoued away by one man. And euen as the sinne is powred in from Adam by seede, and generation: so agayne on the other side there are same thinges (in that multitude which pertayneth vnto Christ) which may haue the consideration of seede, and those are, election, or predestination, grace, the holy ghost, the worde of God, and baptism. These two last instrumentes God bleth for the regenerating of his. But if a man aske whether the outward word, or visible signe of baptism be altogether necessary, we answer that in dede the inward word, whereby men are moued vnto Christ and are reformed, is utterly required, if we speake of them that be of perfect age: but in children, neither the inward word hath place, nor the outward word is an ordinary instrument. But doubtles the outward worde is an ordinary instrument, whereby God calleth those that be of full age vnto saluation: although in some he doth by an extraordinary way vnto only y<sup>e</sup> inward word. For so he called Abraham out of his countrey, and instructed Adam immediatly (as they are wont to speake) without all outward ministry. The signe of baptism is in no case to be contemned. For such as neglect it, whē they may attain to it, obtain not regeneration. But if they can not attayne to it, it shalbe no hurt vnto a godly man, and to him that is conuerted vnto Christ, though he bee not baptised. And hereof it came, that the fathers made mention of the Baptisme of blood, and of the spirite. And Ambrose vpon the death of Valentinian the Emperour sayth, that he wanted not the grace of Baptisme, for as much as he so exceedingly desired it, although he were not baptised. But if I should be demaunded concerning infantes of Christians which dye without Baptisme, I would answer, that we ought to haue a good hope of them, & that the same hope leaneth vnto the word of God, namely, vnto the league and couenant made with Abraham, wherein God promisseth, to be not only his God, but also the God of his seede. Which promise yet, forasmuch as it is not so generall, that it comprehendeth all, therefore I dare not particularly promise saluation to any which so departeth: For there are some children of the saintes which pertayne not to predestination: as we rede of Esau, Ismaell, and many other: whose saluation was not therefore letteth because they were not baptised. Howbeit whilest we liue here, there remaine euen in them that be regenerate remanentes of this sinne. For originall sin is not utterly taken away by regeneration. The guiltines in dede is taken away: and such thinges as remaine are not imputed to eternall death. But euery thinge ought to be iudged by that, that it is in it selfe: wherefore if to be demaunded, whē ther

it be sinne which remaineth in the regenerate, we answer, that it is sinne. And if thou rede at any time, that it is not sinne, thou must understand that to be spoke of the guiltines thereof. But of this matter we will speake more at large in the 7. chap. But in death this kinde of sinne shall utterly be overthrowne. For in the blessed Resurrection, we shall have a body renewed, and apt for eternall felicity. But in the meane time, so long as we are here, our old man and naturall corruption is continually dissolved, that in death at the last it may cease to be. Nowe have we sene three thinges, howe originall sinne is syled abroade: by what thing it is take away, and what is to be iudged of the remnantes thereof. Nowe let vs speake of the payne due thereunto. Some of the scholomen thinke that the payne shall be without feeling. The Pelagians thought that they should only be banished out of the kingdome of heauen: and farther they affirme nothing: but Pigghius addeth this also that they which dye hauing but this sinne only, shall be blessed with a certayne naturall felicity: and shall loue God with all they hart, with all they soule, and with all they strength, and shall set forth his name and praises. And although he dare not affirme these thinges as certayne, yet he alloweth the as very likely. But Augustine de fide ad Petrum, and in other places also, oftentimes aduoceth infinites that are not regenerate, if they dye so, to eternall fire. And in these diuers sentences of the holy scripture seme to agree with his opinion. For in the last iudgement sentence shall be geuen but to manner of wayes: neither is there appointed any third place betwene them that are saued, and them that are condemned. The Papistes also although they thinke that Purgatory shall continue vnto the day of iudgement, yet after that day they put no middle place. And it is manifestly writte, that they which beleue not in Christ, shall not only not haue eternall life, but also the wrath of God abideth vpon them. And so longe as we be without Christ, we are called the children of wrath, neither is it to be doubted, but that God punisheth those with whome he is angry. Therefore we will say with Augustine and with the holy scriptures, that they shall be punished, but howe or in what sort, we can not define: but that, for asmuch as there are sundry punishments of hell (for euen the scriptures affirme, that some shall be velt with more torments then other some) it is credible, that they, forasmuch as they haue not aduoynted other actuall sinnes vnto originall sinne, shall be more easily punished. Wherof I alwayes except the children of the sayntes, for that we doubt not but that they may be nombred with the beleuers, although in very dede by reason of age they beleue not as the children of the infidels are nombred among the vnbelleuers, although by themselves they resist not sayth. Therefore the children of the goodly departing without Baptisme may be saued, thorough the league which God hath made with they parentes, if so they partayne vnto the number of them that are predestinate. I except also, if there be any other which by the secret counsell of God belong vnto predestination.

These thinges being now thus discussed let vs come vnto the argumentes of the Pelagians, whereby they sought to proue, that there is no originall sin. Their first argument is, that it is not very likely, that God will still persecute the sinne of Adam, whē as he hath long since sufficiently punished it: especially seing Nabū prophet saith, that God wil not twise iudge one & the selfe same thing. I knowe there be which answer, y he hath not twise geue iudgement vnto y sin, but was only: for in one iudgement he comprehended Adā, & all his posterity. But to declare y thinge more manifestly, I say, that in euery one of vs, as often as we are punished, there is a cause, why we ought to be punished: and therefore in euery man is condemned his owne proper fault and not an other mans. And though we reade, that God doth reuenge in vs the sinne of Adam, that is so to be understand, by reason our sinne had his beginning of him. As if a man beinge sicke of the pestilence should infect other, and they dye, we can not say, but that euery one of them died of his owne and proper pestilence, and not of an other mans. But if a man will say, that they perished by his pestilence from whome they drew the contagiousnes, that is so to be understand, because he brought in the pestilence

That which remaineth of this sinne after regeneration is sinne.

What is the punishment of originall sinne.

The argumentes of the Pelagians against originall sinne.

Every man beareth his owne sinne, and not an other mans. Nowe this is to be understood, that God reuengeth in vs the sinne of Adam.

first, and with tooch infected them. But that sentence of Nabum the prophet maketh nothing to this matter. In daede Ierome when he interpreteth that place, sayth, that by those wordes Marcion is confuted. For he falsely alledged, that the God of the olde testament seemed a reuenger and cruell, because he punished men with most greuous punishments. Which thing Ierome sayth, is to be ascribed vnto godnes, and not to crulty. For God (saith he) did for no other cause punish men so greuously in Sodom, in the floude, and at other tymes, but that they should not perish for euer. For he punished the once, that they should not after ward be punished agayne. But the same Ierome, peraduenture, because he sawe these reasons not very strong, objecteth vnto himselfe: By these wordes it may seeme, that adulterers if they be taken, are in good case, for so it should come to passe, that they being punished with death, should escape eternall punishments of hell. Wherefore he answereth, that the iudge of this world can not preuent the sentence of God, neither is it to be thought, that by a light punishment those sinners are put away, which deserue a greuous and longer punishment. In these wordes of Ierome are two thinges to be noted: the one is, that at that tyme adultery was punished with death: and the other, that that interpretation seemed not to satisfie him: wherefore he alledgeth an other exposition of the textes, that God by those wordes would signifie, that the Assirians should not be able, after they had led away the ten tribes, to obtayne also the kingdome of Iudah, as they had attempted to do vnder Ezechyas. God (saith he) will not suffer a double vexation to arise. It is sufficient to him, to haue destroyed ten tribes, he will haue the kingdome of Iuda preserved. This exposition, although it haue in it nothing contrary to piety, yet it seemeth not to declare the minde of the prophet. For he prophesied the threatening of God agaynst Ninue, and that it shoulde be ouerthrowen. And mindinge to exagorate the vengeance at hand, he sayth, that the vehemence of the destruction which the Chaldeyans shoulde bring, shoulde be so greate, that God shoulde not neede to afflict them agayne: for he would punish them sufficiently in the first vengeance. For the kingdome of the Assirians was utterly ouerthrowen of the Chaldeyans. And it is a common saying amongst vs, that when a man is beaten euen to the deare, he was so stricken with one blowe, that he needed not the second stroke. This is the Prophetes scope, and the proper sense of this place. But as touching the matter, we deny not, but that afflictions in godly men do tende to this end, that they should not be condemned with this world, as Paul saith. For they are rather chastisements, whereby God calleth them backe to repentance. But out of that we ought not to draw a generall rule, to ascribe vnto God a measure, that when he hath begon to punish the vngodly in this life, he can not also punish them in an other life, if they dye without faith and repentance. If they retorne vnto God, they shall suffer nothing in an other life: and yet not because they haue in this life with theyr punishments made satisfaction vnto God, but because Christ hath thoroughly payd the price of redemption for them. Wherefore euen as vnto the godly are certayne good thinges geuen in this life, which are vnto them an earnest peny, and beginning of the life to come, which shalbe accomplished in an other world: so in the vngodly, eternall punishments are begon with the preambles of the afflictions of this life. Which thing also Christ seemeth to signify, when he sayth, Fear him, which can both kill the body, and also cast the soule into hell fire. By these thinges I thinke it manifestly enough appeareth, that the oracle of the Prophet, which we haue playnely interpreted, pertaineth nothinge to the matter whiche we entreate of.

An other of their arguments is taken out of the Prophet Ezechiel: The sonnes shall not beare the iniquity of the father. To this we may briefly aunswere, as we a little before sayd: namely, that the children beare not the iniquity of their fathers, but their own & proper iniquity, which cleaueth vnto euery man from his nativity. But because that place is of others diuersly expounded, we will briefly declare our iudgement therein. This was a promy much used among the Iewes: Our fathers

haue eaten sower grapes, and the childrens teeth are set on edge. And not only Ezechiel maketh mention of this, saying, but also Jeremy in his 31. chap. The meaning of þ sentence is this. Our fathers haue sinned, and we are punished for the. And as the Rabines say, they which were of the kingdome of the ten tribes semed, to referre these things to Ieroboam the sonne of Nabat, which first made the golden calves. But they which were of the kingdom of Juda referred the same vnto Manasse: for whole impiety they thought, that that captivity longe ouer their heads, which the Prophets denounced. This proverbe God rejoyced, & sayd: that it should not be so henceforth. Myne are the soules (sayth he) the sonne shall not beare the iniquitye of the father: but euery man shall dye in hys owne sinne. Many will haue these wordes to be vnderstand concerning ciuill punishment: because God in the 24. chapter of Deut. commaunded, that neither the parents should be killed for the children, nor the children for the parents. Which thing also, Amasias king of Juda obserued, as it is wrytten in the 14. chap. of the 2. booke of Kinges. For he slew them that murdered his father, but spared their children, accordyng to the commaundement of þ law. Howbeit the Israelites did not alwayes obserue this. For we read in þ booke of Josua the 7. chap. that not only Acham was put to death for the accursed thyng, which he had stolen, but also together with him, both his sonnes and daughters, & also his cattell. But this was done by a singuler commaundement of God. Neither is it prejudiciall vnto the law vniuersally geuen. Howbeit this exposition concerning the ciuill law, agreeth not with the wordes of the Prophet. For the Iewes complained not of the punishment which was inflicted on them by the iudge, or by the Prince: but of those calamities whiche God himselfe had layde vpon them: namely, of the destructio of their goods, of the ouerthrowing of the kingdom of Juda, and of the captivity of Babilon. In these thinges they spake euill of the iudgements of God, and murmured, that his way was not right. Wherefore others haue interpreted that place to be spoken of eternall punishments, of the withdrawing of grace and the holy ghost: which thinges they say happen vnto euery man for their owne sinnes, and not for the sinnes of other me. Howbeit in the meane time they affirme, that both the children do suffer tempozall punishments for the parentes, and the people for the princes sake. For God (say they) will punish the fathers in the children. For the children are a certaine part of the parentes. Neither is it absurd (say they) if the children by their afflictions profite their parentes, when as by this meanes both they are called backe to repentance, and also they haue no injurye done vnto them, if soasmuch as they be mortall, they suffer death. For God prudently dispenseth the tymes either to liuing or dying: and taketh away life fro the children, either that they should not be corrupted with malitiousnes, or if they be now already in sinnes & in damnation, & they should not be more & more aggravated, and that they might once at the length make an ende of liuing wickedly. And Augustine semeth somewhat to incline to this sentence, in his questions vpon the booke of Josua the 8. and 9. question. And they which wil haue these remnants of originall sinne which remaine after regeneration to be no sinnes, are compelled so to say. For they can not say, that in infantes their owne sinnes are punished, for as much as they affirme that they haue none. But we, which say that they are utterly sinnes, do teach, that they are not in dede imputed to eternal death, but yet they are sometimes punished with some paynes, to the end we might vnderstand, that God is displeased with the. But neither doth that exposition of Augustines so well agree with Ezechiels meaning. For the Prophete sayth, that it should not so afterward come to passe, that the children should say that for their parentes sake, they suffered tempozall punishments, such as were banishment and captivity. For the Lord sayth: the sonne shall not beare the iniquity of the father. Wherefore, thys nothyng helpeth them, in that they say, that this is true in spirituall punishments, & in eternall dampnation. For the Prophete speaketh most apertly of the bodely punishments of thys lyfe. Augustine hathe an other interpretation in hys Enchiridion to Laurentius in hys 46. chapter: namelpe, that it is a prophesye of

of the benefite whiche shoulde be geuen by Christ. For, forasmuch as thorough his death satisfaction is made for Originall sinne, the Prophet sayth: that the child henceforth shal not beare the sinne of his father, but his owne. And Augustine seemeth to be led into this sentence, because when as Jeremy in his 31. chap. writeth in a maner the selfe same thing; straight way is added a promise of the new Testament. Behold, saith he, the dayes shall come, and I wyll make a new couenaunt wylh the house of Iuda. But this sence also seemeth not to agree with the meaning of the prophet which we haue before reherfed. Moreover although Christ suffered at a tyme appointed, yet by the power & grace of his death, children were saved also in the old Testament. What neded then to say, that henceforth it shal not be so, when as in very dede it was not so before. Farther they also, which are without Christ, beare their owne iniquity, neither do they suffer punishments for an other mans sinne, but for their owne. Wherefore we say, that the sentence of the Prophet is generally true; and that all, both children, and also those that be of full age as well of the olde Testament as of the new, do beare euery one their owne iniquitie. For al men that are bozne, haue in themselves sinne and corruption, for which they ought to be punished. Wherefore this sentence confirmeth our opinion: so far is it of, that it can be alledged against vs. But this maketh most of all against Digginus: for he affirmeth, that children beare the sinnes of the parentes, when as he sayth: that other wise they are cleane, and bozne without sinne. The Jewes published abroad that they themselves were innocents, and that as for the punishments which they suffered, they suffered them for their parents sake. For their parentes (said they) had sinned, and not they themselves. But God sayth, & henceforth they should no more vse that proverbe. For he would by the Prophet declare an abundant illustration of the holy ghost, which should come to passe in the new Testament. For his iudgements are not such, that for an other mans sinne he will punish one that is guiltles. Wherefore he doth not say, that henceforth it should not be so, as though it wer so at any tyme before: but this he sayth, that it should come to passe, & they should not vse any such proverbe, when they had once knowledge of the truth. But the law seemeth to be against this exposition. For in it God sayth: that he will visite the iniquity of the fathers vpon the chyl dren vnto the thyrd and fourth generation. These thinges seeme not very well to agree, & God will both visite the iniquitie of the fathers vpon the children, and also that the children shal not beare the sinnes of the fathers. To satisfie this obiection, we will first interprete the wordes of the lawe. For so shal we perceiue, that there is no contrarietie betwene the Prophet and the law. This sentence of the law, some referre to the mercy of God, some to his severity and iustice. They which thinke that by these wordes is commended the mercy of God, do say that God is so good and mercifull, & he will not straight way destroy a man when he sinneth, but rather will tary for his repentance. Therefore sometimes when he spareth the father which hath sinned, yet he punisheth the child, and sometimes when he spareth both the father and the childe, he punisheth the chilles childe: sometimes also he differeth the punishments vnto the fourth generation. As we see came to passe in Jehu kyng of Samaria. For although he himselfe greuously sinned, yet God toke not away the kingdome from his posteritie, but after the fourth generation. Wherefore it seemeth, that by these wordes is set forth the godnes of God, which so long restraineth his anger, nether doth straight way poure it out. But others thinke that the godnes of God is set forth, when it is sayd that he will do good vnto those that loue him euen to a thousande generations. But contrarily, that his severity and iustice should be known, it is added, that he will visite sinnes, not only vpon them which haue sinned, but also vpon their children, and childrens children, euen vnto the fourth generation. And this they declare by examples. For Amalek had done many evils vnto the Israelites, wandring as strangers through the desert: & a long time after his posterity wer afflicted of the Israelites, and so afflicted, that at the last God commaunded Saul vtterly to destroy euery one of the. Jezebel also the seruant of Baalzebub, because he had in his maisters name name receined money of Naaman the Sirian, was both hymselfe stricken with leprosy, and also all hys posteritie for ever. Either of these sentences is godlye: and maye be confirmed by examples. Whobeyt the latter seemeth better to agree with the texte. But how God visiteth the iniquity of the fathers vpon the children vnto the third and fourth generation, the lawe it selfe sufficiently declareth. For it is added. Of them that hate me. whereby it appeareth, that no other children shall beare the sinnes of theyr elders, but those which haue bene like vnto theyr parentes. For if they depart from theyr wickednes, they shal not beare theyr sinnes. But this is to be noted, that, To hate God, may be take two manner of waies: ether in acte (as they speake) which agreth only with those that are of full age, or in pynesse and vice already contracted in nature: which hath place in infantes. But some will object, If we vnderstand that God pnnissheth those onlye, which imitate the sinnes of theyr parentes, what needeth this addition, vnto the third and fourth generation: when as he will perpetually punishe all sinners what soeuer they be. Augustine was so moued with this obiection, that he sayd, that by this forme of speaking, vnto the third and fourth generation, is vnderstand the whole posterity: for in it a determinate number is vsed for an infinite. For if a man adde 4. to 3. then is it the number of 7. Which is vsed to be put for any other number. After the same manner he sayth it is wrytten in Amos the Prophet, ouer three euills and ouer fower, I will not conuert him. And he sayth, that this is the meaning of that place: If a man transgresse once or twise, God can forgeue hym: but if a man heape sinnes vpon sinnes, and so procede vnnaturally, then God can not forgeue hym. Here 3. and 4. sinnes are put for a continuation of sinnes. So God may be sayd to pnnishe euen to the third and fourth generation of them which hate him: when as he will punishe all such whatsoeuer they be. But it may be answered otherwise, that God there fore hath determined the third and fourth generation, to shew that his anger is moderate, and ioyned with lenity: sometimes to stave from punishment, and to go no farther in punishing. Although there are others which thinke, that the third and fourth generation is expessedly put, because euen to that time the posterity are peradventure entised to sinne by the euill example of theyr great grandfather: for none of the elders liue past that, for for most part after the fourth generation they no longer liue. By these thinges we se, that the words of the Prophet are nothing repugnant vnto the lawe, but doe rather interpret it. For he therfore sayth, that the child shall not beare the iniquity of the father, because the lawe sayth, that he visiteth the iniquity of the fathers vpon the children, if they also imitate the sins of theyr parentes: that when they are punished, they should vnderstand, that they are punished for theyr owne sinnes, and not for the sinnes of theyr parentes. But it is sayd, that God therfore pnnissheth the sinnes of the fathers in them, because the sinnes began in them, and were continued vnto the children. And if the child had not had fathers or grandfathers, which had so sinned, peradventure God had yet still withheld his anger: and euen as by his patience he bare with theyr elders, so also peradventure he had borne with them. But so much as both theyr elders haue sinned, and theyr also depart not from theyr example, God will no longer differ the punishment, lest he should seme to haue cast off the care of worldly thinges, and so other men should sinne more securely. Whobeyt in the meane time, they which are so punished can not be called innocent, when as they themselves also doe hate God, neither is that repugnant to these thinges, which Christ spake in John concerning the man that was borne blind, Neither hath this man sinned nor his parentes. For the meaning of that place is not, that that blinde man was punished without desert. But only this is noted, that the prouidence of God had directed that fault of his eyes to an other end, then that the blinde man should be punished. For God would vse that occasion to illustrate the deuinity of Christ. So god distributeth paynes not only by them to punishe sinnes, but also for other entes which he hath vnto himself appointed. And thus much concerning that place of the prophet: whereby may be manifestly sene that it neither repugneth with the lawe, nor yet

They beare the iniquity of their parentes which haue also themselves hated God. To hate God is taken two manner of waies.

The number of seven is put for any other number.

with the definition by vs alledged. Yea rather the same sentence is to be returned agaynste our aduersaries, which affirme that children are guiltye of an other mans sinne.

The next reason was, that forasmuch as both the soule and the body are the workes of God, and the parentes are oftentimes holy, and godly, and are commended in the scriptures, and the worke of generation, and matrimony are praysed, how among so many aydes of innocency sin hath crept in: First we aunswere with Paul, that it crept in by one man. And whereas they saye that the parentes are cleane and holy it is bitterly untrue. For although they be endued with piety, and originall sinne (as touching the guiltynes) is forgiven vnto them, yet there still remaineth in them a corrupt nature, and an impure condition. Wherefore such a nature as they haue in themselves, such I say do they deliuer vnto their posterity, and that (as it is sayd) by seede, and generation.

Neither doth this any thing hinder, that some imagine that the body can not preuaile agaynst the spirite. For we say not, that the soule is corrupted of the body by a naturall action. But forasmuch as the body is corrupt, it resisteth the soule: and the soule not being confirmed with those giftes, which it had at the beginning, obeyeth the inclination thereof, neither gouerneth it (as it were) mete it should) but is gouerned of it. Further phisicall or naturall reasons teach vs, that there is a naturall agreement betwene the body and soule: for the soule is diuersly affected according vnto the temperature of the body. For they which abound with choler, or melancholy, are commonly angry or heauy of mynde. Wherefore forasmuch as this kinde of reasoning proceedeth of false principles, it can conclude nothing.

Further they alledged a place out of the first epistle to the Corinthians: Your children are holy. Wherefore it is not probable that they haue contracted originall sinne: for holines agreeth not with sinne. Some expounde that sentence thus, namely, that the children of Christians are holy as touching a ciuill consideration: namely, for that they are to be counted for legitimates, and not for bastards. But that is not sufficiente. For by that meanes the matrimonye of Christians, shoulde in nothinge excell the matrimonye of Infidelles: for they children also borne in lawfull matrimonye, are legitimate, and are made heires. Other expound holynes for a godly education. For if the godly yoke fellow should depart from the vngodly, peradventure the children should be left with the vngodly, and so be led away from Christ: but if they dwell together, the godly parent will euery in skill some piety into the children. But this exposition also semeth not to make much to the purpose of Paul: for a godly education may happen also vnto the which are born in adultery, or fornication. Which thing we see came to passe in Theodatus the son of Augustine. Wherefore the Apostle semeth rather to signifie, that some holynes redoundeth from godly parentes into their children: which yet dependeth not of the fleshe, but of the promise geuen in the covenant. For God promised Abraham, that he would not only be his God, but also the God of his seede. Wherefore God in the prophetes calleth the infants of the Jewes his, and complayneth that his sonnes and daughters were sacrificed vnto Moloch. And we in the hope of this promise, do offer our infants vnto the Church to be baptised, because they pertaine vnto God and vnto Christ: that the promise which we haue now spoken of might be confirmed with some outward seale. But thou wilt say: thou mayst be deceived: for that peradventure thy sonne doth not pertaine to the number of the elect. Hereunto I answer that the like difficulty is there in those that be of full age: for it may be, that a man professeth faith with a fayned hart, or may be led only by humane perswasion, or may haue but a faith for a time, so that in very dede he pertaineth not vnto the elect. But these thinges the minister regardeth not, but only considereth the confession, which he that is to be baptised professeth: and will say, that the election of God is hidden vnto him: therefore is he not carefull thereof, he can appoynt nothing of perticular thinges: but only to considereth the generall promise: from which although many are excluded, yet longeth it not to him, to define who they are. So Paul speaketh of the Jewes: If the roote be holy, the branches also shalbe holy: if the first fruite be holy, the conspersi- on or masse also shalbe holy. By which wordes he declareth, that the loue of God was bent vnto the Jewes because of the promise, and for their fathers sake: and for that cause saluation was due vnto them. Although therefore this pro- mise be indefinite, and many are excluded from it, yet neuertheless it remaineth unshaken and firme. For alwayes some of them are conuerced vnto Christ and shalbe conuerted euen vnto the ende of the world. Which thing is manifest in Isaake: vnto whose seede although God promised he would be mercifull, yet that promise took place only in Jacob & not in Esau. And yet was that no cause, why Esau should not be circumcised. So we graunt, that the children of Chri- stians, which pertaine vnto the election of God are holy: but yet they are spot- ted with originall sinne: because by nature they are the children of wrath, as others are. And if God do put away the guiltines, and impute it not vnto them to the ende they may be saved, that cometh vnto them of the grace of God, & of his mere mercy, & not of the purities of their nature. Seeing therefore they are borne of a corrupt masse, and also they pertaine vnto the number of the e- lect, we affirme ether: both that they are holy, and that also by nature they are the children of wrath. Wherefore it plainely appeareth how this argumente may be dissolved.

But they adde moreover that in infantes is found nothing spoken, done, or thought against the lawe of God, and therefore they haue no sinne at all. How slowly they are herein deceaued, plainely appeareth by those thinges whiche we haue already sayd. For this is as much, as if they should thus reason & say. They haue no actuell sin: Ergo, they haue no sin. For to reason fro the species to the generall word by a negatiu, is an ill kinde of reasoning. But they are deceaued, for that they follow not the vniuersall nature or definition of sinne: whiche we haue so before described, that it comprehendeth all thinges that are by any meanes repugnant vnto the lawe of God.

They object also, that it is not wel sayd, that originall sinne is spred abrode by the seede and fleshe, because they haue an insensible and brutish nature, and therefore can not receaue sinne. But we haue already taught, that sinne is not in them but by inchoation as in the roote. But then the nature of sinne is sin- thed, when the soule is now toynd to it.

We haue declared also, what is to be answered vnto the Pelagians, when they contend, that these thinges which Paul speaketh in this place, ought to be vnderstand as touching imitation. For first that can not stand with all the say- inges of the Apostle. For he sayth, that all men haue sinned, and that by the disobe- dience of one man, many were made sinners: and (which is more firme) he hath pro- ued, that therefore sinne was in the world before the lawe, because death reigned from Adam euen vnto Moses. There are also other reasons which Augustine vseth a- gainst the Pelagians, which are not needfull now to be repeated.

Farther they adde, that humane afflictions, and death it selfe are naturall: for they haue in vs principles of nature from whence they do flowe. But here- vnto we answere, that these principles were not so framed, when the nature of man was first instituted: but they were afterward vitiated and corrupted, as we now see they are. The philosophers resolue the effectes which they see, into these principles which are now extant: but Christians do rather resolue them into the word of God. Seeing therefore that the scripture teacheth, that death en- tred through sin, and that man as he was created mought haue liued alwayes, let Pighius and they which follow him beware, how truly and godly they as- firme, that death happeneth vnto man by nature.

They adde also, that that ought not to be counted sinne, which cannot be a- uoyded: but this is hereby proued to be false, because the lawe is set forth vnto vs, which yet no man can absolutely perforce, or auoyde all the faultes committed against it. In examining of finnes we ought not to looke, whether any thing be done by chance or by necessity: but whether it be repugnant or agree-ble with the lawe of God. By this balance ought sinne to be weighed. Wherefore it is light and triuing, which they bring against vs concerning necessity.

Lastly they object vnto vs, that if the sinne of the first parentes be deriued into the posterity, there can be no reason geuen, why the finnes also of the other parentes should not be traduced after the same maner into the posterity. Which thing if we graunt, they thinke that that will followe whiche is most absurde, namely, that our estate is most miserable, which are borne in this latter time: for in vs should be deriued not only the finnes of our first parentes, but also of all our elders. The scholemen thought that it is not possible, that the finnes of the next parentes should passe into the children. And it seemeth that they were led thereunto, chiefly by two reasons. Of which the first is: that the next parentes do communicate vnto their children only nature, and such other thinges, which of themselves do followe nature: but as for singular conditions and accidents they communicate not them vnles peraduenture they pertaine vnto the body. For oftentimes diseases of the parentes, as the leprosy or gont, do come vnto the children. But the qualities of the minde are not propagated, neither pertaine they to procreation: for a Grammarian begetteth not a Grammarian, nor a Philosopian a Philosopher. Wherefore soasmuch as finnes pertaine vnto the minde, they say that they can not be propagated from the parentes. The other reason is:
The first parentes had originall iustice: which consisted not only in the minde, but also in the body, and in the members. Therefore in doing the acte of generation, they might poure into their children the want of this righteousness, for that it sticketh in the body, and in the flesh. But actual finnes, which after ward followed, soasmuch as they pertaine vnto the minde, can not be propagated into the children. Wherof Augustine in his Encheridion to Laurentius the 46. chap. sayth, that it is probable, that the finnes also of the next parentes are communicated with the children. For the profe wherof, he compareth together two places of the scripture, which we haue before entreated of: What God sayth: that he will visite the sins of the fathers vpon the children vnto the third and fourth generation: where in an other place he saith, that the sonne shall not beare the iniquity of the father. If the sonne (saith he) beare not the iniquity of his father, but his owne, and yet God visiteth in him the sin of the father, it must needs be that the sonne haue in himselfe that sinne: Otherwise these places should not agree together. Sinne therefore is of his owne nature such, that it not only wasteth the soule of man, but also corrupteth the body, flesh and members.

Wherefore Paul to the Corinthians sayth, that our bodies are the Temples of the holy ghost: and greuously threateneth that man which destroyeth the temple of God: If therefore God punish the finnes of the parentes in the children, and the child beareth not an other mans iniquity, but his owne only, it consequently followeth, that the finnes of wicked men, when they are afflicted, to the end they fathers should be punished in them, haue also in themselves some of they fathers wickednes. Neither can any man here complayne of the iustice of God. For if God by his most incorrupt Justice can deliuer the which sin, into a reprobate sence, & punish sins with sins, why may he not also iustly will, that the corruption of sinne should not only destroy the soule, but also that the impurities thereof should rebound likewise into the body: Wherefore they which are begotten of sinners, do contract of them such a nature, as they finde in them. And by this sentence men are admonished, to liue holily, lest they should pollute both they owne soules and bodies, and also by the same meanes infect they children. If this should be so as we haue now sayd, a man might demaund, what difference there is betwene originall sin, & that which is drawen from the next parentes: We answer that the propagation of original sinne is perpetuall, as the holy scriptures do teach: but the continuacion of other finnes is not of necessity. For sometimes there is powred no sinne from the next parentes into the children, vnles it be originall sinne. For God seemeth to haue prefixed a measure, least euill should rainge abrode vnmearably, & seemeth to temperate the propagation of this euill. And this experience teacheth: for Ezechias a most holy prince had to his parent king Achaz, a man most wicked: and the same Ezechias agayne begat Ammon a very vngodly sonne, who also begat Manasses farre worse then himselfe. Yet though the beginnings and principles of sinnes be pouered from the parentes into the children, yet God will sometimes minister so much grace, fauor, and strength, that they may overcome them. But this way these differ nothing from originall sinne. For vnto godly men is geuen grace also to overcome it. Farther when God geueth good children of euill parents, he declareth the powre of his goodnes, whereby he repelleth the filthines and corruption of the parentes: that it should not flowe abrode into the children. And contrariwise when he causeth euill children to be borne of good parentes, this he considereth that the holynes of the children should not be ascribed vnto the merites of the parentes. For they can not by procreation of the body poure grace into the children: soasmuch as it is a thing altogether spirituall, itether hath it any naturall fellowship with the flesh. Wherefore soasmuch as goodnes & holynes are the mere and pure giftes of God, God doth in dede promise that he will do good vnto the posterity of godly men, euen to a thousand generations. But that is not to be vnderstand, as though there were put any merit in the parentes. God was of his mercy moued to make this promise, and not by the merites of men. And to declare his liberty herein, he suffereth it sometimes to happen otherwise, and by that meanes teacheth, that holy parentes are not so holy, but that they haue still much wickednes and corruption in them, which they may se to be naturally grafted in theyr children. Whereby we may manifestly se the corruption of our nature, which also followeth the sayntes euen to the death. And for the more establishing also of this sentence, some bring out of the Psalme a curse of the Church agaynst the children of the vngodly: That they shoulde be orphanes, that no man shoulde haue compassion on them, that they shoulde begge theyr liuinge. If the children of the vngodly be innocents, then is this no iust prayer. Wherefore it seemeth by these wordes of necessity to follow, that they are partakers of the wickednes of their parentes. And bicause they are infantes, it can by no other meanes be done, but by propagation. I know there are some, which will haue these wordes of Dauid to be propheties of thinges to come: wherein the holy ghost hath foretold, that these misfortunes shall come vnto them. But graunt that they be propheties. Yet can it not be denied, but that there is in them both the foyme & the effect of a prayer. But a prayer ought to be iust, for otherwise it should be no prayer. But where as they say, that that is most absurd, which followeth of this doctrine (namely, that the last men also should be more miserable then all others, bicause they should beare the synnes both of Adam, & also of all their elders) it may be answered two maner of wayes. For first not all thinges which seme absurd vnto vs, are also absurd before God. For (not to depart from this selfe same matter) Christ threatneth the Iewes, that all the murder of the godly, from Abell euen to Zacharias, the sonne of Barachias, should come vpon them. And who saith not, that the estate of the children of Israel which were led away into captiuitie, was much more miserable, then very many generations of their elders, which had defiled themselves with the selfe same sins. Farther we aunswer, that that should in dede be absurd, if the sinnes of the elders should continually passe into the children. But seying we haue declared, that that is not alwayes so, but that the prouidence of God hath appointed an end and measure vnto this euill, and hath therfore determinately pronounced onely of the third and fourth generation, there is no cause why it should seme absurd vnto any man. But the reasons of the scholemen wherewith they withstand this propagation are very weake. First they alledge that the qualities of the minde are not communicated from the parentes vnto the children, which thing euen experience teacheth to be false. For we see oftentimes, that of angry persons are borne angry children:

and of sad parentes sad children. Neither doth this similitude serue the to any purpose, when they say, that of a Grammarian is not borne a Grammarian, nor of a Musician, a Musician. For these are artes which are gotten by precepts and exercise: not affections, which are naturally grafted in men. And yet by experience we see that it somtymes commeth to passe, that in what arte a father chiefly excelleth, he hath children very prone vnto the same: whether it be husbandry, or artes of warfare, or els some liberall science. Farther, we in this place principally speake of those affections, which are the groundes and beginninges of actions. In the other argument they say, that sinne in the parentes doth vitiate only the soule, which is not true. For as we haue before taught, their body is also defiled. And therefore it is no meruaile, if fathers do communicate such a body vnto their children. Wherefore, as touching this matter, I gladly agree with Augustine, that it is probable and agreeable with the scriptures (and this sentence Martin Bucer a man no lesse learned then holy hath allowed) that priuate sinnes are deriued from the parents vnto the children. But we must note, that that commeth by chaunce and is not of necessity. For God sometimes stayeth the sinnes of the parentes, and of his goodness suffereth not the nature of men utterly to be destroyed. But when he will either repress this traditio of sins, or els suffer it to take place, he himself only knoweth. Howbeit vnto vs it is sufficient to consider these two things: First, that sinne is poured from the parentes into the children: Secondly, that the same is by the benefite of God sometimes prohibited, which yet can by no meanes be spoken of Originall sin. For we al are borne infected with it. Now let vs retorne vnto the words of the Apostle, which we haue so long tyme intermitted.

fieth both soule and body.

Moreover the lawe entred in by the way, that sinne shoulde abounde. But where sinne abounded, there grace abounded muche more. That euen as sinne hath raigned in death, so might grace also raigne by righteousnes vnto eternall life, through Iesus Christ.

The Me-thode of Paule.

Moreover the law entred in by the way, that sinne should abounde. But where sinne abounded, there grace abounded much more. We muste call to memory that the Apostle began to reuerse the effectes of iustification: namely, that by it we haue peace with God: and that we do reioyce, not onely because of the hope of that glorie, but also we reioyce in tribulations, because we are assured of oure saluation. For the confirmation of whiche hope he hath declared, that God hath geuen his sonne vnto the deathe, and that when we were yet sinners, enemies & vngodly. And that it should not be obscure, by what meanes the righteousness of Christ could saue vs, he sheweth by a comparison, that euen as by the sinne of Adam, all men haue perished, so by Christ, all men haue reuined. And in this comparison he teacheth that the effect of sinne is death: And that men are deliuered from it only by Christ. Now because a man might aske, whether the law hath any thing profited to the attayntment of that saluation, he answereth by preuention, that it rather augmented the disease, so farre was it of that it could deliuer men from it. And by the way he beateth downe the pride of the Iewes, for that they importunately boasted of the Law, as though it onely could make a man blessed. And it is certayne, that by the name of Lawe, he vnderstandeth not, the Law of nature, but that law which was geuen by Mose: amongest other endes whereof this was one, that by it sinne shoulde be augmented: that it being aboue measure augmented, grace also might exceedingly much more abound. Howbeit this is to be noted, that these increases of sinne happened not through the default of the law, but of men. For if the law had lighted vpon sound natures, and a nature confirmed, sound actions should thereof haue sprung. But so much as our mindes are full of diseases, and our nature weak, it followeth of necessity (as Paul sayth) that when the lawe cometh, sinne is increased. For euen as horses with shadowes and thinges, that they are not accustomed vnto, are so made afeard that oftentimes they run backward, and throw themselves headlong into ditches and rivers: so we when we light vpon the commandments of God, do leape backe, and do rather throw our selues in to the dungeon of our lustes, then that we will obey the law. Chrysostome thinketh that this particle, quia, which is, that, in this place is not a conunction causall: but noteth onely the euent of the thing: which we also graunt, if it be referred vnto the nature of the law. For, so much as it of his owne nature is good, it cannot be said, that of it self it augmenteth sinne. But if we haue a consideration vnto the counsell of God, wherfore he gaue the law. I see not why that particle may not be taken causally. For it is not to be doubted, but that God therfore gaue the law, to the ende sinne should be augmented. And lest it should seeme absurd to ascribe that vnto the prouidence of God, we say that God hath many endes, all which are ordinate: and therfore we ought not to stay in one or two of them, but to go on farther. For euen the prouidence of God directeth such endes to other endes, which follow. Wherfore we cannot thus gather: God hath geuen the law: ergo, sinne simply and of hys owne nature pleaseth him: but we must streight way adde (which Paul also doth) sinne beyng increased, grace hath more abounded: and man hath obtained righteousness and eternall lyfe. So may we rightly conclude, that the law was therfore geuen, that man might at the last be saued thorough grace. Which thing may be declared by an other example: when it is said, that by the prouidence of God it is ordeyned that murther should be punished with death, we cannot therby gather that God is cruell, as one which delighteth in death, because he will haue death reuenged with death. But we must procede farther, and say, that it was therfore ordeined, that a murderer should be put to death, to the ende the severity of the iustice of God might appeare, and that man being so admonished, might restraîne themselves from so wicked a crime. Paul saith, in the singular number sinne, alluding to y corruption of our nature, which, the law beyng once put, so increaseth, that it breaketh forth into innumerable evil workes. By which kynd of speech that is manifest, which we haue before said: namely, that the law is repugnant vnto naturall lust.

But by that which Paul sayth: that the Law entred in by the way. Chrysostom gathereth, that it ought not to be perpetuall, but ought so long to continue, untill sinne being increased, grace should abound. And this in dede is after a maner true: for as touching the ten commandmentes in men regenerate in Christ, and adoynd with grace (in respect that they are such) they haue no power to accuse and condemne: and as touching ceremonies that part of the law is now utterly abrogated, yea, and the politicall iudgementes are not now in theyr olde force. But Ambrose weigheth these wordes (entred in by the way) more diligently and thinketh that thereby is signified, that the law was so receiued, as though men supposed that by it they shoulde be saued: for thus they thought, that if they once knew, what thinges were to be done, they would easily accomplishe them. But the thing happened farre otherwise. And Ambrose addeth, If the lawe did therefore enter in by the way, that sinne should abound, a man may iudge that it was not geuen, that sinne should not abound: howbeit on the other side it was necessary, because the lawe of nature was after a sort extinct and quenched in men. For it was so febled (saith he) that man could not performe their duty. That therefore the law of nature might receaue some strength, & be maintained, the law of God came: which hath not only confirmed it, but also with a most manifest exposition illustrated it. But now we ought to apply our endeuor vnto the law geuen vs and diligently to entreate of it, & to meditate vpon it day and night. We haue the like kind of speech in the epistle vnto the Galatians: The lawe was geuen because of transgression. Now let vs see by what meanes sinne is augmented by the lawe. First we must know, that this is the nature of our lust, that it can not be kepte vnder by the commandmentes of God: yea rather it is stirred vp by them. Whereof came this accustomed sayinge, Nitimus in vetitum semper, cupimusq; negata, which signifieth, we labour alwayes for that which is forbidden vs, and euer desire thinges denied vs. And euen as ri-

He that sin-

uers being otherwise quiet and calme inough, yet when they runne against a rooke or heape of stones, do swell and rage, and as it were gathering together their force more vehemently, drive and carry away all lettes: So our lustes, while they are prohibited by the lawes and decrees of God, are more inhibitedly and insolently stirred up, and do as it were by a certaine fury carry vs headlong into transgressions. And so by reason of his contrary, lust may be saide to be en-creased, when the brydle of the lawe is put vpon it. Wherefore Cicero in his oration for Roscius Amerinus saith, that Solon in his lawes ordained nothing touching murderers of parentes, because, soasmuch as that wicked crime had neuer before happened, he feared, leasse if he shoulde haue made a lawe thereof, he shoulde rather haue stirred vp men thereunto, then repressed them therefro. An other way also the lawe increaseth sinne, because he which sinneth knowing and wittingly, is more grievously to be accused, then he which sinneth vnawares. The lawe of nature was nowe so decayed, that it wincked at many thinges. For many counted lust for no sinne: yea rather they seemed happy, which could obtaine that which they lusted for. But when this voyce sounded from heauen, thou shalt not lust, man began to consider that lust was vnhonest and filthy. Wherefore when he endeoured to strue against it, being destitute of strength (as Augustine saith) he found not a victory, but captiuitie.
For he saw now that he was a bondslave vnto it. Farther, sinne is therefore increased by the lawe, because in it we see paynes and punishments set forth vnto sinners. Whereby it cometh to passe, that men hauing their conscience accusing them, leape backe from God, as fro a seuerer iudge, and cruell reuenger. And when they haue begon once to hate him, they rather throwe theselues hedlong into any euil, then that they will light vpon him. Fourthly, Chrysostome saith, that the lawe of nature containeth a few and certayne bryefe preceptes, which are amplified by the lawe of God: For that it hath deuided those fewe into many partes, whereby is augmented a heape of preceptes. And because vnto euery commaundement his proper transgression is repugnant, therefore sinnes may seeme also to be increased. Neither doth the lawe by these meanes which we haue alledged, onely increase sinne, but also accuse and condemne it.
Wherefore in the first to the Corinthians he saith, that the lawe is the power of sin, because they which sinne, are by it proued guilty. But these thinges are not so to be vnderstand, as though there had bene no sinne before the lawe. For there was sinne in dede, but it was on sleepe and halfe deade. Wherefore Paul in the 7. chapter of this epistle saith, when the commaundement came, sinne reuiued. Which woords declare, that sinne was also before, although it were not felt. Farther, we must note, that the connerion betwene the law, and the increase of sinne, is vniuersall, and pertaieth vnto all men: but y connerio which is betweens sinne increased, & grace abounding hath not place, but only in the elect and predestinate. For in the reprobate, after sinne was by the law increased, sorrow and griefe which come thereby, engendzeth desperation. For these are not the full causes of saluation, but instruments, by which God bleth to deliuer his. And the nature of instrumentes is, that if a man remoue from them the power of the principal agent, of themselves they bring to passe nothing. God doth in dede vse the law, the feeling of sinne, and terrois of paynes, wherby to prepare a way to iustificatiō. And although before our conuerfion the same be sinnes, yet by them he prepareth our minds: but yet not with that kinde of preparatiō, which the Sophisters haue sayned. For they affirme, that a man by these meanes deserueth grace (as they are accustomed to say) of congruency: which thinge we haue in an other place declared to be repugnant vnto the holy scriptures. But we graunt, that as touching Gods behalfe, there is a preparation: for he bleth these meanes, whereof some are of they owne nature euill, and directeth them to a good end: which ought to be ascribed only to his most wise prouidence. But that grace hath abounded, euen this thing may teache vs, for that the Clea doo

not only obteyne remission of finnes by Christ, but also are adopted to be the children of God, made brethren of Christ, heyres of God, and fellow heires of Christ, and they reioyce also in tribulations, and in the hope of the glory of God. God dealeth as good physicians vnto vs: which doo not only heale the disease, but also doo adde strength and forme, which the sicke man had not before. But it seemeth more agreeable that Paul should haue sayd, that sinne beinge augmented paynes and punishments should haue more abounded, for, that vnsinnes deserue. But he inuerteth his oration, and in steede of paynes and punishments sayth, that grace abounded. Which thing we first fele by our owne experience to be true. For we which were before oppressed with griefe, and in a manner consumed with finnes, when we se our selues to be reconciled vnto God can not but count it for a most singular benefite. For he which hath the more forgiven him, forasmuch as he seleth the greater gift, loueth the more. Farther the common people commonly weigh and esteeme giftes by the consideration of the necessity that went before. Wherefore, forasmuch as sin being increased was after a sort vnmearurable, the grace also which should blot out the same, ought likewise to be in a manner vnmearurable. By this place we may vnderstand, what it is to haue the Gospell preached to me broken & in misery, as it is written in Esaie: and what that is, that Christ called vnto him those which were in trauaile and were laden. For they which fele not themselves to be such, come not vnto him when he calleth them. Here I thinke it good somewhat briefly to speake of the nature of the Law, and therewithall to declare how the Manichees and Pelagians vnderstood it not, and what it worketh in vs either before regeneration, or after we be iustified.

First as touching the forme therof, we may affirme the self same thing that Paul sayth in this epistle, when he writeth, that it is spirituall. But the vnterfall end therof, & which pertaineth vnto all men, is to bring men to the knowledge of sinne. Which thing Paul hath both here signified, and also before manifestly taught, saying, that by the law is the knowledge of sinne. Here if a man aske, why the Apostle sayd not rather, by the law is the knowledge of righteousness: I answer, because a man that is not yet regenerate, so long as he is without Christ can not haue within himselfe the feeling of good workes, or of true righteousness, which satisfieth the law of God. Wherefore when he compareth his doings with the law, he findeth them to be nothing but onely falles and transgressions. But if we speake of the end of the law, as touching the elect, the same is Christ: which thing Paul also teacheth, saying, The end of the law is Christ to saluation: which yet he speaketh not vniuersally, But to eueryone that beleeueth. For the law doth not of it selfe bring a man to this end. The Ethnikes sayd, that the end of the law is knowledge, which it engendreth of thinges that are to be done. Wherefore Christippus (as he is cyted in the digestes, sayth, that the law is the knowledge of thinges diuine and humane. But this end, and this definition extend to largelye. For all wisdom, and all good artes doo geue some knowledge of diuine and humane thinges. Now resteth diligently to se what is the matter and efficient cause of the law. And briefly to speake of these thinges, I say, that the Law is a commandement of God, wherein both his will, and also disposition or nature is expessed. When I say a commandement, I note the generall woordes: For there are commandements of people, Senators, kings & of Emperors. But when I say, of God, I adde the difference, which noteth the efficient cause. But in that I say, that in the law is expessed the will of God, that is so manifest, that it needeth not to be expounded. But this may peraduenture seme more obscure, in that I said, that in the law the disposition of God is taught vs, and we are stirred by to the knowledge of his nature: we will therefore by examples make it more playn. The God commaundeth vs to loue him: he thereby teacheth, that he is of nature amiable. For those thinges cannot iustly be beloued, which are not worthy to be beloued. And vnles he bare great good will toward vs, he would not set forth vnto vs & chiefe god, which we should loue. Wherefore, he for this cause exhorteth vs therunto, because he desireth to haue vs partakers of himselfe. We see therefore, that he is such towarde vs, as he desireth vs to be also. And when he prohibiteth vs to kill: first therein he declareth his will, farther he sheweth himselfe to be such a God, which abhorreth from violence and from iniuries, & had rather do good vnto men, then hurt them. After the same maner these two things may also be declared in the other preceptes: and out of this definition may those things also be gathered, which we haue before spoken concerning the forme and ende of the law, because of necessity such doctrine ought to be both spirituall, and also to engender a wonderfull excellent knowledge, and we are taught, that God by it hath geuen no small benefite vnto men: for it causeth vs, both to know our selues, and also to vnderstand the proprieties of God. Plato in his booke of lawes of a publike wealth, and in Minos, seemeth thus to define the lawe: namely, that it is an byghte manner of gouerning, which by conuenient meanes directeth vnto the best ende, in setting forth paynes vnto the transgressors, and rewarde vnto the obedient. This definition may be most aptly applied vnto the law of God: yea there can be no such law vntles it be of God. It is no meruaile therefore, if the olde lawgeuers, when they would haue their lawes commended, fained some God to be the authoꝝ of them. For Minos ascribed his lawes to Iupiter: Licurgus his to Apollo: Solon and Draco, theirs to Minerva: and Numa Pompilius referred his vnto Egeria. But we are assured, and that by the holy scriptures, that our law was geuen of God by Moses in mount Syna. And these things beyng thus sene concerning the nature and definition of the law, we may easily vnderstand, how sololy the Manichies erred, which blasphemed it, and cursed it as euill. For seying that the law commandeth nothing but things woꝝthy to be commaunded, and prohibiteth nothing, but things mete to be prohibited, how can it iustly be accused? For there can be no iust or honest duety found, which is not commended in the law of God: noꝝ nothing filthy or vn honest, which in it is not forbidden: neither are wicked actes onely prohibited in the law, but also wicked lustes are there condemned. Wherefore it sheweth that not onely outward woꝝkes are to be corrected, but also the mynd and will. And sozasmuch as a great part of felicitie consisteth in the knowledge of God: and Philosophers do so much extoll the knowledge of our selues: and the law of God, as we haue taught, performeth either, it can not but with great wickednes be repproued as euill and hurtful. Howbeit this place wherein it is sayd, That the law entred in, that sinne should abound, may seme to make somewhat with the Manichies: as doth that also vnto the Galathians. That the law was put for transgressions, and that also in the 7. chap. of this epistle, That sinne through the commaundement killeth: and that likewise which is sayd in the second epistle to the Corint: That the law is the ministry of death. All these things may seme to confirme the erroꝝ of the Manichies. But we must diligently put a differre betwene those things, which of themselves pertaine vnto the law, and those things which follow it by reason of an other thing, & per accidens, that is, by chaunce. For as we haue before taught, sinne, death, damnation, and other such like do spring of the law, by reason of the corruption of our nature. But if a man compare not the law with our nature, but consider it by it selfe, or if he referre it to a sound & vncorrupt nature, then can he affirme nothing els of it, then that which Paul sayth: Namelye, that it is spirituall, holpe, good and instituted vnto lyfe: and it is said rather to shewe synne, then to woꝝke synne. Wherefore if men deformed lying hidde in the darke shoulde saye vnto a man whiche by chaunce byngeth a lyghte vnto them: gette the hence leaſt by this thy light thou make vs deformed, vndoubtedly we could not gather by their woꝝdes, that the power and nature of light is such, that it doth make men deformed but this we might rather gather, that those things which of themselves are deformed, are by the light vttered and shewed what they be. And so is it of the lawe: for it after a maner byngeth light, and openeth to our knowledge the sinnes, which before lay hidde. But a man will say: if the law be be good and holy, why is it so displeasing, and had in hatred? Because it calleth men backe from those thinges, which of their owne nature they are prone vnto: for it grueneth them to haue those thinges forbidden them. And when we looke vpon the lawe, we see those thinges which we ought to do: and by reason of the pride which is naturally placed and grafted in vs, we will not be restrained by any rules. Farther thereby we see how our actions are withered from that brightness, which is set forth in the lawe: and which is more grieuous, we feele our selues to be so weak, that we can not correct them, and call the backe to the prescribed rule: howbeit in the meane while we behold the paines and anger of God, whereinto by reason of sinnes we incurr. All these thinges do so offend our minde, that we are angry, not indeede with our selues, and with our sinnes (as it were mete we shoulde) but with the lawe geuen of God: when as otherwise it is most perfect, and most holy. Howbeit this discomfort may be remedied, and we may bring to passe, that those thinges which before were displeasing vnto vs, may afterward be pleasant vnto vs. And that shall we do, if we ioyne the lawe together with Christ. For euen as the waters of Marah were most bitter vnto the people of Israel in the desert, and yet the selfe same by casting in the wood, which God had commaunded, were made sweete: So although the lawe by it selfe be bitter, yet if Christ be ioyned with it, whom God hath set forth vnto vs as an only sancto, and also as the last and due ende thereof, we shall then feele it to be sweete. Which thing to haue happened vnto David, the 119 Psalme manifestly declareth, wherein are wonderfully set forth the prayes of the lawe of God. For there it is called pleasant, delectable, sweete aboue hony and the hony combe. And this is it which is promised vs in the prophete, that God would write the lawe in our hartes: which is nothing els, but that he will geue vnto vs the spirite of Christ, whereby we may be inclined to those thinges, which the lawe hath commaunded to be done, that at the least way the commaundementes of God shoulde be pleasant to our minde. Which thing also the Apostle teacheth, when he saith, In minde I serue the lawe of God. This they that are regenerate do fele, who although they can not performe a perfect obedience vnto the commaundementes of God, yet they love them, and exceedingly desire them, and embrace them as the chiefe good, and do diligently desire of God, to come to the perfection of them as nigh as is possible. By these thinges it plainly appeareth, how the vtility and righteousness of the lawe is to be defended against the Manichies. But on the other side the Pelagians are no les to be annoyed, which ascribe vnto the lawe more then is mete: for they affirme it to be sufficient vnto saluation. For they say, that if men once vnderstand, what is to be done they may easely by the power of nature performe the same. Wherefore Pelagius, for feare least he shoulde haue bene condemned of the Bishoppes of Palestine, as one which utterly denied the grace of God, confessed the same grace in word: for he affirmed, that to our saluation the grace of God is necessary. But by grace he vnderstode nothing els, but nature it selfe geuen vs freely of God, because God hath made vs reasonable, and endued vs with free will. Farther he saide, that the lawe or doctrine of the lawe was grace: because of our selues we are ignorant what thinges are to be done or to be beleued, vntill God reuele them vnto vs. Wherefore Augustine writeth in his booke of the grace of Christ against Celestius, that they with mouth affirme that the possibility of nature is holpen by grace: But he addeth, that if their meanings were examined, and narrowly weighed then shall we see that by grace, doctrine and the lawe, they vnderstand nothing els, but that a man, hauing receaued only the knowledge of the lawe hath of himselfe strength enough to do the thinges that are commaunded. Vnto which error the schoole deuines approach very nye, when they teach, that a man euen by the power of nature, can obserue the preceptes of God, as touching the substance of the worke, although not according to the intent of the commaundment. By which words this they signifie, that we can performe the very worke, although not in such sort, as God hath hath commanded they should be done, namely, of charity & the spirit. Which latter part I thinke they added, that they might seme in some point to disagree from the Pelagians. But Augustine so abhorred from such sentences, that not euen vnto the regenerate so long as they live in this flesh be graunted a perfect obseruation of the commaundementes of God: whiche thing manifestly appeareth by his Retractions. And that his iudgement therein is most true, Paule declareth in the 7. chap. of this epistle. Undoubtedly if the thing were so as Pelagius hath taughte, the coming of Christ and sacrifice of the crosse had bene nothing needefull. For these thinges were therefore geuen, bycause by our owne strengths we could not attayne vnto the righteousness of woorkes. That thing Paul most manifestly testifieth, saying, That which was impossible vnto the law, forasmuch as it was weakened by the flesh &c. These wordes apertly declare, that man by reason of the infirmity of the flesh could not fulfill the law. Farther he saith, The wisdom of the flesh is enmity to wards God, for it is not subject vnto the law of God, neither certainly can it be. For although the law hath power to teach and to illustrate the minde, yet it doth not therefore minister strength, or change the will. Wherefore Ambrose in his booke de fuga seculi, The law (saith he) can stop the mouth of all men: but yet it can not conuert the minde. And after ward: The law indeed sheweth the fault, but it taketh not away the malice. Wherefore vnto it must be adioyned grace: which forasmuch as the Pelagians contemned, they wandred from salvation, & were iustly condemned of the Church. But as touching the office of the law, these few thinges are to be obserued. First that it is not utterly vnprofitable, no not euen without regeneration: for it may serue to some ciuile discipline. For if men do the outward woorkes of the law in such sort as they may, although vnto them which do them, they are sinnes, yet by the may be obserued a ciuile order. For where there is no obseruation of these thinges, all thinges are confounded: iniuries are committed: filchy lust rageth abroad: the wrath of God is kindled, so that he suffereth not publike welthes being in such manner corrupt very long to continue. There is also an other woork of the lawe which is inward, which pertayneth vnto the conscience: that it should perpetually accuse, bidge, scourge, and condemne it. And by this meanes God (as we haue sayd) bringeth a man at the length to iustification. Which iustification being obteyned, neither then doth the law lye idle, but is like a glasse, wherein the regenerate do behold what fruites they ought to bring forth, how much they ought dayly to profite, what they haue to geue thanks for, and how much they want of the full satisfaction, to tend to obtaine it they may the more earnestly call vpon God: The law also putteth before they eyes a marke, wherunto they ought to leuel in all theyr actions. Vnto which although they can not attayne in this life, yet they must doo theyr diligence, not to depart far from it. By these thinges it manifestly appeareth how much the law helpeth in outward woorkes, what it woorketh in the conscience, and how much it helpeth them that are regenerate. Now resteth this to marke, that this sentence of the Apostle pertayneth not only to ceremonies, but also to the moral preceptes. For sinne is by them most chiefly increased: and it is of more greater wayght to stray from them, then from outward ceremonies. But now let vs returne vnto the Apostle. That euen as sinne hath raigned in death, so might grace also raigne by righteousness vnto eternall life through Iesus Christ. Here he sheweth a reason, why grace in the elect, after the increases of sinne abounded: namely, that by it we should obteyne righteousness, and so at the length come to eternall life. For euen as sinne brought death, so grace also and righteousness, which must be ioyned together, haue brought eternall life. The argument is taken of contraries. For seeing that sinne, which is opposite vnto righteousness, brought death, it is meete, that of grace and righteousness should followe life. Neyther is it inwayne that righteousness is ioyned wth grace. For thereby we are taught that our righteousness consisteth not of woorkes, but of grace. The wonderfull bestfull order also of thynges is here to be noted. In the first place is put the lawe, then the increase of sinne, and then the abundance of grace, afterward righteousness, last of all eternall life: and all these thynges, by Iesus Christ. As touching the woordes, sinne is sayd to haue reigned in death, bycause sinne could not be taken away by the lawe, and death was for his cause inflicted as a punishment. In the 1. to Corinth. Paul hath in a manner the selfe same sentence: saying, that the date of death is sinne. For neither could death otherwise wound mankind, but by sinne. Either of them are sayd to reigne, both grace and sinne, when we are moued; and stirred by by them: for in Publike welches kinges reigne and gouerne as it pleaseth them. In godlye men righteousness reigneth: for they after they haue receaued remission of sinnes, study to geue theyr members weapons vnto righteousness, and holines: as befoze they had permitted them to sinne. And this is called the kingdome of Christ: which is therefore ascribed vnto grace, by cause it consisteth freely and without woordes. In this place (as Chrysostome noteth) are set forth vnto vs the routes of death and life. The fountaine of life is grace, and righteousness: the fountaine of death is sinne. And he addeth, that death is like a souldier: whiche is appointed & armed of sin as of his king: wherfore take away the king, & then death being vnarmed can not destroy me for euer. Farther he admonisheth, that forasmuch as haue already obteyned grace, we should not doubt of the obteynement of life. For these thynges cleane of necessity the one to the other. But why the Apostle bringeth this similitude, we may easely shew. Bicause grace was of moze force to make newe agayne, then sinne was of force to kill. And in that it is added, by Iesus Christ, we must call to remembrance the Analogy or proposition set at the beginning betwene Adam and Christ. For euen as from Adam came sinne and death, so from one Iesus Christ came grace and life.

This place admonisheth vs somewhat to speake of grace. Noumes, which (as Logicians say) are put abstractly, are vsually declared by their concrets, whose significations are moze present vnto the sense. Wherfore let vs first see, what this worde Gratiolus, that is gracious, signifyeth with the Latines. And he amongst men is called Gratiolus, whome all men saue, and whome the common people do loue. So in the holy scriptures men are called gracious, which haue found grace with God. For so the scripture bleth to speake of those, whom God saue, and whom he loueth. But yet as touching this, there is great difference betwene God & men. For men saue none, but them in whome they finde those thynges, whereby they may be allured and drawen to loue them. It becometh therefore, that he which will be beloued of men, haue in himselfe the causes of loue and beneuolence. But God contrariwise found in men nothing worthy to be beloued, wherby he mought be led to loue them. For he hath loued vs first: and out of that loue he bestoweth vpon vs whatsoeuer we haue that is acceptable vnto him. Wherfore the name of grace is in holy scriptures taken two manner of wayes: first, and principally it signifyeth the beneuolence of God towarde men, and the free saue which he beareth towarde the elect. Secondly, bicause God endueth his elect with excellent giftes, Grace sometymes signifyeth also those giftes, which are freely bestowed vpon vs by God. This two fold signification of grace beyng well noted, declareth, with how great diuersitie our aduersaries and we affirme one and the selfe same sentence: for either of vs say, that a man is iustified by grace. But in this is the difference. They by the name of Grace vnderstand those giftes, which are geuen vnto them that are iustified: namely, the habites or qualities which are poured into the, moze ouer good woordes and other such like, which God worketh in the elect. But we, forasmuch as we see, that these giftes, so long as we liue here, are through our corruption vnperfect, do deny, that we can by them be iustified, and that by them by any meanes we are able to satisfy the iudgement of God. Wherfore we vnderstande, that to be iustified by grace, is to be iustified by the only mere and sincere good will of God, which he of his only mercy beareth towarde vs. We say also, that we are iustified by the grace of Christ, which his father beareth towarde hym. For, foras-

much as he is most gracious before him, he bringeth to passe that he loneth vs also in him, as his members, and byethen adopted by faith. But the scholemen haue sayned vnto themselves, that grace is an habite or quality poured into the soule, by the soule may more easely rise vp, and more redely do good woorkes. Which they sayned inuention they can by no meanes confirm by the holy scriptures. But they seeme to haue taken it from the philosophers, who in the Ethikes teach that the faculties & powers of the minde are by an habite strengthened, so that they are able to perform those things which before they were not able, or if they were able, yet they were not able without great difficulty. The self same thing do these men indge of the minde: that forasmuch as of his owne nature it can not so lift vp it self to be acceptable vnto God, and to do the woorkes which should please him, it hath neede of a heavenly and spirituall habite, to performe these things. And whilst they thus follow their philosophy, they depart from the vulgare and receyued sence of this worde grace. For when we say, that a souldiour is acceptable vnto a kyng or vnto a captaine, we do not say, that in the souldiour is grace or fauour, but rather in the kyng or captayne, which beareth fauour vnto the souldiour. So we in this case, if we would speake plainly or aright, should not say, that in vs is poured or geue grace: but rather that we are receiued of God into grace or fauour, which before were his enemies. But that we may the better fynde out the error of the scholemen, we will here sette forth their definition: for they desygne grace to be an habite of goodnes and charity infused of God, like vnto his, whereby he that hath it, is made acceptable vnto God, and doth woorkes that are acceptable vnto him and meritorious. When they say, that it is an habite infused of God, they seporate it from naturall vertues. Farther when they make it to be like vnto the goodnes and loue of God, they thinke that they bring a reason, why they which be adorne with this habite are acceptable vnto God: namely, because of that similitude. And because they can not by the scriptures proue, that grace is a thing created in the soule, they labour to confirme it with reasons. For Thomas sayth, that the beneuolence of God can not be idle: for God is saide to loue, when he geueth any good thing. Wherefore he saith, that God to do good to some, or to loue some, is to geue or infuse into them such an habite or quality, as we haue now described. But this is a very weake argument. For we graunt, that the loue of God lyeth not idle, but filleth vs with benifites, and those very manifold. But how followeth this argument: God geueth very many giftes: Ergo, he createth or poureth in such an habite: Farther this is no small error, that they will that by this habite or creature, we are made acceptable vnto God. For it must nedes follow, that seing he hath geuen vs such a gift, he therefore loued vs before: for the loue of God goeth before all his giftes. The vertues in dede which follow, may haue some consideration why they should be geuen: but yet they can not haue that force to allure God to loue vs: for he loued vs euen before he gaue them vnto vs. An other of their reasons is this: If they which are conuerted vnto Christ (say they) haue the holy ghost, which before they had not, then of necessity it followeth, that there happened some mutation. But in God there is no mutation. Wherefore we must appoint it to be in our selues, namely that we haue such an habite of grace, which before we had not. But this likewise is of no force: for God differeth his aydes is as semeth good vnto him: and moueth the hartes of men at an appointed time, when as before he moued them not: which thing yet we doubt but is done without any his change at all. For we know that God at an appoynted time created the world, which before was not extant, and yet we can not say, that God is therefore changed. Now resteth for vs to confirme by the scriptures, that the grace of God signifieth his free and undeserued loue: secondly, that it signifieth also the rewardes or giftes which are bestowed vpon the Saintes: thirdly, that the grace of Christ is that, whereby he is of force with the father, and by reason of whiche we are loued of the father. As concerning the first, Paul sayth to the Ephesians, that we were elected of God before the foundations of the world were layde, according to his good pleasure

pleasure to the prayse of the glory of his grace. In which place we see, that the cause of our election is, that the free love and grace of God towards vs, should be commended. And in the latter epistle to Timothe he sayth: Which hath called vs with his holy vocation, not by workes, but according to his purpose and grace. And Peter exhorteth vs to hope in that grace, which is offered. But it is not lawfull to hope in a thing created. And as touching Christ Paul saith vnto the Ephesians that God hath made vs acceptable in his beloved, that is, in Christ, whome most dearly and especially he loveth. And in this epistle he calleth grace eternall life. This therefore is the true definition of Grace, and agreeable vnto the holy scriptures. That it is the free beneuolence of God, whereby he counteth vs deare in Christ Jesus, and forgiveth vs our sinnes, giveth the holy ghost, an vpright life, and eternall felicity. By this definition is scene not onely, what we call grace, but also by whom we haue it, and which are the principall effects thereof. Now must we see after what maner God worketh in vs so excellent good thinges: First, he offereth the promises of these thinges: then by his inspiration he openeth the harte, that they may be receaued, which if he did not, those good thinges should neuer take place in vs: for the hart of man is stubborne, and repugnant to spirituall thinges: and therefore in the Church the ministry is alwayes needefull. For the duety of the pastors is to set forth the promises of God vnto the people, and not to bidge them in wordes onely, but also to seale the with sacraments, which are certaine visible wordes. And in especially it belongeth vnto them to remoue away two impediments, which do most of al draw men away from the promises of God. For on the one side men think that they can not attaine vnto the promises of God, because they are unworthy of the. Here must the faithfull minister diligently resist and teach, that these thinges are freely giuen of God, not by workes, or any dignity of such as receiue the. On the other part some vse to doubt, whether they by election of God are excluded from these promises. As touching this point they must teach, y the faithfull ought generally to receiue the promises of God, as they are deliuered vs by the holy ghost in the holy scriptures, neither ought they to be carefull concerning the secret will of God. For without doubt God would haue reueled, and shewed who they be that be elect, or who be reprobate, if he had known that it should haue bene profitable to saluation. Wherefore, seeing the scriptures exclude no man perticularly from the promises, euery man ought so to receiue the, as if they peculiarly pertained vnto himself. And vndoubtedly, together with faith shall be giuen vnto them that beleue, through the perswasion of the holy ghost, that they shall not doubt but that they do in very deede belong vnto the elect. After this maner the ministry of the church serueth God, and worketh together with him towards our saluation: not that the goodnes and power of God can not without it both offer his promises vnto vs, and also incline our mindes to receiue them. For neither is the grace of God of necessity bound either to the ministry, or to the sacraments, or to any outward worde. But we speake now of the accustomed maner, whereby God bringeth men to saluation. But when we haue once receiued the promises of God, we which before were dead vnto sinne begin streight way to reuiue, and so being restored vnto life, in some part we obey the law of God, not in deede with a perfect obedience, but with an obedience begun. Farther, against our enemies the flesh and Sathe, we haue the present helpe of God, and a wonderful consolation in afflictions: and the powers and faculties both of the soule and also of the body are renewed. And to speake briefly, the grace of God which we haue described, is the spring of all good thinges. But yet we haue affirmed one thing, which is not yet confirmed by the scriptures: namely, y God doth not onely offer the promises which we haue now spoken of, of his mere grace and beneuolence, but also with his spirit boweth the harte to receiue them. The first part the Pelagians also admitted: namely, that there is required the grace of doctrine and illustration. But the other part they thought consisted in free will, ether to receiue or to refuse the promises offered. But the scripture teacheth farre other.

wise. For Ezechiel in the 11. chap. sayth: That God would geue vnto his feythfull a new hart & a new spirite: & would take away fro the their stony harte, and geue them a fleshy hart. These wordes most manifestly teach, that there must be a chaunge made in our hartes. Wherefore when we reade either in Augustine or in other fa- thers, that grace commeth first, whom our will followeth, as an handmayden, we may not so vnderstand it, as though our will followeth of his owne strengthes be- yng only stirred vp and admonished by grace: for vnlesse it were changed it would neuer follow. This therefore is required, first, that the will be chaunged, and then that it obey. We must waresly also geue eare vnto Chrysostome, who in his sermon of the inuention of the crosse, saith: That neither the grace of God can doe any thyng without our wyll, nor our wyll without grace. For vniuersally it is not true, that grace can doe nothyng without our will: vnlesse thou vnderstande will, to be that, about which grace worketh. But that grace should tary for the consent of the will, it is not true. For grace changeth y<sup>e</sup> wil, before it can geue any consent. Dauid therefore prayeth: Create in me a cleane hart O God, Salomon also, Incline (O Lord) the harte of thys people, to execute thy commaundementes. And agayne Dauid, Incline myne harte to thy testimonies. The Pelagians taughte, that the begynnyng of good workes is of oure selues: namelye, of free wyll. And that grace dothe helpe them easlier and moze readely to accomplishe them. But the latter Diuines or So- phisters, least they shoulde seeme vtterlye to agree with Pelagius haue thus de- fined grace: that grace in dede commeth first: but it is in vs either to receaue it, or to refuse it: but this is as vntrue as that sentence of Pelagius, for from hence haue we power to receaue this grace. If this were true, then saluation should be of our selues. But Paul sayth, what hast thou, which thou hast not receaued? But if thou hast receaued it, why boastest thou as though thou haddest not receaued it? And a- gainst these men Augustine citeth these wordes of Paul, which we shall after ward reade: It is not of hym that wylleth, nor of hym that runneth, but of God that hath com- passion. If these mens opinion (saith he) were not true, the Apostle mought in like ma- ner haue sayde: It is not of God, that hath compassion, but of hym that wylleth and run- neth. For as these men teach, this matter semeth to be deuided, so that one part is geuen vnto God, and the other part is leaft vnto our selues. And by that meanes the grace of God is not sufficient, vnlesse we also put to our endeuer, and do wyll, and also runne. But the Apostle affirmeth farre otherwyse: saying, that it is neither of hym that wylleth, nor of hym that runneth, but of God that hath compassion. And in an other place of hym selfe he sayth, I haue laboured more then all: but yet not I, but the grace of God which is in me. By which wordes he taketh away all from hymselfe, and ascribeth it wholly vnto the grace of God. And Augustine addeth, we pray for our enemyes which are yet euill, and will not be obedient vnto God, and do reiect his promyses: which thyngs seing we do, what els do we desire, but that God should change theyr wylls, which vnlesse it were in the hand of God to do, it should be in vayne to desire it of hym. Paul also in an other place sayth, Not that we are apt to thynke any thinge of our selues, as of our selues: And if that we can not so much as thynke, much les vndoubtedly can we wyll: for the wyll followeth knowledge and thought. Neither speake I these thinges as though the will being changed of God, ought to lye still idle, and to do nothing. For it being renewed, ought to worke together with grace, that (as Bernard also sayth of free wil) that which was begon of the one, may be performed of both. For then we are not on- ly pure men, or naked men, but are made the childre of God, and haue ioyned with vs the mouing of the holy ghoost. And Paul to Tymothe sayth, that the man of God being instructed in the holy scriptures, is now mete and apt to all good thinges. But they are accustomed to say and commonly do teach, that the grace of God is laide forth vnto all men. And therefore if it be not receaued, it commeth through our owne default: for euery man (say they) may obtayne it if he will. This doubt we will bytelye dissolue. We may in dede graunt, that the grace of God is in this sort set forth to all men: because the generall promyses of God are offred and preached in- differently vnto all men. Neither do the preachers which publishe them abroad, any any thinge regard the secret will of God: or thinke thus: Peradventure this man is not predestinate: or my labour shall nothing profite him. They thinke vpon no such matter, but do set forth the word of God vnto all men vniuersally. After this manner grace or the calling of God, may be saide to be comon vnto all mē. Whobeyt when anye man receaueth & promises offered, he doth it not by his owne power or will. For it is nedefull, that his hart be opened: which thing Luke in the Actes maketh mencion of the woman that solde silke. For all men are not called with efficacy, and according to purpose. But these mē seme to saue vnto theselues a grace, as though it were a certaine garment hanging in the ayre, which any man that will may put on. But these are & inuētiōs of mans wisdomē. The holy scriptures speake farre otherwise. They vse also thus to deuide grace, that they make one a working grace, & the other a grace working together. Fro which distinciō Augustine abhorred not. For it semeth to be deriued of these wordes of the Apostle: It is God which worketh in vs both to will, and to performe. Therfore & working grace is that, which at the beginning healeth and chāgeth the wil: and after ward causeth that the will being changed and healed may worke vp rightly. And first indeede it is called a working grace, and then a grace working together. And thys is one and the selfe same grace, and not two graces. But the distinction is taken of his effectes. For first the will when it is healed concurrēth with Grace passiue. ly. For by it, it is sayd to be changed, and we are sayd to be regenerate. But afterward it becometh it selfe both actiue & passiue. For being moued of God, it also willet and cholet. And in this sence is that true which is written vnto the Hebrewes: Be not wanting from the grace of God. For we beinge Regenerate ought not to sit idle: but to liue and worke according to Grace which followeth. But they exceedingly erre, which thinke, that the will by it selfe can will good thinges: and that by grace and the spirite is nothing ells brought to passe, then to cause it with efficacy to will, and that it may obteyne those thinges which it willet which thing (as we haue now shewed) is repugnant vnto the holy scriptures. They demand farther, whether we may merite any thing by that first grace. Our aduersaries in dede say that we may: but we deny it, and do utterly reiect all consideration of merite. Which thinge with what iust reasons we doo, we shall in an other place haue moze opportunity to declare. We graunt that God of his liberality and mercy is wont after many benefices alreedy genen, to geue others: but yet not that any of the first giftes of God can merite the other later giftes. And so are these places in the Gospel to be vnderstand: To him that hath, shall be genen, & thys also: well good seruant, because thou hast bene faythfull in few things, I will set the ouer many thinges. Moreover they deuide grace into grace preuenting, and grace after following. Which deuision Augustine semeth to proue by the wordes of Dauid in the 59. Psalm: His mercy shall preuent me, and his mercy shall follow after me. But this distinction is so to be receaued, that it be vnderstand of one and the selfe same grace, and the variety to consist in the effectes. For there are many and sundry giftes, wherewith the mercy of God adorneth vs. For first the will is healed: and it being healed, it beginneth to will well: afterward, the thinges that it hath willed well, it beginneth to execute: after that it perseuereth in doing well: & at the last it is crowned. Grace therfore preuenteth our will in healinge of it: the same also followeth, in causinge those thinges to please vs which are vp rightly. It preuenteth, in causing vs to will: it followeth after in d̄ining vs to performe those thinges which we would. It preuenteth, in mouinge vs to good workes: it followeth after in geuing perseuerance. It preuenteth perseuerance, in geuing of it: it followeth after, in crowning of it. And euen as that is one and the selfe same light of the sonne, which nourisheth and prepareth the earth to receaue seedes: and which when they are committed vnto the earth causeth them to spring: and being now sprung by so nourisheth them, that they bring forth fruite: so also is it utterly one and & selfe same Grace of God, both that which preuenteth our will and also that which followeth.

When a man receaueth grace he doth it not by the power of his owne will.

Grace working and working together.

One and the selfe same grace is working and working together.

The will of it selfe cannot will good thinges.

After the first giftes we deserue not the latter.

Grace preuenting and grace after following.

It is one and the selfe same grace but the variety is in the effectes. The order of the effectes of grace.

A similitude.

eth after. Wherefore Augustine sayth, Grace preuenieth, that we should be healed: the same follo weth after, that we should be nourished. It preuenteth, that we might be called, it follo weth after that we might be glorified. Wherefore they iudge not well, which thinke that Grace preuenieth is a certaine common motion, wherewith God striketh the hartes of men, in stirring the bp to doo well, as though it were in their power ether to come vnto him that calleth them, or to reiect him. And no les doo they erre, which bable in the Scholes, that there is one Grace freely geuen, and an other which maketh vs acceptable. For euery grace ought to be geuen freely: for otherwise, as Paul sayth, it should be no Grace. And sozasmuch as by Grace that maketh acceptable, they vnderstand an habite, as we haue befoze taught, they doo wickedly in affirming, that men are by such giftes made acceptable vnto God. For befoze hym we are receaued into fauor by hys onely mercye and soz Chyestes sake, and it is not conuenient to attribute that vnto creatures, which belongeth only to Chyist, and to the goodnes of God. Farther we are first acceptable vnto God, by his free eleation, befoze that any suche giftes be genen vs. I graunt indeede that there are many free giftes, wherby the godly can not be discerned from the vngodlye: as are the giste of tounges, propheryng, the gift of healing, and such other like, which happen as wel vnto the euill, as to the good. Contrarily, sayth, hope, and charity, belong onely to the godly. Naturall giftes also, are somtymes called graces, as sharpenes of wit, & strength of body. And after this maner the Pelagijs craftely confessed, that men nede grace to liue by rightly. But by grace they vnderstood free choise, reason, and wil. We deny not, but that these things are freely genen of God. But yet we deny, that they are graces which happen vnto the elect through the redemption of Chyist. And whē the church confuted the erroz of Pelagijs, it ment not this kind of grace, but that grace, wherby we are regenerate and iustified, without which no man can ether be acceptable vnto God, or liue by rightly. Somtymes the will of man is compared with a horse, and grace with him that sitteth vpon the horse: which comparison as touching many conditions, is not to be misliked. But this is chiefly to be taken heede of, that howsoeuer we take grace, we alwayes appoint it to be geue freely, and not of workes. Neither doth it by any meanes make a man acceptable, but so far forth as it is taken for the godd will of God. And thus much as touching grace.

All grace ought to be geuen freely. We are not by giftes and habites made acceptable vnto God, but by his meere grace and mercye.

There are many free giftes wherby the godly cannot be discerned from the vngodly.

Certaine giftes are peculiar vnto the saintes.

The sixte Chapter.

What then shall we say? Shall we continue in sinne, that grace may abound? God forbid. How shall we that are dead to sinne, liue any longer therein? Knowe ye not that all we which are baptised into Iesus Chyist, are baptised into his death: we are buried then with hym by baptism into his death, that euen as Chyist was raised vp from the dead by the glory of the fathcr, so we also should walke in newnes of lyfe.

What then shall we say? Shall we continue in sinne, that grace may abound? Towardes the ende of the former chap. Paul mencioned two thinges: namely, that the law entred in that sinne shoulde abound: and where sinne abounded, there also grace did much more abound. These two thinges were offensive vnto the mindes of many: because he seemed to much to depresse the law, & to geue men an entisement to sinne. Wherefore, by preuention he repulseth these false accusations. In the 7. chap. he plainly teacheth, that that which he hath in this place wrytten concerning the law, happeneth not vnto it of his owne nature, but through our default. Now presently he cleareth his doctrine, of that wherof he was accused: namely, that he shoulde teach, that men shoulde sinne, to the end the grace of God might the more abound.

bound. That offence which Pauls doctrine seemed to hyede even then, when he was yet on lyue, is also now a dayes layd to our charge. For when we teach, that iustification is promised by faith only without woorkes, they cry out every where, that woorkes are condemned, the law made vnprofitable, & a way opened to lyue losely, & so by that meanes all discipline of maners utterly perisbeth. This may be a most sure token, that we haue attayned vnto the naturall and true meanyng of the doctrine of Pauls. When as we know that the selfe same accusations are layd to our charge, which we are assured were layd vnto his. But that these are mere false flanders, hereby it may easily be manifest, because there is nothing more profitable, to stirre vp men to lyue godly and well, then to shew, that so great is the goodnes of God, that he freely geneth righteousness vnto vs without our desertes. For who would not endenour himselfe to be answerable to so great goodnes? And it should be a miserable case, if felicitie and blessednes should be geuen vs according to our woorkes. For, soasmuch, as the imperfection of our actions cannot be hidden from vs, vndoubtedly we should dispayre of the thing y we sake for. When whiche thyng there can be nothing more miserable. The Apostle sheweth how great a griefe of minde it was vnto him, to see his doctrine drawen into so euill part: and that of so true principels should be gathered such absurdities. But this is the corruption of mans nature, that if there be neuer so litle an occasion offred, it will straight way snatch those things which are rede or heard in the holy scriptures, ether to the fulfilling of the lust of their owne desires, or els to the confidence of their owne strengthes. Wherefore Paul to withstand these euils, when he had hether to with many reasons confirmed the healthfull doctrine of iustification, both now on the other side byge good woorkes, and vehemently exhorteth vs not to abide any longer in sinne. And it is not hard to see, how sowly they are deceaued, which do of Pauls woordes gather these so greates absurdities. For in their reasons they take that which is not the cause for the cause, and so fall into a manifest false argument. For not to put confidence in the woorkes of the law, or to teach that by the lawe sinne abounded, is not a sufficient cause, why the lawe of God should either be reiecte, or els counted vnprofitable. And to teach that woorkes iustifye not, is not a cause why we should cease of from doing woorkes. And to say that more grace abounded, when sinne abounded, is not to say that our sinnes are the causes of the grace of God. For, that is agaynst nature, that that which is in very dede euill, shoulde bying forth good. And seing sinnes do alienate vs from God, how should they purchase vnto vs grace? The disease maketh not the Physicion notable, but by occasion. It is the art which commendeth him and not the disease. So sinnes of their owne nature do not illustrate the grace of God, but his goodnes and mercy, wherby he forgiveth sinnes. If we wil conclude rightly, and without a fals argument, let vs thus reason: soasmuch as we can not fulfill the law, and therefore it can not iustifie vs, let vs not cleaue vnto it only. Wherefore let vs annere Christ and his grace which if we do, we shall receiue much fruit therby. Againe, seing that woorkes can not be the cause of iustification, let vs not attribute so much vnto wicked men, eto such as are not yet regenerate, to say, that they by their owne merites can get vnto themselves grace. But being regenerate, let vs aply our selues to good woorkes, as to the fruites of righteousness. And althoughe sinnes are not the causes of the grace of God, yet let vs acknowledge that there needed a mighty and an aboundant grace to take those sinnes away, when as they had so infinitely increased. Where is committed also in these arguments a false reason of equiuocation. For, when Paul sayth: where sinne hath abounded, there more abounded grace: he saith not, whersoever sinnes haue increased, there straight way grace hath more abounded. For there are found many most wicked men ouerwhelmed with infinite synnes, in whom shineth no grace of God at all. But this Paul sayth, where sinnes haue increased by the law, and are now in very dede known, and inwardly felte in the mynd, there men being made asfeard of their misery, are after a sort prepared and giuen vnto Christ to imploze his ayde. And thereby it cometh to passe that grace aboundeth in them which are so touched by the law. There is an other fallace of deceit in this reasoning, which cometh of y diuersitie of times. For we graunt, that God through Christ giveth abundant grace: whereby the finnes which went before regeneration are blotted out. Yet therof ought not to be gathered, that sins are againe to be heaped vp, to the end grace also should be augmented. Wherefore, it plainly appeareth, that in these false accusations is more then one kinde of false argument. Neither was Paul onely accused of this crime, that he opened a way dow to sin, but also al those whosoever they were that taught Christ earnestly. For those false witnesses in y Actes testified against Stephē, y he ceased not to speake many things against God, & against y law. But Paul to acquite the doctrine of the Gospel fro such false accusations, saith, that we are not only iustified by faith, but al so haue y spirit of Christ, whereby we are both stirred vp to a new life, and sinne also is weakened in vs. Wherefore whē we reade the holy scriptures, we ought to ponder them with greate diligence and attentiuenes, before by way of reasoning we gather any thing out of them. For he which neglecteth the principles of first groundes, is easely led into dangerous errors. So greate difference is there betweene those things, which Paul concludeth of the things before spoken, and those things which the vnlearned do gather of them, that they are manifestly contrary one to the other. They by this doctrine do gather that we must sinne, to the end grace may abound. But Paul of the selfe same doctrine gathereth, that we must not sinne, that grace should abound. Which thing he proueth in this chapter, principally by two reasons: the first is, because we are now deade vnto sinne, and are come vnto Christ. And this reason be at large handleth in the first part of this chap.

The other reason is: that we ought to obey him, vnto whose seruice we haue addicted our selues. Wherefore seing by our conuersion vnto Christ we are made the seruantes of righteousness, we must now serue it, and not sinne. And this reason containeth that which remaineth of this chapter. Neither is it in vayne, that Paul putteth forth his sentence by interrogations. For by them he partly expreseth the affection of his indignation, how that he toke it very greuously, that the doctrine of the Gospell should be diffamed with so absurd suspitions. Farther by his interrogations he declareth the security of his conscience. For he sheweth, that he thought nothing lesse, then that which was objected against him. The first reason is this. They which are dead vnto sin, ought not to perseuer therein. But Christians are dead vnto sinne: Wherefore they ought not to perseuer in it: These things are evidently proued by the contrariety of death and life: because no man can at one and the selfe same tyme, be both deade and also on lyue. For euen as he is a fole, which would desire health in such sorte, that he would together with it be sick also: or which would abyde still in the fire, that he might be deliuered from burning: so also is he a foole, which being deade vnto sinne: thinketh that he may ne-uertheless liue vnto it. The selfe same thing teacheth Christ, when he sayth, that no man can serue two masters. And in naturall knowledge it is a common sentence, that the generation of one thing is the corruption of an other. Wherefore if we be bozne agayne to Christ, then is it necessary that we should dye vnto sinne. Although whilest we liue here, this death is only begon, and not finished, vntill the body and fleshe are vtterly dissolued. To dye vnto sinne after Pauls meaning, is not to obey sinne. And by sinne he understandeth naturall lust, and corruption of nature, which we haue contracted of the fall of our first parentes. The meaning therfore of Paul is, that Christians should nothing be moued at this sinne, so grafted in vs by nature, if at any time it stirre vp and enflame them to do euil, but should be as it were dead vnto it, and not suffer themselves either by pleasures to be deceiued, or by any terrores to be turned away from pietie. For they which are dead, are moued by no persuasions. Let them which professe Christ, and in the meane time die not vnto lustes, but rather with all their endeuor follow them, marke in this place how well they answer vnto their name & duty.
Farther although the godly die vnto sinne, yet they neuer cease to make warre against it: for they are not so dead vnto sinne, that they feele not the manions thereof

therof. For rather they are very much grieved, that they are bryged of it, and they weaken the violence therof, with all the endenour of the spirit, as much as they are able. The other proposition (wherin we said, that they whiche belong vnto Christ, are dead vnto sinne) is proued by the communion, which thorough faith we haue with Christ, which communion for it is inuisible, is outwardly known by the sacrament of baptisme: wherein (as Paul saith) is signified, both that we are dead vnto sinne, and also that we are raised vp vnto the life of Christ. This is the repentance, which is set forth in this sacrament, that we shoulde departe from sinne, and by all meanes detest it with a sure faith of the remission of sinne through Christ, and with a full purpose of amendment of life. Whiche repentance, although in baptisme it be sealed both by wordes and also by signes, yet is it all our life time neuertheles necessary. For if phisition bleseth not so to heale the sicke person, that he afterward should abuse his health, & through his intemperance, cast himself into a more greuous disease. Wherefore we must imitate wise and temperat men: which being restozed from a perilous disease, vse afterward diligently to take hede of those things which might hurt their health. Chrysostome in his Homilies vnto the people of Antioche accuseth many, which appointed out vnto themselves ten or xx. dayes, or a whole month, all which time they would fast, and (as they vse to speake) do penance: but afterward, as though they had accomplished all manner of deuoties of pietie, they fell to their former vices, as if they had neuer shaken them of, but onely for a tyme had layde them a syde. Thys kynde of men Paul in thys place accuseth: in that they professing themselves to be deade vnto synne, wyl yet lyue & gayne vnto it, and he confirmeth hys sentence by Baptisme. For the Sacramentes in these firste and purer times of the Church were commonly known vnto all men: whiche at this day (whiche is muche to be lamented) are vnknewen vnto the greatest part of Christians. But this misery hath the vse of a strange tonge brought in, which Antichrist hath added to all sacred righte and ceremonies whereby is come to passe, that forasmuch as the people vnderstand nothing, they are amased only at certayne outward gestures and ceremonies and vnto them doo ascribe all theyr confidence and saluation. And for the most part also hereof sprang this mischiefe, that infantes are oftentimes baptised ether at home, or els in the temple where none in a maner are present: where is had no declaration at all of so greate a sacrament. Wherefore that this most lamentable discommodity may be amended, the Sacramentes ought to be ministered in the mother tonge, & perspicuously: and the time to baptise ought to be appoynted when the congregation is most frequent: to the end there may be many witnesses of so greate a thing, and that they may with common prayers commend vnto God, the childe whiche is to be baptised, and also that they may be edified by that holy action, being admonished of a new brother adopted to be the sonne of God. But in what maner we are in Baptisme sayd to dye vnto sinne, Chrysostome teacheth vpon the first epistle to the Corinthians the 15. chap. when he expoundeth these wordes of Paul: what doo they which are baptised for the dead? For he sayth, that they which are baptised doo beleue and confesse, that Iesus Christ is dead, and raised vp from the dead: and professe also that they will dye together with him, and be raised vp together with him: and the minister by his outward action signifieth the same, when he dippeth the into the water, and taketh them out again. That therefore which death was vnto Christe on the crosse, and his rising vp againe from the sepulchere, & same is Baptisme vnto vs. But in y it is written. All we that are baptised in Christ Iesus. ] we can not thereby gather that the Apostles changed the forme of wordes prescribed of Christ: which thing some suspect both by this place, and by the Actes of the Apostles: amonge whome is Ambrose, who to excuse the acte, sayth, that in Christ (as touching the name) are comprehended the three persos. For forasmuch as this word, Christ, signifieth anointed, we must needs by it signifie both him which is annoynted, and also him which annoynteth, that is,

The communion which we haue with Christ is noted in baptisme.

A similitude.

So do they in these dayes at the end of Lent.

The nature of the sacraments was in the olde time very wel known vnto all men.

What is the cause that the nature of the sacraments is at this day vnknewen of the common people. The sacraments ought to be ministered in the common tonge and that publicly.

How in baptisme we are signified to dye vnto sinne.

The Apostles changed not the forme of baptisme as touching the wordes. In this word Christe are comprehended the three persons.

the father and the sonne, & also the ayntmēt, that is, the holy ghoſt. Therefore he ſaith that to baptiſe in Chriſt Jeſus, is as much as to baptiſe in the name of the father, and of the ſonne, and of the holy ghoſt. But ſo much as this ſentence leaneth not vnto firme teſtimonies of the ſcriptures, therefore in my iudgement, it is not ſo muche to be regarded. But we ſay, that to be baptiſed in Chriſt, is nothing elſe then according to his commandement and institution to be initiated. And by this ſort of ſpeaking is ſignified, that we doo paſſe into Chriſt, to the end we may be moſt ſtraightly toynd together with him in fayth, hope, and charity: For euen as ſouldiers doo ſweare to the name and obedience of the captayne, and are ſo bound vnto him, that afterward it is not lawfull for them to be conuerſant in the campe of the enemies, which thing if they doo, ſhould be death vnto them: ſo we in baptiſme are bound vnto Chriſt, and do ſweare that we will neuer afterward fall away vnto the deuill: And ſo much as that honour is deu vnto Chriſt, to be ſayd to be baptiſed in him, we ought not be offended, when we reade in the epiſtle to the Corinths, that the fathers wer baptiſed in Moſes. For this is the ſence of that place, that the Iſraelites paſſed ouer the ſea truſting to thoſe promiſes, which were ſet forth of God by Moſes. Neither ought we thereby to conclude, that it is lawfull to baptiſe in the name of any man, as of a mediator and author of our ſaluation. Paul therefore, when hee reſpoynded the Corinths, bycauſe they filthily addiſed themſelues vnto men (ſo that ſome of them ſayd, I hold of Paul, others of Cephas, others of Apollo) ſaid, Was Paul crucified for you? or were ye baptiſed in the name of Paul? which thing he therfore wrote, becauſe he ſaw that the Corinthians transferred the honour of Chriſt, vnto miniſters.

Two princpall things which Chriſt hath done for our ſakes.

Are baptiſed into his death. As hee hath nowe made mention of his death, ſo a little afterwarde hee will make mention of his reſurrection. For theſe are the two principall thynges whiche Chriſt hath wrought for our ſakes. And vndoubtedly becauſe in Baptiſme we receiue the fruite of the death of Chriſt (ſo much as by that ſacrifice God is ſatified towards vs) we are iuſtly ſayd to be baptiſed into his death: and chiefly becauſe through the death of Chriſt our ſinnes ceaſe now to be imputed vnto vs, but, before God we are counted for dead. And the luſt which remaineth in vs, becauſe by the benefite of Chriſt it is broken and diminiſhed, therefore alſo we are ſayd to be baptiſed into the death of Chriſt. And for that Paul would aggrauate the death whereby we die vnto ſinne, and would ſhewe that it is not a thing ſlight, but weighty, he addeth:

VVe are buried therefore together with Chriſt by baptiſme. Now in our dayes alſo they which are baptiſed (to the ende they may by profeſſion expreſſe the ſame thing) do by expreſſe wordes anſwere, that they renounce the deuill and his pompes. Out of this place Auguſtine gathereth two thinges: whereof the one is in the 6. booke againſt Iulianus the 1. chap: where he proueth that infants are borne in original ſinne. For (ſaith he) it is a generall ſentence of the Apoſtle, that as many as are baptiſed, are baptiſed into the death of the Lord, that is, to dye to ſinne: and (as it ſhall ſtraight way be ſhewed) that the body of ſinne ſhould be aboliſhed, which ſayings can not be true, vnleſſe we graunt that infants are borne in ſin. The other thing is in his epiſtle to Bonifacius, where he ſheweth that the Sacramentes obtayne the names of the thinges, which by them are ſignified. For Paul ſayd not, that our ſepulture is ſignified in baptiſme, but ſimply ſayde, that we are buried with Chriſt into death. And after this maner he ſaith, that the Eucharift is called the body and blood of Chriſt. Thirdly let vs note that the fathers, when they will confirme & change which is done in the Eucharift, for example ſake bring the change of our ſelues, which is made in baptiſme: which change alſo the Apoſtle ſemeth to declare to be very greate. For he bleſſeth there the names of life and death. Betwene which two thinges of neceſſity there muſt needs be a verie greate change. Therefore ſeing that the nature and ſubſtance of thoſe which are baptiſed is not changed, it is nothing needefull that in the bread and wine ſhould be pure trantransubstantiation. The Apostle in a manner speaketh after the same sort of baptism, in the 2. chapter to the Colossians saying: In whom ye are also circumcised with circumcision which is done without bandes, forasmuch as ye have put off the sinfull body of the flesh, thorough the circumcision of Christ, being buried together with him through baptism, in whom together with him ye are also risen againe through faith, that is wrought by the operation of God, which rayed him from the deade. And when ye were deade in sinnes, and vncircumcision of your flesh, he quickened you together with him. These wordes in all points are agreeable with those things that we are now in hand with: whiche shall be more plainly expounded for he addeth:

That euen as Iesus Christ was rayed vp from the dead by the glory of the father, so we also should walke in newnes of life. The glory of the father in this place signifieth the power of God, which was then chiefly declared, when Christ rose againe from the deade: and in vs it is manifestly shewed when we casting away sinnes do liue incorruptly. And Paul by this worde newnes, doth oftentimes signifie the blameles life of Christians. For he saith, that we ought to put on the new man. And he saith that before God, circumcision, or vncircumcision is nothing, but only a new creature. And he admonisheth, that as touching the inward man we should be dayly more and more renewed. But by this word walking, he teacheth, that that purenes of life, that is to say, this newnes hath certayne degrees: and we must haue a care continually to profite more and more.

For if we be grafted into him by the similitude of his death, euen so shall we also be partakers of his resurrection: knowing this, that our olde man is crucified with him also, that the body of sinne should be abolished, that henceforth we should not be seruants vnto sinne.

For if we be grafted into him by the similitude of his death, euen so shall we be of his resurrection. Chrysostome noteth that this similitude of death in this place admonisheth vs, that that which was done in Christ by nature, is in vs done by an analogy & proportion. For it is not needfull, that we through baptism should dye by naturall death: but that in our maners and life we should resemble the similitude of the death of Christ. In the booke of Ecclesiasticus it is written: Thou hast set downe at a great table: marke what thinges are sit before thee, because thou also must performe the like. Wherefore when we with the eyes of faith behold the crosse and death of Christ, we oughte to remember, that we must sometymes suffer the like. And how we should performe that, Paul teacheth by a most manifest similitude.

We are (saith he) grafted into Christ. In plantes when the graft is set into the stocke, it doth no more take sappe and life of it selfe, but of the stocke wherinto it is grafted: so we being in regeneration grafted into Christ, ought to liue by his spirite, and with him both to die, and also to rise againe: that euen as Christ could not be holden of the sorowes of death, so also can not the tyranny of sinne any longer hold vs in bandes. Righteousnes and purenes of lyfe shall daily be renewed in vs: which thing is brought to passe, when we depart from sinne: for as long as we liue in sinne, we lead not a new life, but the olde life. There is no entrance open vnto the lyfe of the resurrection, but by death. By this metaphore Paul would expresse our great coniunction with Christ, which metaphore also he learned of Christ. For Christ saith: that he is the Vine: wherein we as bryanches are contayned, and they only bring forth fruite, which abide in the vyne. For they which are seperated from the vine, do wither away, being apt only for the fyre. Wherefore, we may conclude both by the sayinges of Paul, and also by the sentence of Christ, that they which liue without Christ, can not bring forth good fruite. For whatsoeuer good fruit is in vs, the same cometh wholly from Christ, as from the liuely roote. And that which Paul speaketh in this place touching this grafting into Christ,

The power of God was declared in the resurrection of Christ. Paul doth oftentimes vse this word, newnes.

A new life hath his degrees.

That which was done in Christ by nature ought to be resembled of vs by an analogy.

An elegant metaphore

The entrance to life is made open by death.

Pauls doctrine out of the wordes of Christ.

Without Christ no fruite is brought forth.

very much illustrateth the things which were spoken in the former chapt. concerning the comparison of Adam with Christ. For it was said, that Christ is of no les force to saue his, then was Adam to condemne them, which haue descended fro him through the flesh. And soasmuch as all mankinde is procreated of hym, none can attayne to saluation thorough Christ, vnles he passe from the kinred of Adam into the family of Christ. And this passage Paul aptly compareth with y grafting of trees. For euen as a graste is plucked away from his naturall plant, and grafted into an other straunge plant, and therout draweth both lyfe and sappe. So ought we to be remoned from the vitiate and corrupt nature, which we haue drawen of Adam, and to be grafted into Christ, as into the most holy stocke. But this spirituall grafting differeth not a little from naturall grafting. For husbandmen are accustomed to breake of the slip which they will graft, from a good and excellent tree, and to fasten it into an other which is barren and wilde, that the graste may line in it, but yet retaine the nature and proprieties of the old tree, from whence it was cut of. But we far other wise being cut of from the wilde olme tree, and vnfruitful plant that is, from the corrupt nature of Adam, are grafted into Christ, that from him we should not only take lyfe and spirite, but also leauing our olde affections, should put on his nature and proprieties. For when we are said to die vnto sinne, it is not to be vnderstand, that all affections cease to be in vs. Those affections only ought to passe away and to perish, which spring of the old corruption. For it is necessary, if we will aunswer to our regeneration, that the affection and felinges of Christ do daily more and more bud forth in vs. Neither is this any ill counsel, whē we are commaunded to put of the affections of the olde Adam. For, soasmuch as we are created like vnto the image of God, they make vs to degenerate into brute beastes: yea, also they make vs farre worse in all pointes then brute beastes. For the brute beast hath some measure toynd to his lustes: but our affections range abode to farre beyond measure. By them health is hurte, the mynde corrupted, and there is left nothing in man, y is in his due place and order. By them not only our owne saluation is contemned and hurt, but also the saluation of our neighbours: and the vse of all creatures confounded, and the fulfilling of the law of God violated. The Philosophers also vnderstode, that our affections are so corrupt, that vnles there be remedy had, they would turne all things to our destruction. But they could not geue a iust remedy. They wanted Christ: into whome (as Paul saith) beyng cut of from the corruption of nature, they should haue bene grafted. And Paul bleth this word death, to shew y these wicked affections, ought not only to be after a softe byo: en by morall vertues (as y philosophers affirmed) but vtterly to be cut of, euen as the old life is finished by death. It is also rightly called death: bicause eue as we die not without paine & grieve, so also we are not grafted in Christ without most greuous grieve of the flesh. And therefore Paule sometymes in the selfe same thyng bleth the name of the Crosse. For to the Galathians he sayth: that they which are of Christ, haue crucified their flesh with the vices and lustes thereof.
And speaking of himself, he sayth, To me the world is crucified, & I vnto the world.
Mortall vertues, and outward discipline are not (as it is before sayd) sufficient vnto this mortification: which things yet want not they? vnto the world. a Publike welth and a ciuile life. But they bring not me to this point that Paul hath now a respect vnto. Much les can hypocritical Monkry bring that to passe: yea rather it is most of all repugnant vnto true mortification. For we se many ostentime's, which exceedingly afflicte themselves with fasting and outward exercises: which yet in the meane time are full of most corrupt affections. All humane endeuors are of no force vnto this mortification. For nature will not agree to deny and kill it selfe. Wherefore the anger and hatred against sin must be inflamed in our hartes by y inspiration of God: y we may be certainly perswaded that God will take vengeance vpon wicked aders. If by the benefite of the halp ghost the hartes of men be stricken with this sword, and this arrow being so full of force, then at the length they will beginne perfectly to know themselves

selues, and to be displeased with theselues, and to abhorre, whatsoener they perceane to be done in them without Christ. And by that meanes it cometh to passe that the saythfull thinke vpon the death of Christ with most great vility: which thing if it be not done slenderly but with a belement sayth, we shall fele the anger and vengeance of God most abundantly powred out agaynst sinnes: whē as for the taking of them away, he would haue his only begotten sonne (who otherwise was euen innocenye it selfe) so miserably handled, that he might in him only punishe all our sinnes. These thinges if with sayth we reuolue in our mind, we shal begin so to abhorre from sinnes, that the self same power of God which caused Christ for our sakes to suffer, death, the crosse, and most horrible payne, shall drawe vs also, to dye vnto sinne together with Christ, which thing being brought to passe (as Paule here teacheth) VVe shall also be pertakers of his resurrection: for these two are knit and ioyned together. Wherefore to the Colossians he writeth: If ye haue risen together with Christe, seeke the thinges which are aboue: and straighte waye be addeth: Mortefye your members which are vpon the earth. also, Ye are deade with Christe, and your life is hidden with him. Wherefore when Christe your life shall appeare, then also shall ye appeare together with hym in glorye. And in this epistle, if by the spirit ye shall mortefye the deades of the flesh, ye shall liue. And there are other places very many wherein life is alwaies ioyned together with this death. Yea, looke how much more we profite in a new life, so much the farther procede we in mortification. Which thing is very well declared in the epistle vnto the Phillippians. For thus Paul writeth, That I may be found in him, not hauing mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that righteousness which is of Christ thorough sayth, which is of God: that I may know hym, and the power of his resurrection, and the communion of his afflictions: whiles I am made conformable vnto his death, if by any meanes I may attayne vnto the resurrection of the dead: not that I haue already attained to it, or am already perfect: But I labor if in case I may comprehend, so far forth as I am comprehended of Christ Iesus. Brethern I coulde not my selfe as yet to haue attained vnto it: Wherefore forgetting the thinges which are behind, and endeuoring my selfe to those thinges which are before, according to the prefixed mark, I follo w hard to the reward of the high calling of God. By these testimonies is manifestly proued, that the death of Christ, and his resurrection, and mortification, and newnes of life ought to be ioyned together. This thing is also to be added: If we be grafted into the death and resurrection of Christ, we shall not only attayne vnto forgettenes of sinnes, and to a purer life, but also we shall dye vnto the law. For nether shall we be accused or condemned of it, nor compelled to the ceremonies thereof. For to the Colossians it is written: Wherefore if ye be dead with Christ from ordinances, why as though ye liued in the world, are ye burdned with tradicions? as, Touch not, east not, handle not. And a litle before in the same chap. When ye were dead in sins, and in the vncircumcision of your flesh he hath quickned you together with him, forgenging you al your sins puttyng out the handwriting of ordinances, that was against you, which was contrary vnto you. Lastly we are made without feare, and patient in aduersities: knowing that if we be dead together with Christ, we shall raigne together with hym. But forasmuch as this argument of Paul which he is now in hand with, is deriued of the nature of Baptisme, (to the end we may vnderstand, what maner of thyng the nature therof is, and as it were knowing the ground, might gather out these profitable admonitions, and oftentimes reuolue them in our mynd) it shal be profitable, to set forth a certaine ample definition, which may well nie comprehend all thinges, that are written therof in the holy scriptures. Baptisme therefore, is a signe of regeneration into Christ, into his death (I say) and his resurrection, which succeeded in the place of Circumcision, which consisteth of the lauacre of water in the worde, wherein in the name of the father, and of the sonne, and of the holy ghost remission of sinnes, and effusion of the holy ghost is offered, and by a visible sacrament we are grafted into Christ, and into the church, and the right vnto the kingdom of heauen is sealed vnto vs, and we on the other side professe, that we will dye vnto sinne, and hereafter lyue in Christ. What the members or partes of this definition

With the spiritnall life is ioyned the life of the resurrection.

They which are grafted into Christ do dye vnto the Law.

may the better be vnderstood, we will briefly declare them. First it is called a signe which word is common vnto Baptisme, and to all sacraments, which is proued by that, that Paul before in this selfe same epistle taught, that Abraham after that he was iustified receiued Circumcision, σφραγίδα, that is, a seale of the righteousness already obteyned. But what thyng Baptisme sealeth, is sufficiently exprest, whē as it is called, the signe of regeneration. For Christ very manifestly taught Nicodemus in the 3. chap. of Iohn, that they which will be saued, ought to be born again. And that baptisme is the the signe of this regeneration, Paul teacheth vnto Titus saying: According to his mercy he hath saued vs through the lauacre of regeneration. And soasmuch as regeneration is a certaine mutacion or chaunge, that we may the better vnderstand what that mutacion or chaunge is: First, must be declared the end wherunto this mutacio tendeth. And therefore in the definition we added, Into Christ, bicause the sayth, studies, and life of such men as are regenerat tend to no other end, then that they may wholly passe into Christ. And seing that all things whiche Christ did for our saluation, are comprehended in his death & resurrection. Therefore in this definition we added, that we must be baptised into his death and resurrection. Whiche thing Paul also teacheth in this selfe same place. For thus he writeth, Knowe ye not, that all we that are baptised into Christ, are baptised into his death? And straightwaie he maketh mencion of the resurrection. And that Baptisme succeeded in the place of Circumcision, the epistle to the Colossians teacheth: which place we haue before cited. Wherefore seing that Circumcisiō was ministred vnto one man only once, and soasmuch as euery man hath but one only nativity, therof it commeth, that Baptisme also ought to be geuen onelye once. Which thing is also therefore done, bicause the holy ghost wil haue vs fully perswaded, that after Baptisme we ought no more to returne to our old life, as though an other regeneration might be permitted vnto vs. For if any man should so think he should (as it is written in the epistle vnto the Hebrues) treade vnder feete the blood of the sonne of God. Paul therefore vnto the Ephesians sayth: One spirit, one sayth one baptisme. And that it consisteth of the lauacre of water, and of the word, we are taught out of the epistle vnto the Ephe. by these wordes. Euen as Christe also loued the church, and gaue himselfe for it, that he myght sanctifie it, beyng made cleane by the lauacre of water through the worde. This is the nature of sacraments, that they consist of a signe, an outward Element, and the word of God. Many Ecclesiasticall writers, when they entreat of Baptisme, do set forth the prayes and commendations of water. But I in this place do rather reuerence the simplicity of Christi- an religion, whereunto are geuen Sacraments, not onely most fewe in number, but also moste easie to be done. For as touchyng the signes we haue nothing but breade, wyne, and water: whiche are thinges euerye where in vse, and in all places easie to be gotten. But the misteries of Idoles were celebrated wyth greate cost, and were verie sumptuous. But Christ in outward thinges followed alwayes greate simplicity. Although the deuill also, as an imitator of God, would sometimes haue water also ioyned to his holy seruices: as in the misteries of Mitra, and Isis. And the Romanes in the playes of Apollo and Pelusi- us sprinkled the city ouer with water. For by that meanes they thought it per- feclly clenfed from periuries, murders, iniustice, and publike crimes. And such as had committed murder of set purpose, sought purging holy waters. But omitting these thinges, this we ought to consider, that the signe in sacraments ought to haue an affinity and similitude with the thing which is by it signified. Wherefore seing water washeth away the filthines of the body, maketh the earth fruitfull, and quencherh thirst, it aptly signifieth remission of sinnes, and the holy ghost, whereby good woikes are made plentiful and signifieth grace, which refresheth the anguishes of the minde. Neither did the prophetes in the olde Testament otherwise prophespe of the geuing of the holy Ghost in regene- ration. Ioell saith, that God would poure cleane water vpon the sonnes and daughters of the Iewes. And Esay saith, All ye that thirst come vnto the waters. And the el- ders of the Hebrues (Paul saith) were baptised in the red sea, and in the cloude. But what

What manner of word it is that ought to be added vnto the element of water, we haue noted, namely, wherein, in the name of the father, & of the sonne, & of the holy ghoste remission of sinnes. &c. Into this promise our faith is sealed: and as Tertullian saith, the sacrament of baptisme is the garment of this faith. These prescribed wordes are deliuered of Christ in the last chap. of Mattheu. Neither as we haue befoze saide, can I be perswaded, that the Apostles changed this forme of wordes, although Ambrose in that thing thought otherwise. Of whole iudgement what is to be thought, we haue befoze sufficiently declared. It sufficeth vs at this present, that by the element and word of God we haue a manifest testimony of our regeneratiō and saluation. For enen as there are three thinges (as Iohn saith) which beare witness of Christ: the spirit, bloud, and water. (For the father, which is signified by the spirit, the sonne, which is declared by bloud, and the holy ghost which is noted by water, do beare witness of his deinitie. And of his true humane nature, the spirit is a witness, which he commended vnto the father vpon the crosse, and also the bloud and water which flowed out of his side) so, that we are the childzen of God, we haue a testimony of the holy ghost: & we haue the remission of sinnes by the bloud of Christ, set forth in the worde of promise, and in the water outwardly poured vpon the body. For by these witnesses our faith is both rayled vp and also confirmed, because we are regenerate, and are now made the childzen of God. There is offered vnto vs remission of sinnes, in the name of the father, and of the sonne, and of the holy ghost. And yet ought we not to thinke, that it is given by reason of the worke wrought, (as they vs to speake) as though a holines of the spirit lay hidden in the water, and that we are regenerated by the outward touch thereof. For it is not so. But by the word of God and outward signe is signified vnto vs our reconciliatiō with God made by Christ: which reconciliatiō if we take hold on by faith, we are both iustified, and also sanctified. Wherefoze Augustine vpon Iohn saith: From whence cometh this so greate a power vnto the water, that it should touch the body, and washe the hart, but through the word which worketh it, not in that it is spoken, but in that it is beleued: But in infantes which by reason of age can not yet beleue, the holy ghost worketh in their hartes in seede of faith. The effusion also of the holy ghost is promised in baptisme, as it is expessedly written in the epistle to Titus: Which hath saved vs through the lauacre of regeneration, and of renouation of the holy ghost, which he plentifully hath poured vpon vs. Neither are these two thinges in suche manner offered in baptisme vnto vs, as though we by no meanes had them befoze baptisme. For it can not be denied, but that they which are of full age, if they beleue, haue iustification euen befoze they be baptised. For so Abraham beleued, and was iustified, and then he receaued the seale of circumcision. And Cornelius the Centurion when he had heard Peter and beleued, was not onely iustified, but also visibly receaued the holy Ghost. Neither woulde we baptise infantes, but that we suppose, that they already pertayne vnto the Church and vnto Christ. And yet are not suche baptised in bayne. For we oughte to obeye the commandement of God, which if any man shoulde contemne, though he boasted neuer so muche of his faith, yet shoulde he sufficiently declare, that he neyther beleued, nor is iustified, nor hath receaued remission of sinnes. Farthermoze although they beleue, yet when these promises are agayne offered, and that by the institution of the Lord, and they thorough faith and the impulsio of the holy ghost doo with efficacy take hold of them, the benefites of God can not but be augmented in them. But why the holy ghost is poured into the hartes of them that are regenerate, this is the reason: Bycause they must be made new agayne, and theyr stony hart (as the prophete saith) must be turned into a fleshy hart: which is not possible to be done by humane reason. And that we are by the visibill sacrament grafted into Christ & into the Church, is first declared by this place which we are now in hand with. For Paul saith, that they which are baptised, are grafted into Christ.

And in the first to the Corinthians the 12. chap. he sayth, that by one Spirit we are all baptised into one body. And that this body is the Church, he plainly teacheth in the selfe same chap. We added in the definition, By a visible sacrament, because in very dede we are grafted both into Christ, and into the Church as touching the minde and spirite, so soone as euer we are iustified. But bycause that is vnknown vnto men, it is afterward known, when we are initiated by the outward sacrament, also the right vnto eternall life is sealed vnto vs by baptisme. It is in dede genen vs so soone as euer we are iustified, and it pertaineth vnto vs by right, not of merite, but of the liberall gift of God: and by baptisme it is sealed. As the giftes of kinges, so soone as euer they are graunted vnto vs, doo without doubt pertain vnto vs: but afterward are added seales, that the will of the king may if it be needfull, be testified vnto others. Neither is this part of the definition, right vnto eternall life, so to be vnderstand, as though they ought to be excluded from the kingdome of heauen which are not baptised. For if they beleue, and there be no let in them that are not baptised, we ought not to doubt of theyr saluation. For Christ sayth: He which beleueth in me hath eternall life. And in an other place, althoughe he saye, that he which beleueth, and is baptised, shall be saved, yet he streight way addeth: He which beleueth not shall be cōdemned. By which woordes he signifieth, that baptisme is not so of necessity, but that a saythfull mā may with out it be saved, so that there be annexed no cōtempt nor disobedience. The scholemen also confesse, that besides the baptisme of water, the godly are sometimes baptised with Martirdom, and with the inspiratiō of the holy ghost, so much as sufficeth vnto saluation. Christ also called his death baptisme, when he sayd, that he should be baptised with an other baptisme: and foze told, that the Apostles shoulde be baptised with the holpe ghost soone after hys ascension into heauen. Lastly we agayne in baptisme professe death, as touching sinne, and a new life: which profession sheweth nothing ells, then that vnto this sacrament is adioyned repētaunce, which thing both Iohn and also Christ taught, when they spake of Baptisme. And the fathers when they passed ouer the sea, escaped into liberty: but Pharo with his host was drowned in the waters: whereby was signified, that by baptisme we ought so to be renewed, that there we should forsake our sinnes, and be lifted out of the waters with a new purpose to an holy life. All these thinges oughte we, when we are baptised, by testimonies of the scriptures often to consider, and of them all continually to admonish our selues. For although this sacrament be but once onely geue, yet ought it neuer in our whole life time to be forgotten. For euen as it behoued the Iewes euermore to remember, that they were circumcised, so also ought we continually to call to memoze our baptisme. And this is not to be passed ouer, that the Anabaptistes laboꝝ by this chap. to confirme theyr erroꝝ, which thinke that baptisme ought not to be genen vnto infantes, bycause they are not able by sayth to receaue the promises offred vnto them, or to professe mortification and a new life. But how weake this argument is, partly reason it selfe sheweth, & partly the scriptures teach. For this is not the propriety of signes, that they should then onely profite when they are present. Otherwise we ought continually to be baptised. They are in dede deliuered but only once: but being oftentimes called to memoze, they allwayes profite. For the vtilite of them is not a thinge that dureth but for a tyme: although infantes can not take holde of the promises offred vnto them, yet afterwarde when they come to riper age, they shall take holde of them. But sozasmuche as they are able to receaue the couenaunt, and the thinges promised pertain vnto them, why shoulde we take awaye from them the signes of those thinges? These men sozsooth, woulde seeme to be wiser then God: for God knewe vndoubtedlye as well as they, that Circumcision conteyned a promise of Christ, and a profession of mortification, and of a newe lyfe. For by the prophets he continually bygeth the Circumcision of the hart, which was signified by that Sacrament, and yet he commaunded, that infantes should be

be initiated unto him by Circumcision. Why the do these men object unto us y<sup>e</sup> thing which God himselfe would not haue kept from infants. They vse also to bryge the commaundement of the Lord, wherein he commaunded the Apostles, that they should teache and baptise. And they thinke, that infantes ought therefore not to be baptised, because they can not receiue the preaching and doctrine of the Gospel. Perther consider they, that Christ by that commaundement taught the manner how religion should be spred abroad, & the church instructed. For it was not for the Apostles to beginne their office and function with the Sacraments. First it behooued them to preach the Gospel: afterward to baptise them that beleued. And so y<sup>e</sup> Apostles baptised not only the that beleued, but also their whole families. As we rede also that Abraham when he beleued, circumcised not only himselfe, but also all his. And we know vndoubtedly by the holy scriptures, that Baptisme succeeded in the place of Circumcision. Wherefore, they cannot say, that the baptisme of infantes, is against the worde of God, because, vnles they will graunt, that our infantes are in worse estate, then were the infantes of the Hebrewes, they must of necessity confesse, that our infantes also ought to be initiated vnto God and vnto Christ. They also are not to be harkened vnto, which say that circumcision was only a sealyng of promises touching temporall things. For Paul doth manifestly teach, that it ought to be compared with baptisme. And in the 17. chap. of the booke of Genesis, Circumcision is instituted to confirme this promise. I will be thy God, and the God of thy seede. And vndoubtedly God keepeth those whole God he is, and y<sup>e</sup> not only as touching y<sup>e</sup> mind, or as touching y<sup>e</sup> body only, but as touching y<sup>e</sup> whole & ful nature. And of so great force & waight is this promise, y<sup>e</sup> by it Christ proued the resurrection of the dead. For, soasmuch as God affirmeth himselfe to be the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob, he thereby firmly concludeth, that they liue, and that their bodies shall be restored vnto them in the resurrection. And it is wonderfull, how they dare affirme, that the baptisme of infantes is a new institution in the church. For Cyprian a most auncient writer maketh mencio<sup>n</sup> of it, & sayth that it is not of necessity, that we should tary till the eight day for the baptising of the: For the truth of the Gospel hath deliuered vs fr<sup>o</sup> the obseruing of the number of daies. Wherefore they may well be baptised, what day soener the Church shall be assembled together. Origene also writing vpon this epistle and vpon Leuiticus, sufficiently declareth, that infantes were in his tyme accustomed to be baptised. And sithen these men were not long after the Apostles tyme, neither make they mencion of it as a thyng inuented by them, or in their tyme, it sufficiently appeareth, that that maner came from the Apostles. They say that Higinus bishop of Rome was y<sup>e</sup> first autho<sup>r</sup> thereof, which vndoubtedly can not be proued by his decrees. We read indeede, that he made a law for Susceprores, whom they call Godfathers and Godmothers, which without doubt was a profitable order. For his meaning was, y<sup>e</sup> when infantes should by baptisme be receiued into the church, they should be commended vnto the faith of some men, of whom to be instructed. And for the performance of this, the Godfathers and Godmothers do bynde their faith: although now a dayes they regard nothing lesse. But it is a very weake argument thereby to gather, that Higinus was the first autho<sup>r</sup>, that infantes should be baptised, because he instituted Susceprores. Pea rather sithen he made a decree as touching that thyng, it is probable that the baptisme of infantes was before that tyme in vse. They cite more ouer Tertullian in his little booke of baptisme, which is very elegantly writte. But soasmuch as that man in his latter age fell from the true sayth vnto the heresy of Montanus, his authority in this thyng can not be of so greate force: for he also condemned second mariages, & disallowed the baptisme of infantes against the receiued vse of the Church. And if we should follow his opinion, neither young men that lead a sole lyfe, nor wydowes that are yong women ought to be baptised. For he affirmed, that this sacrament ought not to be administered but to the only very late, and that are of a very ripe age. But it may be sufficiently declared by the

It was the manner in his time that infants should be baptised.

selfe same Tertullian, that even in his time the manner was that children should be baptised. For he would neuer haue reprobated it, vnles it had then bene in vse and practise. But now I will returne to the Apostle.

Knowing this that our olde man is crucified with him, that the body of sinne should be abolished: that henceforth vve should not be seruantes vnto sinne. This is the entent of the Apostle, to teach, that they which are of Christ, ought to dye vnto sinne. And he setteth forth the communion which we haue with the death and resurrection of Christ, which communion he proueth by baptism. For by baptism we are proued to be grafted into Christ, to this ende, that the olde man should be crucified in vs, and that we should no more be addicted vnto sinne. Chrysostome vpon this place sayth, that regeneration is two manner of wayes: one which consisteth of the forgiveness of sinnes: an other which we obtaine after iustification in leading our life holily and innocently: the first he confesseth to come vnto vs by the gift of God: but in the other he sayth is required our diligence. Vhereto this his sentence is true. For vnto the first regeneration are not required any of our workes: but for the performance of the other, it becometh them that are iustified, to worke together with grace and with the holy ghost. But I can not tell how he, a little after ward forgetting himselfe, sayth, that we vnto that first regeneration do bring sayth of our selues. Which is most repugnant vnto the truth.

How Chrysostome vnderstandeth sayth to be the gift of God

To attayne to faith it is not sufficient that God doth sette forth vnto vs thinges we should beleue.

The Olde man.

Not onely the body and grosser partes of the minde pertaine vnto the old man.

What the body of sinne is.

For Paul to the Ephesians teacheth, that sayth is the gifte of God, and is not of our selues. In expounding which place he thus vnderstandeth it: That sayth is the gifte of God, because we should not beleue vnles God called vs, and should set forth vnto vs those thinges which ought to be beleued. Wherefore his meaning is, that it lieth in our power, to assent vnto the calling, and promises of God which are offered vnto vs. But that is most many manifestly repugnant against very many testimonies of the scriptures. For in the Actes of the Apostles we reade of the woman that solde silkes, how that God opened her harte, to vnderstand those thinges which Paul preached. And Ezechiel teacheth, that God chaungeth the hartes of the godly, and of stony hartes maketh them fleshy hartes. Christ also saith, that no man can come vnto him, vnles he be drawen of the father. And David desireth of God, to incline the hartes of his to keepe his testimonies. We reade also in many places, that God boweth and hardeneth hartes. Lastly Paul in this selfe same epistle sayth, that it is not of him that willet, nor of him that runneth, but of God which hath compassion. But as touching this question, we will speake more at large after ward. Now let vs see, what Paul in this place vnderstandeth by the Olde man, which he sayth ought to be crucified with Christ: and what also he meaneth by the Body of sinne, which he affirmeth ought to be abolished. When he speaketh of the Olde man, he alludeth vnto Adam, and vnderstandeth the corrupt nature which we all haue contracted of him. Neither signifyeth he thereby (as some thinke) the body only, and grosser partes of the minde: but comprehendeth therewithall vnderstanding, reason, and will. For of all these partes consisteth man: and this malitiousnes and oldenes so cleaueth vnto vs (as the Greeke Scholies note) y the Apostle calleth it by the name of man. And men y are without Christ are so much addicted vnto their lustes, pleasures, and errors that without the they count not themselves to be men. Farther, by this Antithesis or comparison vnto the new man, we may vnderstand, what the olde man is. In the epistle to the Ephesians, we are commaunded to put on the new man, which is created according vnto God in all righteousness, and holynes of truth: And contrariwise: To put off the old man, which is corrupted according to the lusts of error. Wherefore Ambrose expounding this place saith. That the Apostle therefore calleth the deedes past the olde man. Because, euen as the new man is so called by reason of sayth, and a pure life, so is he called the old man by cause of his infidelity and euill deedes. The body of sinne also signifyeth nothing els, then the deprauation and corruption of our whole nature. For the Apostle would not, that by this word we should vnderstand the composition of our body. And naturall lust, although it be but one one thinge, yet by cause vnto it are associated and annexed all maner of sinnes, which as occasions are offered do burst forth, therfore it is expessed by the name of the bodye. And Paul vnto the Colossians after this selfe same maner calleth sondry sinnes, our members. Mortifie (sayth he) your members which are vpon the earth, namely fornication, vncleane, euill lust, auarice, and other which there follo we. And vndoubtedly vnles the spirit of Christ do prohibite our members, they are altogether organes and instrumētts of sinnes. Chrysostome vpon this place saith: That the Apostle calleth not this our body only so, but also all our malitiousnes: for so calleth he all our maliceousnes the old man. The Greke Scholies vnderstand by the body of sinne, our condemned nature. Although if we would referre that sentence vnto this our outward body, it may seme that Paul so spake, for that all wicked lust and all corruption of nature is drawen from nature by the body. This is also to be marked, that the Apostle setteth our corrupt nature as contrary vnto the spirite, but yet by sondry names, sometimes by the name of flesh, sometimes by the name of the body of sinne, sometimes by the name of the old man, and sometimes of the outward man, and sometimes by the name of naturall man, all which things signifie whatsoeuer is in man besides Christ and regeneratiō, and also whatsoeuer withdra weeth vs from the law of God: Contrariwise by the name of the spirite he vnderstandeth all those thinges which are done in vs, by the inspiration, instinction, and motion of the holy ghost: wherfore Ambrose by the body of sinne vnderstandeth also the soule, that is, the whole man. As contrariwise, the soule also in the holy scriptures signifieth sometimes the body, and the whole man. This word flesh also sometimes comprehendeth all the partes of a man that is not yet regenerate. For Christ when he reasoned with Nicodemus of regeneratiō, whatsoeuer (saith he) is born of the flesh is flesh: by which words he sheweth, that the flesh ought to be regenerated into the spirite. And forasmuch as regeneration pertayneth not only vnto the body, nor only vnto the grosser partes of the minde, but chiefly vnto vnderstanding, reason, and will, it sufficiently appeareth that these thinges also are vnderstand by the name of flesh. And Ambrose sayth, that the flesh is sometimes called the soule which followeth the vices of y body. Christ also answered vnto Peter when he had made y notable confession, Flesh and blood hath not reueled these thinges vnto thee. Wherby fleshe and blood he vnderstandeth, whatsoeuer humane reason can by nature come to the knowledge of. Wherfore to retayne still the body of sinne, and the old mā, is nothing els, then to liue according to that estate wherein we are borne. And if a man demaund whither these naturall knowledges grafted in vs touching God and outward dedes, are to be counted good or no: I answer, y of theselues they are good: but as they are in vs not yet regenerate, but vitiate & corrupt, vndoubtedly they are sinnes: by cause they sayle and stray from the cōstitution of they nature. For they ought to be of such force, that they should impell and drive all our strengths and faculties to obey him. But they are so weake, that they can not moue vs to an vprighte life and to the true worshipping of God: which selfe thing we iudge also of the naturall affections towards our parents, frendes, countrey and other such like. For although these thinges of their owne nature are good and honest, yet in vs, that are not yet grafted into Christ, they are sinnes. For we referre them not according as we ought vnto the glory of only true God, and father of our Lord Iesus Christ: nether do we them of faith without which whatsoeuer is done is sin. And Paul sayth, τοῦτο γινώσκοντες, that is knowing this, and a litle after ward, ἐδόξα λόγισα which wordes teach, that those thinges which are here sayd, ought to be most assured and certayne vnto vs, and perfectly known of vs so that euery godly man should fele this in hym selfe. This kinde of speach hath an Antithesis vnto that which was sayd at the beginninge: Know ye not, that as many as are baptised into Christ Iesus, are baptised into his death: as though he should haue said. Of this thing ye ought not to be ignorant. And if ye once perfectly know this principle, the those thinges which thereof follow, can not but be knowen of you. Let it not seme stragg that Paul doth by so many, & so sundry figure hyperboles, I say, & metaphors exaggerat & aggr-uaterh is matter namely, That we are dead vnto sin, & are buried with Christ, and the old man is crucified, that the body of sinne should be abolished, and such other like. For we neuer sufficiently knowe our selues, neither doo we abhorre, so much as it behoueth vs from our naturall corruption, and from the sins which do spring therof. Yea rather there are very many, which vnder the prettice of prayse of nature, and of the workes of God, do highly commend many things, which by bery god right ought to be condemned: especially when they are sinnes. The meaning therfore of this place is, that now by the grace of Christ and profession of bap-tisme, the old man is crucified: and that it ought continually so to be kept vnder, that the body, that is, the multitude of sins which spring out of it, should be abolished. And although in this lyfe we can not obtaine, to be utterly free from falling sometimes, yet ought all our endeour to tende to this ende, that euen as Christe gaue not himselfe partly, but wholly vnto the crosse for our sakes, so also ought we to die, not onely to one or two kindes of sinnes, but utterly to all kindes of sinnes.

And this crucifieng, if we haue a respect vnto the first communion, which we haue with the death and resurrection of Christ, commeth first of the holy ghost, and free mercy of God. But when we are once through faith regenerate, and are translated from Adam vnto Christ, it behoueth vs to put to our labour, endenour, and diligence. And therefore Paule vnto the Galathians writeth, that they which are of Christe, haue crucified theyr fleshe, wyth the lustes therof. And that worthely. For si-then they are members of Christ, it is mete, that they be conformentable vnto their hed. And Ambrose noteth, that we together wyth the fleshe do crucifie the Deuill, because he by the meanes of it, is of efficacy in vs.

That henceforth we should not be seruantes vnto sinne. He stil more plainly declareth, what this meaneth, the body of sinne to be abolished. And this is the meanynge, that we should not obey our naturall lust, thorough committing of di-uers wicked vices. And by the worde of bondage or seruitude, he sheweth, that he layeth before vs not thinges impossible, but things that aboue all other are to be desired: namely, that we might be set at liberty. Neither spake he that to this end that sinne should by no manner of waye remayne in vs: for, that is impossible, so long as we liue in this world. But therfore he so admonisheth vs, that we shoulde not be seruantes vnto sinne.

For he that is dead, is iustified from sinne. Wherefore if we be dead with Christ, we beleue, that we shal also liue with him. Knowing that Christ beyng rayled from the dead, dieth no more: Death hath no more dominion ouer hym. For as touchyng that he died, he died concernyng sinne once: and as touchyng that he lyueth, he li-ueth vnto God. Lyke wyse consider ye also, that ye are dead as touchyng sinne, but are aliuie vnto God through Jesus Christ our lord.

For he that is dead, is iustified from sinne. The reason why we should not be seruantes vnto lust, is this: namely, because we are by death deliuered from it.
For, to be iustified from sinne, is as much, as to be deliuered from it, so that henceforth it hath no more power ouer vs. And Paul seemeth here to speake not of the death of nature, but of mortification, wherof I haue so oftentimes spoken. And ius-tification may be here taken properly, for that mortificatio may be the effect ther-of. For we cannot attain vnto it, vnles we be first iustified. Although some not vir-aptly vnderstand this place of the vsual and natural death. For they that are dead, do cease of from the wicked workes, in which they before liued. And we vse to say of a thefe that is now hanged, that he will steale no more: and the prouerbe is, a deade man biteth not. Wherefore, if we followe this sence, then shall it be a metaphore that euen as they which are naturallye deade, do forsake and finishe the sinnes

sinnes, which whilst they liued, they committed: so we, forasmuch as we are dead vnto Christ, and haue professed, that we will dye vnto sinne, oughte bitterlye to cease from synne. These wordes of Paul are no other wyse to bee vnderstande, then are these wordes of John: He which is borne of GOD synneth not. That is, in that euerye one lyueth and woorketh oute of the principle and grounde of the heauenlye nativitye. And this principle or grounde is the holye Ghoste, and the wynde of GOD. So he is saide to be losed from sinne, and not to doe any thing by the impulsion thereof, which is dead vnto sinne, and is crucified together with Christ, in that he is dead, and fastened vnto the crosse. And euen so teacheth Peter in his first epistle the 4. chapter: Forasmuch as Christ hath suffred for vs in the fleshe, be ye armed with the selfe same cogitation: For he which is deade ceaseth to sinne: neyther liueth he in the desires of men, but in the will of the Lord God.

Wherefore if we be dead with Christ, we beleue that we shall also liue with him. ] To the ende we should not be afrayd at the name of death, which he hath befoze so often made mencion of, he presently addeth a consolation, declaring that vnto this death which he hath spoken of, is annexed the life of Christ: so that if we dye together with Christ, we shall also liue together with him. And this life is not only that, which we looke for, in the world to come, but also it is euen that life which we now leade: which in very dede is one and the selfe same with the life to come: but that this is only a life begonne and vnperfect, but the other is perfect and absolute. For we which beleue in Christ, and are iustified, do also euen now presently leade the life of God. For we are driuen and moued not of our selues, but of the spirit of God. But what maner of life this life of Christ is, which is in the meane tyme communicated vnto vs, whilst we liue in this world, the Apostle straight way declareth.

Knowing that Christ being raysed from the dead, dieth no more, death hath no more dominion ouer him. ] As the life of Christ is neuer extinguished by any death, so the life of the children of God and brethren of Christ oughte not to be quenched by sinnes. But why Christ dyeth no more, this is the cause, for that he hath ouercome death, and taken away sinne: by whose meanes only death was vpholden, and bare dominion. For vnto the Corinthians it is written, The sting of death is sinne: and in this epistle, death raigned by sinne. Wherefore they which are pertakers of the death of Christ, neither ought nor can any longer be subiect ether vnto sinne, or vnto death. But it is after one maner in vs, and after an other maner in Christ. For his death (as Augustine saith in his booke de Trinitate) was simple and but of one sort: but ours is double or of two sortes. For in him only the body dyed, for his soule was neuer without the eternall and true life: forasmuch as sinne had neuer place in him. But in vs both body and soule were deade by reason of sinne. Wherefore euen as Christ dyeth not agayne, as touching the body, so also ought not we by sin to dye ether in body or in soule. Otherwise y one ly one death of Christ should not (as he saith) bying remedy vnto our double death. Neither wanteth this an emphasie, that the Apostle in this place doubleth one and the selfe same sentence: when he sayth: He dieth no more, also, death hath no more dominion ouer him. For he would haue vs fully to vnderstand, that death is cleane remoued away from Christ. Neither yet ought we by these wordes to inferre, that death sometimes so bare dominion ouer Christ, that he was compelled to dye. For he sayth, that no man coulde take away his life from him: but that he himselfe had power both to lay away his life, and also to take it agayne. Christ freely and willingly became subiect vnto death: wherefore we also, forasmuch as we are his members, and mysticall body, ought freely and of our owne accord to dye together with Christ: and that in such sort, that we will no more dye, that is, we will no more be subiect vnto the guiltines, death, and damnation of our sinnes.

For as touching that he died, he died vnto sinne once: and as touching that he liueth, he liueth vnto God. ] That Christ died vnto sinne but once only, is declared by that which is written vnto the Hebrewes, that he by one only obla-

The principles of the heauenly regeneration

After regeneration we leade the life of God.

Why Christ dieth no more.

The death of Christ was simple but ours is double.

Christ was not compelled to dye.

It also sufficent for vs that we die once vnto sinne.

tion made perfect all things: so that he referreth this Once, and vniue, vnto the fulnes and perfection of the thing done. It was sufficient that Christ died but once. Wherefore it ought also to be sufficient vnto vs, that we dye but once vnto sinne, neither ought we so to deale, that we shoulde alwayes haue new causes to dye agayne. But this is to be noted, that Christ and we are diuersly sayde to dye vnto sinne. For Christ had no sinne in hym, whereunto he shoulde dye. For he died for the sinne which was in vs. But we ought to dye vnto that sinne, which we still cary aboute in our selues. Farther, out of this place are inferred two things, first, if Christ died but once, and that that was sufficient, then is there no nede, that he shoulde agayne be dayly sacrificed in Passes. For his one only death was sufficient for the satisfaction of all sinnes. For the sacrificing priestes can not performe that thing which they vse so much to boast of, namely, to applye the death of Christ at their pleasure vnto this man, or to that man. For euery man by his owne sayth taketh hold of it, and applyeth it vnto himselfe. Moreover out of this place is inferred, that baptism ought not to be ministred vnto one man any more then once only, forasmuch as in it we dye together with Christ. And sithen he dyed but once only, we therefore ought in no case to repete it any oftener. Which thing the epistle vnto the Hebrewes manifestly teacheth: for there it is wrytten, that that is no thing els then again to crucifie the sonne of God, and to make him a gazing stock. The sealing of the promise of God, which we receaue in baptism, neuer loseth his force and strength. For whilst we call to memory that we are baptised (so that sayth be present) by the remembrance of that sealing we are both confirmed touching the promise, and also are admonished touching the leading of the lyfe of Christ. But we before haue alleaged many mo reasons, why baptism ought not to be repeted. In that Christ is sayd to liue vnto God, it signifieth not only that he liueth blessedly, but also that he cleaueth vnseparably vnto God. Which thing we also ought to do, if we will be true Christians. And therefore he concludeth the whole reason in these wordes:

So also consider ye, that ye are dead as touching sin, but are on liue vn to God, through Iesus Christ our Lord. These wordes signifie as much as if he should haue sayde: That which was done in Christ, ought also to be done in vs. Wherefore seing he died only once, and now liueth perpetually vnto God, we ought to haue a care that the selfe same thing should be performed in vs. Hereby appeareth, how vniustly the doctrine of Paul was accused, as though he shoulde teach that we should abide in sinne, that grace might abound. And that we should commit euill, that good might thereof ensue. For he teacheth clene contrarily, that euen as Christ euer liueth vnto God, so ought we also euer to liue in Christ thorough innocency of liue. Which selfe doctrine the Lord taught in John, saying. As the liuing father hath sent me, and I liue for the father: euen so he that eaterh me, shall liue for me. Judge and consider sayth he, that ye are dead vnto sinne, but liue vnto God. For (as sayth Chrysostome) this thing is not done by nature, neither can it be shewed by the outward sence: but is perceaued by sayth only. Wherefore consider (sayth he) and dayly ponder this in your mynde.

Through Christ Iesus our Lord. This is added that we shoulde knowe, that all these thinges are receaued onely by his benefite, and not by humane strengths, or naturall reason.

Let not sinne therefore raigne in your mortall bodye, that ye should thereunto obey by the lustes of it. Neither geue ye your members as instrumentes of vnrightheousnes vnto sinne, but geue ouer your selues vnto God, as they of dead are on liue. And geue ouer your members as instrumentes of rightheousnes vnto God. For sinne shall not haue power ouer you. Because ye are not vnder the lawe, but vnder grace.

Let

We and Christ dye not after one and the selfe same manner.

It is not possible that Christ should dayly be sacrificed.

The sacrificing priestes do not by their Passes apply the death of Christ vnto others.

Baptisme ought not to be repeated.

Paul teacheth that we ought to liue vnto God, & not to abide in sinne.

Let not sinne raigne therefore in your mortall body. ] His reason now finished, he addeth an exhortation: which is indeede short, but yet of great waight. For it stirreth vs vp vnto that thing, wherein consisteth the chiefe felicity, which herein is contained, y<sup>e</sup> we should be most far remoued, fro<sup>m</sup> all euils, and continually being well occupied, leade a most vertuous lyfe. Wherefore Paulus meanynge is, that we shoulde caste away synne: Whiche is to remoue from vs the nature of euill. Whatsoeuer euill and infelicity there is in vs, the same is wholly deryued from synne. Farther he commaundeth vs, to deryue our actions from the groundes and principles taught of God. The philosophers as firme that action to be most perfect, which springeth of the most noblest vertue. Wherefore, soasmuch as we doo confesse that al our strengths and faculties, are moued and impelled by God, that is by the most chiefe goodnes, of necessity it followeth, that the workes which springe thereof, are of most perfection: For God is farre much moze perfect then all humane vertue. Wherefore if whatsoeuer we doo, we do it by his impulsio<sup>n</sup>, the<sup>n</sup> shal we attain vnto a good end, & vnto most high felicity. Paul speaketh of sinne by the figure Prosopopxia, and exhorteth vs not to suffer it to raigne in vs. Which selfe so<sup>r</sup>me of speaking he befoze when he sayd, that death raigned from Adam euen vnto Moses. By the mortall body (sayth Ambrose) is vnderstand the whole ma<sup>n</sup>, euen as sometimes the whole man is signified by the soule. For confirmatio<sup>n</sup> whereof, he citeth these words of Ezechiel: The soule which sinneth, it shall dye: And he affirmeth that that is to be vnderstand of ether part of man. Chrysostome thinketh that therfoze the body is called mortall, to teach vs, y<sup>e</sup> this battayle, which the Apostle exhorteth vs vnto against sin, shall not dure any long time, but a shorte time. Which battayle he supposeth is therfoze commended, bycause that sithen Adam although he had a body not subiect vnto death, yet refrained not from sinne. It shoulde be much moze laudable and excellēter for vs, if we in this mortall body shoulde eschew sins. But I thinke y<sup>e</sup> this particule. In your mortall body, signifieth nothing els, then if it shoulde haue bene sayd after the maner of the Hebrues, Through your mortall body. Forasmuch as that naturall concupiscence or lust, which y<sup>e</sup> Apostle would not haue to raigne in vs, is through the body deriued from Adam into vs, & receaueth in vs nourishments and entisements. For by generation and sede (as we haue befoze at large proued) originall sinne is traduced. And he addeth this word mortall, to encrease a contempte, and to lay before our eyes that such a forwardnes is condemned vnto the punishment of death, whereby to feare vs away the moze from the obedience thereof. For it were very wicked, to preferre a thing condemned vnto death befoze the word of God and his spirite. The straight way declareth, what this meaneth, namely, sinne to raigne in vs. Which is nothing els then to be obedient vnto sinne. Wherefore he addeth.

That ye should therunto obey by the lustes of it. ] He saith in the plural number Lustes, because out of the corruption of nature which he a litle befoze called sinne in the singular number, doo continually spring forth an infinite number of lustes. Paul admonisheth vs that we should not obey them. He can not prohibite but that lust whilst we liue here, will exercise some tirany ouer vs ene although it be against our willes. Wherefoze this thing only he requireth, that we should not of our owne accord, and willingly obey it. For thys is to permitte vnto him the kingdome.

Nether apply your members as weapons of vnrightheousnes vnto sinne. ] He will moze plainly declareth, what it is to obey sinne. And that is, to geue our members as weapons vnto it. By members he vnderstandeth not only the parts of the body, but also all the faculties or powers of the soule. All these forbidde he to be applied of vs vnto sinne. He could haue bled an other word, namely that we should not geue our members organs and instrumentes to lustes. But by the name of weapons, he would the moze aggrauate the thing. For that signifieth, y<sup>e</sup> they which apply they<sup>r</sup> members vnto sinne, do fight & make war against

The difference betweene veniall & mortall finnes.

Weapons may serue both to a good and also to an euill vse.

Two properties of a iust kingdome.

Lust after regeneration is called sin.

Concupiscence or lust is Sinne not onely by a metaphore but also properly.

God & do wth all the strengths both of their body & of their soule withst<sup>and</sup> his will & law. Out of this place is gathered the difference betwene mortall sins & veniall finnes. For when we withstand and resist the lustes, those troublesome motions, and entisements bursting forth of our naturall corruption (forasmuch as they are repugnant vnto the lawe of God) are vndoubtedly finnes: but yet because they are displeasaunte vnto vs, and we resist them, and doo leaue some place vnto fayth, and vnto the spirite of God, therefore they are forgotten vs, neither are they imputed vnto death, but contrariwise when we obey the, and do repell the mocion of the spirit of God, and worke against our conscience, or at the leaste waye with a conscience corrupted, so that those things which are euill, we count good, or iudge good things euill, the vndoubtedly we sinne deadly: for thereby we make sinne to raigne in vs. Paul, whilst he bygeth these things, semeth to admonish vs, that we should not receiue grace in bayne or without fruite: as he also admonished the Corinthians in his latter epistle. Hereby we gather, that the members and powers of them that are regenerate, ought to be so prompt and redy vnto the obeyssaunce of God, as are the powers and members of the vngodly prone & redy to commit sinne. And we are plainly taught that we ought to fight. And in the Epistle vnto the Ephesians we are commaunded, to fight not only agaynst flesh and blood, but also against naughtines, and wycked celestiaall spirites. For they are mighty and of efficacy against vs, thorough the body, flesh, and blood. For even as weapons may serue both to a good and also to an euill vse (for sometyme a theefe occupieth them against his countrey: and sometimes a good citizen bleseth the to defend his countrey) so the members of our body & powers of our mynde, may fight on righteousness side, and also against sinne. We see moreover what difference there is betwene a kingdome, and a tyrannous gouernment. We obey tyrannes against our willes, but vnto kings we obey willingly: for by their good and iust lawes the publike wealth is established. Therefore there are two things which follow in a iust and lawfull kingdome. For first all men of their owne voluntary wil & accord, obey the king: vnles peraduenture, there be some wicked or seditious persons. Moreover they are redy to fight for his sake. But it is farre otherwise where tyranny raigneth: for none will gladly and willingly obey tyrants: neither will they fight in their quarels. Therefore Paul although he cannot prohibite in vs the tyranny of sinne, but that of it we suffer many things against our willes, yet he forbiddeth that it should raigne in vs. And he by name excludeth those two things, which we haue now reherfed, that is to say, that we should not obey it, nor beare weapons with it against righteousness. And very warily ioyneth he vnrightheousnes with sinne. For all they which sinne, do worke vnrightheousnes either agaynst themselves, or against their neighbours, or els against God: for against some one of these, sinne euer worketh injury. This is also to be marked, that Paul in this place expessedly calleth that lust, sin, which remaineth in vs after regeneration: which is not only in such maner so called, as a writing is called a hand, or cold is called flouthfull. For a writing is called a hand, because it is written with the hand, and cold is called flouthful, because it maketh vs flouthfull. So nourishment & lust, which after regeneration is still in vs, is both a remnaunt of Originall sin, and also stirreth vs vp to sinne, and therefore is called sinne. But besides these two reasons which are metaphoricall, it is also of his owne nature sinne. For sinne according to the true definicion thereof, is that, which in vs is by any meanes repugnant vnto the lawe of God. Therefore seeing that lust which remaineth after Baptisme, is repugnant vnto the lawe of God, and stirreth vs vp against it, it cannot but be sin. Neither is this to be admitted, which some commonly boast of: namely, that there is no sinne, vnles it be voluntary and committed by free election. For this definition agreeth not with sinne vniuersally, but only with that sinne which is called actual. For otherwise originall sinne should not be called sinne. For no man contracteth it willingly or of his owne election. Therefore let vs agree with Paul what soeuer wicked lust remaineth in vs after regeneration, the same is sinne. Wea rather ther if we would rightly weigh the matter within our selues, actual sinnes shall appeare to be partes of our naturall lust: or to speake more vprightly, euil fruites comming of that euill roote. The Apostle concludeth that we ought not to fight in the quarell of sinne or vnrighteousnes: but rather we must apply our selues vnto God, which hath both created vs, and also perpetually gouerneth and renueth vs through Christ.

Actual sinnes are the fruites of originall sinne.

But applye your selues vnto God, as they that of deade are on lyue, and geue ouer your members as weapons of righteousness vnto God. In that he sayth: that we shoulde applye our selues vnto God, he excludeth not thys, whiche in an other place he sayth: namely, that God woorketh in vs. The Apostle speaketh here of men regenerate: whiche for that they are in some parte made newe, may bee fellowe woorkers of God. And therefore they ought continually to be admonished, to obey the institutio of the holy ghost. Farther by these kindes of speeches is shewed the difference betwene those actions, which God stirreth vp in me, and those actions which he woorketh in stocks and stones, and also in brute beastes. For in stocks and stones he so woorketh, that they neither fele nor desire any thing. In brute beastes he so woorketh, that he bleseth theyr sence and appetite, for they haue neither will nor reason. But in me (and especially in them that are regenerate, and are his) he so woorketh, that he bleseth the strengthes of theyr reasonable soule, wherewith they are endued. And forasmuch as we are sayd to moue our selues according to these powers, it ought not to seme straining, if Paul write, that we should geue ouer our selues vnto God: for he speaketh of our nature, as is mete for it to worke. And yet nevertheless this absoerth firme and vnechangeable, that whatsoever good thing is wrought of vs, the same is wholly wrought in vs by God and his spirite. Farther he addeth: Pour selues, because he requireth the strengthes not only of the body and of the minde, but also the whole and perfect man.

Men regenerate are the fellow woorkers of God.

How God woorketh in men.

As they that of deade are on liue. We ought to exhibite our selues aliuely: namely, with the life of God, whiche herein consisteth that we shoulde be moued by the spirite of Christ, and whatsoever we do, we shoulde doo it by his impulsio. For they liue vnto God and vnto Christ, which are moued vnto the best things and which utterly passe the nature of man. Wherefore this life of God, whereof we now intreate, differeth two maner of waies from the common life of me: first, for that it floweth from an other ground or principle, namely, from the spirite of Christ: secondly, because it tendeth to an other end, then doth theyr life which are moued by Sathan: for they alwayes runne hedlong into most grievous euils, and at the length fall into eternall distructio, and therefore as touching God, they ought to be sayd and also to be counted dead. But such were we sometimes also: for which cause Paul sayth, As they that of deade are on liue. Although this be the playner and simpler sence to referre this sentence vnto that death, whereof was before made mencion: namely, whereby we being conuerted vnto Christ, do dye vnto sinne. For they that are such, can not but exhibite themselves bening vnto God, which thing being brought to passe, straight waye followeth that which Paul addeth, That your members also may be geuen ouer as weapons of righteousness vnto God. Here is agayne signified vnto vs, that when we come once to God, we ought to fight in his cause. And forasmuch as God is ioy ned with our righteousness, it sufficiently appeareth, that we haue not our righteousness of our selues, but of him.

The life of God in what thinges it differeth fro the corrupte life of men.

For sinne shall not haue power ouer you. For ye are not vnder the law, but vnder Grace. These thinges are added, as though he shoulde haue sayd, Fight stoutely and with a valiaunt courage: for it shall neuer come to passe, that sin shall beare dominion ouer you, which thing yet shoulde happen, if ye shoulde not fight. And hereby he assureth them, that they shall haue the victorie, because they haue the grace of God to helpe them, whose might and strength is farre greater then the power of our lust. For the spirite of Christ and his grace can easelye

The grace of God is mightier then our lust.

same and overcome sinne: ye are not sayd to be under the law, which only sheweth what is to be done, and bringeth no helpe at all thereto. Chrysostome in this place admonisheth, that the law sheweth only what is to be done, or what is to be avoided: but nothing helpeth or aydeth them that trasle: but only setteth forth a bare exhortation of wordes. But the Gospell setteth forth Christe, of whome are ministred the holye ghost and strength to accomplishe good thing, which through faith we haue knowen. And thereby commeth to passe, that men execute theyr office not beinge compelled of feare, but of theyr owne accord and willingly. Whiche his saynges are not so to be vnder stande, as though the fathers whiche liued in the olde tyme vnder the lawe, were bitterlye boydes of grace. For they also beleued in Christe. But here Paul so speaketh of the lawe, to put a difference betwene it and the Gospell and Christ, as did the Hebrewes at that tyme. Wherefore if the fathers were confirmed by the helpe of grace and of the holy ghost, y came not then vnto them by the lawe. Wherefore Paul sayth, so farre is it of that ye ought to be subiect vnto sinne, that ye also are free euen from the lawe. And he semeth to drawe his argument from the effectes. For soasmuch as the lawe was therefore only geuen, that sinne shoulde be felt and perceaued, then the lawe being taken away, it plainly appeareth, that as touching the beleuers, the strengthes of sinne are now broken, so that it can no more beare dominion ouer vs. For that children ought by reason of age to be hydded from errors, they haue appointed vnto them scholemasters to chastise them, and to keepe them vnder. But afterward when through age and discretion, ignorance, and error are gone, the scholemasters are taken away from them. So here Paul speaketh vnto the saythful: Ye are no more in age like children, that ye haue nede of the hydle of the lawe. Wherefore sinne shall not get the mastery ouer you, so that ye fight. Whose commentaries whiche are ascribed vnto Ierome, haue vpon this place a very trim similitude: When a yonge man is brought from Grammer vnto Rhetorike, he is warned no more to be incongrue lattine, soasmuch as he is no more vnder a Grammatician, but vnder a Rhetorician. And euē by the same selfe reason the Apostle saith, Sin shall no more haue dominion ouer you, because ye are not now vnder the law, but vnder Grace. Ambrose sayth: When we walke not as the lawe commaundeth, then are we vnder the lawe. Sinne by the authority of the lawe maketh the sinner guilty. And whome the lawe maketh guilty, those are deliuered vnto it of sinne. Wherefore he can not be vnder the law, which hath renounced sinne. Contrariwise he which fighteth against sinne, is not vnder the law. Paul in these wordes semeth by pꝛeuention, to comfort the Romanes. For they mought haue sayd: Although we geue ouer our selues vnto God, as they that of dead are on liue, and though we applye our members as weapons of righteousness vnto God, yet can we not bying to passe, whilst we continue in this life, but that we shall now and then sinne. Paul answereth, although there be grafted in you a naturall lust, yet it shall not raigne in you. For soasmuch as ye are not vnder the law, sinne shall not beare dominion ouer you. For sinne through the Grace, vnder which through Christ ye liue, shall not be imputed vnto you: And your obedience, although it be but begonne and imperfect, yet shall it be acceptable vnto God, notwithstanding it satisfieth not the lawe. For ye are not vnder the lawe. And according to this meaning Paul afterward sayth, There is now no condemnation vnto those which are in Christ Iesus. For the lawe in accusing and condemning, pꝛeuaileth nothing agaynst them that beleue. For Christ hath deliuered them from the curse of the lawe. But they do not a litle erre, which thinke that these things are written onely of the ceremonies of the law, and of the iudiciall lawes: as though we are still bounde vnto the ten Commandementes. For soasmuch as Paul entreateth in this place of sinne, whose kingdome we ought to beware of, that we be not obedient vnto it through lustes, and straight way maketh mention of the lawe, which was made agaynst it, it most manifestly appeareth, that in these wordes are also comprehended the ten Commandementes. For in the commandementes are our lustes most of all prohibited, and restrained. And soasmuch as to the Galathians it is written, That by Christ we are deliuered from the curse of the law: and in Leuiticus the 27. chapter, and also in Dent. are mentioned those which are execrated and cursed: namely, they which make a molten image or an idol, which geue not due honour vnto father & mother, which make the blind to erre, which strike their neighbour (all which thinges pertain vnto the tenne Commandementes) it is manifest that by Christ we are deliuered chiefly from them. Wherefore let vs vse this distinction, that as touching iustification, we are sayd to be exempted from the lawe, because by it we seeke not our righteousness before God: for already are we iustified through faith in Christ. But on the other side, we are not loosed from the obedience which we owe vnto God, but that we ought of necessity to do those thinges, which are prescribed vnto vs in x. commandements. Wherefore y<sup>e</sup> lawe also, as touching y<sup>e</sup> part which is morall, forasmuch as it nether condemneth, nor accuseth, nor compelleth y<sup>e</sup> elect, is said to be abrogated: for these are y<sup>e</sup> chiefest proprieties of y<sup>e</sup> law. As touching the ciuile precepts of Moses, no man doubteth, but y<sup>e</sup> they are now no more in force. For the Gospel, as it taketh not away any helpes pertaining vnto mans life: so doth it in no case take away ciuile administration, but leaueth vnto all nations they<sup>r</sup> forme of rule and gouernement, so that it be not repugnant vnto the word of God, and vnto pierce. God in dede gaue vnto the Israelites those lawes, that by them they<sup>r</sup> publike welth should be gouerned: but afterward when his will was, that it should so be cleane dissipated, that it should neuer hereafter be restored agayne, he would that those lawes, which pertained vnto ceremonies, should quite be cutte of, and abolished. For they were only a certayne doctrine to leade vs vnto Christ, who when he was once come, it was conuenient that they should vnterly be taken away. Neither should it haue auayled vs, any longer to haue retained the ceremonies of the Iewes. For forasmuch as men would haue perswaded them selues, y<sup>e</sup> by them they should haue God pacified and mercifull, of necessity some part of y<sup>e</sup> glory of Christ would thereby haue bene diminished: for it is he only, by whome God is pacified towards men. Wherefore by Christ we are deliuered, as well from the ceremonies, as also from the ciuile lawes of the Iewes. But some are in doubt, how it cometh to passe, that sithen all these partes are abrogated, so that of ceremonies and ciuile lawes there remaineth nothing, yet (as we haue now taught) we are bound vnto the Ten commandementes as touching the obedience thereof. Hereunto I answer, that no man fulfilleth the Ten commandementes, though he be neuer so holpe: for all our workes are so imperfect: that they answer not vnto the precept and rule thereof. Howbeit by cause the precepts which are there containned are agreeable vnto the law of nature, and are grafted, and printed in our minde, it cometh per accidens, that is by chance, that the good workes, vnto which, the children of God being now regenerate thorough the holy ghost are stirred by, are one and the selfe same with those workes which are written in the Ten commandementes. For it is mete for them whome God hath adopted to be his childre, that they apply them selues vnto good workes, and to such workes as are acceptable vnto God. And those workes are vnterly one and the selfe same with those, which nature rightly instructed bringeth forth of his owne accord, and which the Ten commandementes appoynted by God containeth. But so is it not of ceremonies, and ciuile or iudiciall lawes: for they are not so known of all men, that they appeare vnto all men by right and iust, if they should iudge of them by the light of nature only. Paul to encourage them that fight, putteth them in remembrance, to consider, that they liue vnder grace, and not vnder the lawe. For two wayes are the mindes of men accustomed to be stirred by vnto battayle: first, by the goodness of the cause, secondly, by the certaynty of victory and rewards. As touching the goodness of our cause, there is already spoken sufficiently: for in it we exhibite our selues vnto God, and for righteousness sake we fight agaynst sin and death. And now he promisseth also an assured victory: for he sayth, the grace of God is one our side. Grace, as touching this place signifieth two thinges: first, the for-genes of sinnes by imputing of righteousness thorough Christ: secondly, the gifts of the holy ghost, & the renning of our strengths. This latter part because it is receaued in vs corrupt and filthy vessels, although it is somewhat worthy to drawe vs from sinning, yet it is not such, that we ought to leane and trust vnto it. For our workes, though they be succored and holpen by these aydes, yet are they not so perfect, that they can stand in the iudgement of God. But by the first kinde of exhortation, we receaue greate consolation in our consciences. For although in our sight, sinne doth thrust in it selfe, whether we will or no, yet ought we not to be discouraged, so much as we assuredly know, that it is not imputed vnto vs for Christs sake. For liuen thorough Christe we are receaued of God into fauor, our workes (although otherwise they be imperfect) yet for his sake are acceptable vnto God. But Paul encourageth his souldiers with bothe these kindes of exhortation, when as he admonisheth them, both that they are vnder grace, and also that they haue the holy ghost a stay and an helpe vnto them: so that sinne which is naturallie planted in them, shall not be able to destroye them. But it shall be good to note certayne differences betweene the Lawe, and betweene Grace, which Chrysostome also noteth: The law (sayth he) setteth forth a crowne, but first requireth workes and battayles: grace first crowneeth, and afterwarde bringeth vnto the battayle. By this difference he teacheth, that the righteousness which is set forth of the Lawe, is obteyned by workes. For we can not be iustified by the Lawe, vnlesse wee haue accomplished all the thinges which are commaunded in the lawe. But that other righteousness, which we haue by grace thorough faith, doth first crowne vs with a new generation, and adoptiō to be the children of God: and then we being regenerate, it bringeth vs forth vnto battayles and vnto good workes. Hereunto Chrysostome addeth: The lawe reproveth sinne, but loseth not from sinne: grace loseth from sinne, and reproveth not: The lawe reproveth sinne encreaseth it: grace forgoueth it, suffereth vs not to be vnder sinne. These things are true and very agreeable with Pauls saying: but that which he addeth not long afterwarde: namely, That before the coming of Christ, the body of man, when he liued vnder the law, was such that it might easily be overcome of sinne, because the helpe of the holy ghost was not yet present, neither also Baptisme nor mortification: but man (for that the law shewed only what was to be done, but nothing helped therunto) went at randon and erred like an unbridled horse. This (I say) if it be vnderstande vniuersally of al men, is not true. For who dare presume to say, that David, Esay, Jeremy, Daniell, and a great many more holy fathers wanted the holy ghost: or the grace of regeneration, which was sealed by Circumcision, as ours is by baptisme? Or who will thinke, that they wanted mortification, whereby they brake the wicked appetites and lustes springing in them? Wherefore those wordes of Chrysostome are to be vnderstande of the vngodly, which had utterly reiecte Christ from them, and liued only vnder the letter of the law, and sayned vnto themselves a Messias, which should come to bring only an earthly kingdome, and procure worldly riches and pleasures vnto the people of the Jewes, of which manner of men, there were many among the Jewes. And since the coming of Christ we haue no small number not much unlike vnto these, which onely in name are Christians. But to returne vnto Paul, he comforteth them by reason of easines, and promisseth vnto the victorie, because they are vnder grace. In this place are reproveth those, which commaund vs perpetually to doubt, whether we be in the fauor of God, or no. For they which in such manner doubt, do receiue no fruit of this consolation of Paul. For thus they thinke with themselves, how can we certainly know, that we are vnder grace? For peradventure we are strangers from God, and are by reason of our sinnes odious vnto him: for how can we be assured, that they are for Christ his sake forgiven vs? But by this meanes the reason of Paul is utterly overthrowne. Wherefore it behooveth, that with an assured sayth, and an vndoubted hope, which confoundeth not, we certainly appoint that God loveth vs, & hath thorough Christ receiued vs into fauor. And so shall we out of these wordes of Paul receiue wonderfull derfull great comfort. Now haue we finished the first part of this chap. wherein Paul hath proued, that we ought not to abide in sinne, because we are now dead vnto it. And this hath he confirmed by the sacrament of baptisme. And when he had many wayes set forth this reason, he at the last added an exhortation, that we should not suffer sinne to raigne in vs, but should earnestly resist it, as much as we are able: and to the end we should not be faint harted, he comforteth vs in promising vs an easy victorie: because we are not vnder the law, but vnder grace.

What then: shal we sinne because we are not vnder the law, but vnder grace: God forbidde. Knowe ye not that to whomsoever ye geue your selues as seruantes to obey, his seruants ye are to whome ye obey: whether it be of sinne vnto death, or of obedience vnto righteousness: But God be thanked that ye were the seruants of sinne, but ye haue obeyed from the harte, vnto the forme of the doctrine, wherunto ye were deliuered. But being made free from synne, ye are made the seruantes of righteousness.

What? shall we therefore sinne, because we are not vnder the law, but vnder grace? Now cometh he vnto the second reason (whereby he entendeth to proue, y<sup>e</sup> we ought not to abide in sinnes) none otherwise then he came at the beginning of this chap. vnto his first reason. For euen as before he depresseth the law, & commendeth grace, wherupon his aduersaries toke occasiō of speaking standzous words, saying, shal we abide in sinne, that grace may abound? So concludeth he the reason now brought forth by these wordes: For ye are not vnder the lawe, but vnder grace. At whiche wordes the false prophetes cried out, saying, that many were offended, and accused the doctrine of Paul. And therefore he oftentimes obiecteth vnto himselfe such interrogations. For his doctrine for that cause was euer where euill spoken of. Wherefore here is vsed the figure Antipophora. If it be so, as thou sayst, that we are deliuered from the lawe, then may we sinne, and that without punishment. But they which make this objection, are wonderfully deceaued. For the deliuey from the lawe is not geuen to liue licenciously, but rather for a more perfecter absolutenes. Wherefore Paul addeth, God forbid, signifying that he exceedingly abhorred from such kinde of doctrine. And this absurdity might haue followed, if Paul had affirmed only, that we are deliuered from the lawe, and had added nothing els. But in that he addeth, But ye are vnder grace, he sheweth, that they are so deliuered from the lawe, to the ende they should lyue vnder a more excellenter scholemaster: for by grace and the holy ghost we are not only so illustrated, that we see what thinges we ought to do, but also we are exceedingly stirred vp and pricked forward to execute the selfe same thinges. Wherefore the Apostle doth not so leaue the godly without the lawe, that he woulde haue them let loose the bzidle vnto wicked lustes: but he setteth forth grace which through the benefite of the Gospell succeeded the lawe. And forasmuch as men are much better gouerned by grace, and by the holy ghost, then they are by the lawe, it easely appeareth, how weake the argument of these men is. For in their disputation they take (as it was said at the beginning) that, for the cause, which is not the cause. But so farre is it of, that that which Paul sayth is the cause of sinne, that of it rather the contrary followeth. For they which are vnder grace, and are gouerned by the conuite thereof, sinne not: yea rather forasmuch as Christ through grace liueth in them, they can not sinne, so farre forth as by hym they are stirred vp to any kynd of worke. For Paul sayth vnto the Galathians, I liue, but not I now: but Christ liueth in me. But they sinne which liue vnder the Lawe which accuseth and condemneth them: as Paul writeth vnto Timo. The law is not geuen vnto a righteous man, but vnto the vngodly, and vnto sinners, to the unholy, and to the prophane, to murderers of fathers and mothers, to manslayers, to whoremongers, and to abusers of nature: and if there be any other thing, that is contrary to wholesome doctrine. By these place we see, that they which are infected with these wicked vices, are vnder the dominion of the lawe: namely, by it to be accused and punished. But the Gospell suffreth vs not to remayne in sinne: for it doth not only preach the remission of sinnes, but also vnto the that beleue, it bringeth the spirite of God, whereby they are wonderfully inflamed and stirred vp to holy workes. Neither is this reason of any force: We are not compelled by threatninges and punishments of the law, to withhold our selues from sinne, therefore, we are by none other meanes impelled to liue innocently. For we are bound of deuoty, piety, and sayth, to liue honestly and holily: which things vndoubtedly are of greater force and doo more vehemently stirre vs vp, then any bond of the Lawe. This is the effect of the reason aledged: They which liue vnder grace, ought to obey God, but to make the thyng more playne, we will expresse it by a similitude of seruants: for they ought in all things to be obedient vnto their masters, and to be conformable vnto theyr willes: thus therefore he reasoneth: It is mete that seruants obey their Lordes.

But ye are now made the seruantes of righteousness: wherefore vnto it oughte ye to do seruite, and not vnto sinne. Farther to strike vs more sharply, he addeth to this reason a double spurre to pricke vs forward: firste he sayth, that they came into this seruitude not against their willes, or by compulsion, but willingly and of theyr owne accorde: secondlye, as muche as lyeth in hym, he sayth before theyr eyes the haynousnes of synne: and geneth thanks vnto God, who deli-uered them from it, and made them the seruantes of righteousness. If a man demaunde, at what tyme we addide our selues to be seruantes vnto righte-ousnes, Chrysostome answereth, that we then do it, when we are baptised. So by the sacramēt of baptisme he declareth, both this reason, and also the other, whereby he proueth, that we are dead vnto sinne. This similitude of seruantes and Lordes is confirmed by that right or law, whereby seruantes are bound vnto theyr Lordes: which law, whether it be the law of god or the law of man, maketh the bound to obey theyr Lordes, and this thinge may be knowen by the finall cause: if we consider the property of the name. Augustine in this 19. booke De ciuitate Dei, the 15. chap: writeth, that Serui, that is, seruants, were so called of the Latine mē, bycause being taken in warre they were saved of theyr enemies. For they which were taken, were not alwayes slayne by them that overcame them: but sometimes were reserued one liue, for this purpose, that they should be seruantes vnto them that tooke them. And seruitude had his first beginning of sinne: for it is not lawfull to make warre, but against those which haue sinned. With these wordes of Augustine agreeth Florentinus the Lawyer, as it is red in the Institutiones, and this etimologie right well agreeth with this place, which we are now in hand with. The deuill assaulting by battyle our first parentes, overcame the and toke them: and by that transgressiō hath made all our nature captiue, and hath still in subiection, and to be his seruauntes as many as thorough Christ are not set at liberty. For so sayth Paul in his latter epistle to Timoth: That they may come to amendement out of the snare of the deuill, which are take of him at his will. But Christ came and hath fought with that strong armed man, the gouernor of the world, and prince of darkenes, and hauing gotten the victorie, hath redeemed vs all. Neither vndoubtedly did he it for any other cause, but that we should be obedient to his will and vnto righteousnes. Wherefore these wordes of Paul signifie as muche, as if he shoulde haue sayd: Christ hath not therefore deliuered vs from sinne, and addid vnto himselfe, to the ende that henceforth we should bee seruantes vnto sinne, but onely that we should be obedient vnto righteousness. Nowe let vs diligently weighe the wordes.

Knowe ye not that to vvhomesoeuer ye geue your selues, as seruantes to obey, his seruantes ye are to vvhome ye obey: vvhether it be of sinne vnto death, or obedience vnto righteousness. Here let vs first note, that the Apostle setteth before vs two Lordes, the one is, sinne, the other is, that obedience which we render vnto God. By which diuision (so far as much as the partes thereof be contrary)

It appeareth, that I nothing erred from the sentence of the Apostle, when before I defined sinne in generall to be, whatsoeuer is repugnant vnto the lawe of God. For, soasmuch as sinne is a p[er]uersion, it can not be known but by his opposite or contrary forme or quality, which it remoueth away: and what the forme is, Paul here exp[re]sseth by the name of Obedience. Wherefore, that is sinne, & ought so to be called, which is repugnant vnto such an obedience. By which it is most manifest, that that corruption, which is still remaining in vs, and the motions which are by it stirred vp, are sinnes: soasmuch as they are apertly repugnant vnto obedience, which is opposite and contrary vnto sinne. Whereouer this diuision of the Apostle, if it be sufficient, comprehendeth all men: so that every man is of necessitie either the seruant of sinne, or els of righteousness. The seruantes of righteousness are these, which are now deliuered to be obedient vnto the forme of the doctrine of the gospel. Wherefore in this place are ouerthrowne those woordes which they call preparatorie: for they can not be placed in any members of this diuision. For, if thou wilt say, that they pertaine vnto them which are seruantes of righteousness, they are now already regenerate, and do beleue the Gospel: wherefore those woordes can not now be preparations, but fruites of the Gospel. But if thou wilt stand in contention, and say that they pertaine vnto them, which are seruantes of sinne, they haue no fruit of their woordes, but only death, wherefore their woordes turne vnto them vnto destruction: so farre is it of, that they can be preparations vnto grace. We say in dede, that God oftentimes bleth our sinnes, and by them appointeth as it were certain degrees, by which we may come vnto Christ. But this thing our woordes haue not of themselves, neither in respect that they are done of vs: for in that respect spring forth damnable and obious fruites, as it were out of a corrupt tree. Vnto these two Lordes are appointed two manner of rewarde: namely, vnto sinne is appointed, death, and vnto obedience, righteousness. But it seemeth, that Paul ought otherwise to haue disposed these things, and especially as touching the second member: for, righteousness is opposite or contrary vnto sinne. Wherefore euen as vnto sinne is ascribed death as a rewarde, so vnto righteousness also, ought eternall life to haue answered as a rewarde. But this ought we assuredly to thinke, that Paul erred not: but by this disposition would teach vs, wherein the righteousness of woordes consisteth: namely, in this, that we shoulde be obedient vnto GOD: for there is nothinge either holpe or iust, but that which he hath commaunded: for the intentions of men pertaine not to righteousness, but rather vnto lust. Wherefore the Apostle, to the end he would the more manifestly instruct vs of this thing, hath set the definition in place of the thing defined. And it is not to be meruailed, that he putteth righteousness in the place of rewarde: for the beginning of blessednes and of eternal lyfe, is to liue iustly, and hereof it cometh, y in the holy scriptures eternal life is a continuall companion of righteousness. And Chrysostome vpon this place sayth, that by righteousness ought to be vnderstand, whatsoeuer followeth righteousness. And yet oughte no man therefore to perswade himselfe, that they which liue iustly, are miserable: although sometymes they are greuously bered with aduersities. For with Paul righteousness and innocency of life do signifie the self same thing that eternall felicity signifieth. Death also, which is ascribed vnto sinne as a rewarde, is not only the dissolution of the outward body, but therewithall comprehendeth also eternall infelicity, wherewith both body and soule shalbe punished. And by this worde, Syme (which thing also I haue before admonished) Paul vnderstandeth the luste which remaineth in the beleuers, and also the corruption of nature. And therefore the godly, when they are sorry for any faulte that they haue committed, do chiefly complayne of this corrupt nature, and of the rotten roote thereof. David when he lamented the murder and adultery which he had committed, ranne chiefly vnto this, as vnto the fountayne of all euils, sayinge, Behold in iniquities was I conceaued, and in sinnes hath my mother conceaued me. And when we pray vnto God to deliuer vs from sinnes, for this thinge we chiefly praye, that by his spirite he would breake and weaken this domesticall and familiar enemy. They thing the Apostle ment, when he cryed out, Unhappy man that I am. Who shall deliuer me from the body of this death? Paul after he had thus deuoted seruitude, that of necessity we must be seruauntes ether of righteousness or els of sinne, doth now by the great worke of the holy ghost excellently declare, what maner ones we be, which beleue in Christ.

Before regeneration we were all the seruantes of sinne.

The calling of God findeth none holy.

They which are regenerate do of thepp owne free will liue holily.

We are deliuered of God, because it lieth not in our power, and therefore he giveth thanks vnto him. Of the drawing, & how by we are stirred vp of God.

It is not sayd, vnles the father shall lead, but, vnlesse he shall draw.

God of his willing per sōs maketh vs willing.

Unlesse we be lyke made as sheepe, we can not follow God when he calleth vs.

The drawing of God is with pleasure.

What pleasure is.

How many thinges cannot be light vpon, vnlesse we be as touching nature chaunge.

But God be thanked, that ye were the seruauntes of sinne: but ye haue obeyed from the hart vnto that forme of doctrine, whereunto ye were deliuered. He thought it not sufficient to put vs in remembrance, that we are brought to obedience, but would also moreouer admonishe vs, what maner ones we were before, namely, seruauntes of sinne. This was the state of vs all, before we were conuerted vnto Christ. For the calling of God findeth none ether holy or iust. Neither was it sufficient to say, that we are now the seruauntes of righteousness: but he addeth, from the hart. They which are truly regenerate in Christ, and grafted in him, do worke those thinges which they vnderstand to be acceptable vnto God, not of compulsion or of hypocrisie, but of their owne accord, and free will. Wherefore Paul, when he maketh mencion hereof, giveth thanks vnto God, for that he vnderstande, that that thing is the chiefest and singular benefite of God, and lyeth not in our power, as many men sayne that it doth. And therefore he addeth in the passiue signification, Ye were deliuered. By which wordes he meaneth nothing els, but that which Christ ment, when he sayd, No man cometh vnto me, vnles my father draw hym. But what maner of drawing is this, and how hard it is to expresse, he that diligently waigheth the wordes of Christ, shall easely perceauue. It is written (sayth he) in the prophetes, they shall be all taught of God. Which sentence Christ doth yet more playnly expound, sayng, He which shall heare of my father, and shall learne, cometh vnto me. By which wordes he sheweth, that an outward calling is not sufficient, vnles there be added of God a full perswasion inwardly, and in the mynde. For after that God hath once inclined and bowed our mynde, then at the last we come vnto Christ. And Augustine in his first booke vnto Bonifacius, agaynst the two epistles of the Pelagians noteth, that the Lord sayd, Vnles my father shall drawe him, and sayd not, vnles my father shall leade him: as though we our selues as of our selues coulde will any thinge, or geue assente vnto hym that calleth vs. For he which is willinge is not drawen, but led: not that the father draweth anye, but those that are willing. For it is not possible, that we should beleue vnles we be willing. But God worketh wonderfully in our hartes, so that of unwilling persons he maketh vs willing. And the same Augustine vpon Iohn expounding this place, compareth the beleuer wyth a young sheepe, whome the shepherd wyth holding forth a grene bowe draweth after hym, not indeede by violence, but of hys owne accorde, and wyth a desire. For the sheepe hath inwardly an appetite which stirreth hym vp to followe the bowe. In which comparison this we ought to note, that it is the proprietye of a sheepe so to do. For an other beaste will not follow greene bowes, though it be agaynst their willes. So ought we by regeneration to be renewed, and to be made the shepe of Christ, before we can follow him. For otherwise we despise all greene bowes and callinges. Augustine addeth moreover, that this drawing is with a certayne oblectation and pleasure, so that that is true which the Poete sayth: Trahit sua queng; voluptas: That is, Every man is drawen by hys owne pleasure. And we are led by the bondes not of the body but of the hart, and we are stirred vp by a holy pleasure. But the very definition of pleasure sufficiently teacheth, that first the chaunging of our corrupt nature is necessary. For pleasure is nothing els but an affection and motion stirred vp in vs of thinges agreable vnto our nature: as contrarywise grieve or sorrow cometh of thinges that are repugnant vnto our nature. And now to the end we may take some pleasure by the admonitions of God, and heavenly wordes, it is necessary that they be agreable vnto our nature. But forasmuch, as it is corrupt, y thing can by no meanes be brought to passe: For Paul sayth vnto the Cor. The carnall man vnderstandeth not those thinges which are of the spirite of God: for they seeme foolish vnto hym: and therefore he refuseth them them, as thinges contrarye vnto himselfe. What is then to be done, that the same thinges may be pleasaunt vnto vs? Are the commaundements of God to be altered, and bended to our lustes? No vndoubtedly: Our nature ought rather to be changed, and regenerated by God. And that thing doth God bying to passe in vs, when he through fayth endueth vs with his righteousness, and so draweth vs vnto Christ. And therfore Paul when he had vsed these verbes of the active signification, obey and exhibite, or geue your members, &c. Afterward vseth the passive signification when he sayth: Ye are deliuered, ye are made free from sinne, ye are made the seruantes of righteousness. By which wordes is signified, that in that we lyue by righte and follow God, is from without vs, and commeth not from our selues. By the forme of doctrine he vnderstandeth the Gospell: for it is not a simple doctrine, as philosophy or the law: but such a doctrine, as offreth vnto vs Christ, and his spirite and grace: wherby are ministered vnto vs strengthes to performe those thinges which are commaunded. And although this draught be the worke of God, yet ought preachers & pastors to serue therein as ministers of God. And forasmuch as we call that draught a motion, the terme and cride both from whence it beginneth, and wherunto it tendeth, Paul declareth when he thus writeth, Ye were the seruantes of sinne. By which wordes he sheweth, from whence we are drawen. But when he addeth that we are deliuered, that we should be obedient vnto the Gospell, he sheweth the end of our mutation. For therfore are we regenerate, and brought to Christ, that we should be obedient vnto his word. Neither thought Paul it sufficient in such sort to set forth his change, but he wold also declare the maner of change. For when he sayth: that we obey from the hart, he sufficiently teacheth, that this motion is not by compulsion or violent, but willing and of our owne accord. Here let vs marke, how farre the doctrine of the Apostle is from that error, wherof he was accused: namely, that we should sinne, because we are exempted & deliuered from the law. Lastly he thus concludeth his reason:

But beyng made free from sinne, ye are made the seruantes of righteousness. Here we ought to know, that this word seruants is improperly taken. For he is called a seruant, which obeyeth not his owne will, but the will of an other man. Now if there be any thing which we earnestly desire, & if that we obey him, which sheweth himself vnto vs as a guide vnto the thyng that we desire, and wold also helpe vs vnto the same, then are we sayd not so much to serue him as to serue our owne desire. So they which are truly conuerted vnto Christ, do aboue all thinges couet to satisfy the wil of God. Wherfore if by the word of God, by grace, & by righteousness they be stirred by vnto that scope or marke, they are not then sayd properly to serue. But he continueth in his metaphore which he began, to declare the Antithesis or contrarietie betwene the state of men regenerate, and the tyranny of sinne. By this conclusion is this gathered, that we now being deliuered fro sinne, ought so to serue righteousness, that hitherto willingly we haue no more fellowship with sinne. And thus (sayth Chrysostome) is all one, as if one shoulde say vnto a man that is escaped the handes of a tyranne. Now thou hast escaped: take hede therefore that thou come not agayne into his power. None vlt more to abhorre from tyrannicall seruitude, then they whiche sometymes lyued oppressed vnder it. The Romanes when they had driuen out Tarquinius, vnto afterwarde so exceedingly hate hym, that they banished Lucius Tarquinius Collatinus beyng a good man and an innocent, for that he was of the same name. We also beyng now made the members of Christ, and grafted into the liberty of righteousness, ought not only to expell and banish all maner of sinne, but also ought to temper our selues from all maner of thewe thereof, though it be neuer so small. The same Chrysostome rehercing the goodnes of God towards mankind, sayth, that he is like a riche and liberall prince, which first with a greete somme money redemeth a child being an orphan and forsaken, and brought not only into bondage, but also compelled to do all maner of vile slavery and drudgery, and when he hath so redemed hym, being not content with that, he adopteth him also to be his son, and maketh him an heyre of exceeding greete possessions. All these thinges ought to prouoke vs to be seruantes vnto right-

To make the law pleasaunt vnto vs, the law must not be changed but our nature must be altered. Paul right well vseth the passive manner of speaking. The forme of doctrine is the Gospell.

Although this drawing be the worke of God yet the ministers of the word ought to do theyr seruice therein.

The motto of the drawing of God is not by compulsion.

Seruitude properly obeyeth not, his owne will but the will of another man.

They most of all abhorre from tyranny which haue sometimes liued vnder it. An example of the people of Rome.

righteousnes. Neither let any man flatter him selfe, that he is able at one time to serue both these Lords, righteousness (I say) and sinne. For Christ affirmeth that thing to be impossible. No man (sayth he) can serue two masters, especially when they commaund thinges contrary: as do righteousness, and sinne: God, and Mammon. Yea and Augustine addeth, that it is not possible to be obedient vnto one and the selfe same Lord, which commaundet contrary thinges. Wherefore forasmuch as in Baptisme we haue professed obedience vnto righteousness, we ought wholly to stand vnto our promises, vnles we will be those hypocrites, of whom Esay sayth: This people honoureth me with theyr lippes: but theyr hart is farre from me. If we be Christians, and do professe the seruitude of righteousness, we oughte not to go on warfare in the campes of sinne.

I speake after the maner of man, bycause of the infirmity of your flesh. I speake after the maner of man, bycause of the infirmity of your flesh. I now amplifieth the reason alreedy set forth, and vnto it addeth an exhortation. For he desireth them, that they should with no les endeuor do seruice vnto righteousness, then before they serued sinne: and he sayth, that he requireth nothing of them but that which is iust: so that he should be an vniust man which would not graunt vnto so iust a request. And he extenuateth his petition, lest they that here it, should steppe backe, as it were from hard and vniust conditions. Whereby let preachers learne, that whatsoeuer doctrine they let forth vnto people, they so let it forth that it may seme iust: so that every man may vnderstand that he ought to follow and to accomplish it, and that for most iust causes. This thinge only Paul requireth, that we should now with the same obedience serue righteousness, wherewith before we serued sinne, although in so greata a diuersity of Lordes, it semeth most iust, that we more promptly and diligently serue the excellentier and gentler Lord. And Paul, to the end he would the more manifestly lay before they eyes the equity of his petition, on the one syde setteth forth the filthines and hurte which we haue by sinne: and on the other side the honesty & commodyty of righteousness: for these are the places which we chiefly vse to perswad and disswad by. But by the comparison of these contraries it semeth, that he mought haue inferred, that we ought more gladly & willingly to serue righteousness, then before we serued sinne. But (sayth Paul) I speake after the maner of men, is, I dele getly. I require not so much as I might iustly require. Forasmuch as man is of nature gentle, it seemeth a thinge strange to require of hym thinges hard & sharpe. I speake after the maner of men, signifieth as much as if he had sayd: I speake getly. Although many expound it thus, as if it should haue bene sayd, I require nothing which they that haue the vse of humane reason ought not to graunt. The Greke Scholies referre this vnto the thinges that go before: as though Paul should there render a reason, why he sayd, that we are made the seruauntes of righteousness: for, that is not properly seruitude. Wherefore he sayth, that he speaketh after the maner of men: for men vse to call that which is greuousome and full of trouble, by the name of seruitude and tyranny. And it is very manifest, that righteousness is vnpleasant vnto our flesh and so is also whatsoeuer the sayd righteousness appointeth our flesh to do. But that which straight way followeth, semeth not to agree with this exposition.

For as ye haue geuen your members seruauntes to vncleines &c. In these wordes this particule, for, semeth to geue a reason why he sayd before, that he desired a certayne thing after the maner of men, by reason of the infirmity of theyr flesh. Take heed leſt any mā preuent you of the price or reward, ſayth, that Paul in his writings deſired not to follow the phraſes of ſpeech uſed of moſt eloquent writers, as of Plato, of Demosthenes, and of ſuch like: but uſed words & ſentences that were common, and ſuch as were in a manner known to all men. And for example ſake he gathereth together many of his phraſes, which were obſerued of the Cilicians euen vnto his tyme. For of that countrey was Paul boyn in the city of Tarſis: amongſt which phraſes he rehearſeth y<sup>e</sup> which he was the in hand with, καταβριῦται, which ſignifieth, ſhould preuent y<sup>e</sup> reward: Alſo that which is written in y<sup>e</sup> firſt vnto the Corinthians. And in the latter epiſtle, οὐκ ἐν ἀρχῇ οὐκ ἔμας, that is, that ye ſhould not be grieved: and the place which now we reade, ἀνθρώπων λέγω. that is, I ſpeake after the manner of men.

Paul uſed phraſes of ſpeech of the Cilicians.

Because of the infirmity of your fleſhe. This therefore he ſayth, because ſo long as we lyue here in this world, we are not fully regenerate. For there remaineth in vs much fleſhe and much of olde Adam. Yet by theſe wordes, as Chriſtoſtome noteth, Paul ſetteth not at liberty the endeavour of the will. For although by reaſon of the burthen of our fleſhe we can not perſorme ſo much as is required of vs, yet our will ought alwayes to contend to farther thinges. Neither oughte we to thinke, that the Apoſtle would here teach, that we ſhoulde adde an equity or moderation vnto y<sup>e</sup> law of God: as though there were not required at our hands, that we ſhould perſorme ſo much as it commaundeth, but ſo much as we can. For in this place he releaſeth nothing of the lawe of God. For, to moderate or lenefie it, neither lieth it in the Apoſtle, nor in any other mortall man. And this ſemeth to be the meaning of theſe wordes. Reaſon in dede would require, that ye ſhoulde exhibite a greater ſeruitude vnto righteousnes, then vnto ſinne. But I ſpeake onely after the manner of men: and require that ye ſhould do only the like thinges. And that is to require all whatſoever the Lawe commaundeth. For they which are not yet regenerate, but lyue ſtrangers from Chriſt, do wholly ſerue ſin, and do applye all their ſtrengthes and powers to ſinne. But the lawe requireth nothing els, but that we ſhould with the whole hart, with the whole ſoule, and with all our ſtrengthes loue God. We haue ſo utterly ſerued ſinne, that although it may ſeme, that ſomewhat moze ſhould be attributed vnto innocency, then before was geuen vnto ſinne, yet that can now by no meanes be brought to paſſe. For we haue with all our ſtrengthes ſerued ſinne. Therefore the faulte is in vs, that probability of reaſon can not take place. And yet Paul in the meane tyme in writing theſe thinges diminuiſeth nothing from the lawe of God. Yea rather by theſe wordes he highly commendeth it: as a thing which requireth nothing of vs, but that which is agreeable with the nature of man. It is a common ſaying, a man muſt aſke moze then right, to the ende he may attayne to his right. But Paul ſayth, that he asketh but gently, not ſo much as he mought of outye require. As touching the wordes he ſayth, that we haue hether to geuen ouer our members as ſeruauntes to vncleanes and iniquity, where vnder the name of vncleanes and iniquity are comprehended all kyndes of ſinnes. For whatſoever ſinne we commit, the ſame tendeth ether to enioy our owne commodities and pleaſures, and this is called vncleanes, because of the moze groſſe workes, wherewith the fleſhe is contaminated: or els to be iniurious towardeſ God, or towardeſ our neighbours: which kynde of ſinne he calleth iniquity.

Paul will haue nothing releaſed of the endeavour of the will.

We muſt not adde a moderation vnto the lawe of God.

Paul in ſo ſpeaking requireth al our ſtrengthes.

We haue with al our ſtrengthes ſerued ſinne.

How vncleanes and iniquity comprehend all kynde of ſin.

And he addeth, For iniquity, to teach vs to vnderſtand, that there is no ſinne that is alone: but one ſinne alwayes driueth and impelleth to an other. And he addeth not, for vncleanes: because y<sup>e</sup> mought eaſely be vnderſtand, or becauſe he taketh the name of iniquity moze generally in the latter place, then in the firſt.

There is no ſinne in a manner that is alone.

So now geue your members ſeruauntes vnto righteousnes for liues. Even as vnrightheouſnes leadeth vs vnto filthynes & vncleanes, ſo righteousnes leadeth vs to holynes. The Apoſtle ſetteth forth theſe thinges by an Antithetiſis, to

to the ende we should the better marke and consider. And sanctification or holyness is nothing els then a purification from all uncleanes. Wherefore the Greke word ἅγιος, that is, holy (as Plato affirmeth in Cratylo) is so called of α, which is a particle priuatiue, and γῆ which signifieth the earth: because they are called holy, which are purged from earthly spottes and filthines. And the Apostle speaketh very aptly, that we should serue, righteousness, or God for sanctification: for when we sanctify our selues, we do his will. For vnto the Thessalonians, Paul writeth: This is the wyll of God, your sanctification, that every man may know how to possesse his vessel not in uncleanes, and in lust of desire. &c. Also, God hath called vs not to uncleanes, but to sanctification. And in the latter to the Corrinth. For when ye were the seruantes of sinne, ye were free vnto righteousness. ¶ He bringeth a cause, why he admonished them, that they shoulde in such maner geue their members seruantes vnto righteousness: because, sayth he, when ye were before seruantes of sinne, ye were vtterly free vnto righteousness: that is, ye were vtterly straungers from it. And in this place vnto righteousness, is the Datine case. And such a liberty is pernicious, and far worse then all seruitude, most like vnto that liberty, which the prodigall sonne so much desired. Again by this place also are ouerthrowen workes preparatory. For Paul sayth: When ye were seruantes of sinne. That is, not yet regenerate, but were still strangers from Christ, ye were free vnto righteousness. that is, ye were wholly disagreed from it. And if such men haue no fellowship with righteousness, how can they worke good workes, which should of congruity merite grace?

What fruite had ye then in those thinges whercof ye are now ashamed: For the ende of those thinges is death. But now being freed from sinnes, and made seruauntes vnto God, ye haue your fruite in holines, and the ende, euerlastyng lyfe. What fruit had ye then in those things wherof ye are now ashamed? He confirmeth his exhortation from the place of honesty and dishonesty. We ought to abstaine (saith he) from your old workes: for they were vile and filthy vnto you: so that if they should now be called to remembrance, ye should be compelled to be ashamed of them. Shame is an affection, which springeth by reason of some filthy thinges, and it may be either a feare or els a griefe: for if a man be afraid, lest of y<sup>e</sup> which he doth or which he taketh in hand, should happen any dishonesty vnto him he is made ashamed: as we see happeneth in yong men, which when they are either demanded, or bidden to do any thing, they blush, because they are afraid lest they should not answer aptlye, or should not very well be able to do that thyng which they are bidden to do. But if an old man or a young man be put in remembrance of any thing, which seemeth not to be well done, they blush because of the sorrow of the dishonesty, wherinto they see themselves to haue incurred. And why the Romanes ought to be ashamed of those thinges, which they had committed before they came vnto Christ, there may be two reasons: namely, the vnpurenes of lyfe, or els the vnpurenes of religion, which they professed, that is, either filthines or foolishnes. And their former lyfe Paul describeth in his first epistle vnto y<sup>e</sup> Cor. Be not ye deceiued (saith he) neyther fornicators, nor worshippers of images, nor adulterers, nor effeminate persons nor abusers of nature, nor thenes, nor conetous personnes, nor drunkardes, nor cursed speakers, nor raueners shall receaue the inheritance of the kingdom of God. And these thynges were ye (saith he) but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified. And as touching the vncleannes of religion, the Ethnike writers abundantly testifie. And Ambrose vpon this place maketh mention of the sacred seruices of Cybeles y<sup>e</sup> goddess of Phrygia, & also of other such like most filthy sacred seruices. And Chrysostome saith: that this commeth through a singuler benefite of God, that me are ashamed of the wicked actes which they haue before committed. For they were nothing ashamed of them, so long as they were conuersant in them. As dronkards and mad folkes are nothing ashamed, so long as they wallow in that offence. This place also teacheth vs, that although sinnes before committed are forgiven, yet the shame and griefe for them can not be taken away: yea rather godly men can not remember them without detestacion. But y<sup>e</sup> shall not be so in our heauenly countrey. There in dede the elect shall detest sinnes, but the greatnes of the felicity shall swallow by al feeling of shame & griefe. For as we rede in y<sup>e</sup> Apocalips, God shall wipe away all teares from their eyes. He seemeth in mockage to call it Fruite, especially of those thinges, whereof they should be ashamed. For in such thinges there is no fruite, but rather losse,

For the ende of them is death.] ¶ When he had demaunded of them what fruit they had, there could nothing els be answered, but that they had none. And he addeth a reason, because death is the ende of them. So Paul because he would y<sup>e</sup> more vehemently moue the, addeth waight to his speech, and to losse, he ioyneth shame. Some by this worde τελος vnderstand tribute or tole: as though it should haue been sayd: Vnto sinne is recompensed nothing els but death. But if we will rather haue that worde τελος to signifie an end, the same (as y<sup>e</sup> Philosophers also affirme) may be taken two maner of wayes: First, for the last ende or terme: and so death may be called the end of lyfe: Secondly, it may be taken for that for whose cause any thing is take in hand, which thyng forasmuch as of necessity it ought to be good cannot agree with death. For there is no man y<sup>e</sup> sinneth with this purpose, y<sup>e</sup> therfore he would dye. ¶ Therefore, in the first signification, death is called the ende of sinnes, because in it is the ende of sinnes.

But now beyng freed from sinne, and made the seruantes of God, ye haue your fruite in holines, and the ende eternall lyfe.] In these wordes he finisheth the Antithesis or contrariety, and against sinne he setteth God, against shame holines, and against death eternall lyfe. Againe also in this place he vseth verbes of the passiue signification, sayeng:

Ye are freed from sinne, and made seruantes vnto God.] But before he sayd when ye were seruantes of sin, ye were free vnto righteousness. In these verbes there is no nede of the passiue signification. For we are of our selues apte inough to sinne: but so are we not to be deliuered from sinnes, and to serue God. But in that Paul in this reddition or coparison writeth not, that we are made seruants vnto righteousness, but vnto God, it is a matter of no greate waight. For God is only the cause of our righteousness. We haue fruite sayth he, namely, holynes, and the end eternall life. Here Chrysostome noteth, that by this it appeareth that we possesse not all thinges by hope only, but that in very dede there is much geue vnto vs. And forasmuch as we haue alreadye (sayth he) attained vnto iustificacion, our hope is exceedingly confirmed for the obteynement of that thinge which is yet behind.

For the reward of sinne is death, but the Grace of God, is eternall life thorough Christ Iesus our Lord.] In these wordes he closeth vs his exhortation: and proueth that the end of filthy workes is death. For it (sayth he) is the reward of sin. Which thinge, forasmuch as it is well known of it selfe, he would not stand about to proue. For rede euery where in y<sup>e</sup> holy scriptures, that God threatneth death vnto sinners. Agayn he by the figure Catachresis, calleth it a stipend. For no man committeth sinne with this intent, that for a reward he would obteyne death. Here Paul inuerteth the Antithesis or contrary position: for he sayth not that eternall life is the reward of righteousness: but rather attributeth it vnto Grace, which thinge he therefore doth to assigne and appointe the whole nature of merite in Christ only. And therfore he addeth, thorough Iesus Christ our Lord, that no man shoulde imagine any other mediators, other deade santes, or els they: othne workes. Farther Paul seemeth of purpose againe to set Grace or a gifte: and by that meanes he exceedingly stirreth vs up to the study of eternall life: then it is a thing so excellent, that vnles it be geuen by God, it can not Holy men are alwayes grieved and ashamed for the sinnes which they haue committed. In our heauenly countrey they shall be taken away. There is in very dede no fruite of sin.

Vnto sinne is recompensed nothing but death. Two significacions of this wordes end.

Paul speaketh to the passiue signification.

God the cause of all our righteousness.

Death is improperly called a reward.

Eternall life is not called a reward.

be gotten by any of our workes. He taketh this greke word μισθω for the stipend or wages of a souldier: and he continueth still in his metaphoze of a king and of a Lord, which he a little before bled. For they vse to geue stipendes vnto theyr seruaunts. And the Greke word sauozeth much of the maner of the elders where by they were wont to geue vnto theyr souldiers vittayles to eate when they were one warfare. And at Rome it was the maner a long time, that the souldiers with theyr owne meate, but afterward were vittayles geuen them of the common treasore. And it well appeareth by the etimology of the word, that it was first instituted only for releauing of necessity, and to signify some honour not as though they seemed stipendes of such worthines for which men should put theyr life in danger. Wherefore as to laborers was geuen a reward, so vnto warriours was geuen a stipend. But now let vs especially consider in what sorte grace and workes are as touching eternall life. And as much as may be gathered ether out of the holy scriptures, or out of those thinges which Augustine hath left in writing as touching this matter, we will playnly declare so that it shall be made manifest how much our aduersaries disagree from vs in thys poynt: As touching the first, if by Grace we vnderstand the fauour and mercy of God then is it the only cause thozonghe Jesus Chyriste, why we obteyne eternall life.
For our workes can by no meanes be the causes of our felicity. Howbeit they are certayne meanes, by which God bringeth vs vnto felicity. As the way is not the cause of the end thereof, nor the runninge place the cause of the goale or marke: and yet by them men are led both vnto the end of the way, and vnto the marke. So God by good workes bringeth vs to eternall life: when as yet the only cause thereof is the election of God, as Paul most manifestly teacheth in thys epistle. Whome he hath predestinate sayth he, those also hath he called, whome he hath called, those also hath he iustified: & who he hath iustified, those also will he glorifie.
Thys declareth that all these thinges do so come from the Grace of God, that they consequently follow the one the other, and God which geueth the one, will also liberally and freely geue the other. Wherefore the whole consideratio, and nature of merite ought vnto to be taken away. For that which properly meriteth any thing, must of necessity haue in it a free geuing by, nether ought it by any other meanes to be due. Wherefore soasmuche as we owe of dewty vnto God all thinges that we haue, vndoubtedly whatsoeuer we do, it can merite no thing. Farther those thinges by which we will merite any thing, ought to be our owne. But good workes are not our own, but are of God. Besides this also, all imperfection and uncleannes must of necessity be remoued away: otherwise our workes are contaminated, nether can they be leueled to the rule which is prescribed by God, wherefore we ought rather to craue pardon, then once to thinke vpon price or reward. Farther betwene merite and reward there ought to be some proportion. But there can be no proportion betwene our workes and eter-nall felicity. Wherefore they can not properly be called merites. Whereouer God will, that there should be taken fro vs all matter of glorying: which thing were not possible, if by our workes we should deserue eternall life. And soasmuch as Paul in this place describeth eternall life by the name of grace vndoubtedly it can not be of workes. Let this suffice as touching the first. Now will I briefly declare what Augustine hath written as touching this place. In his Enchiridion to Laurentius the 107. chapter: A stipend, sayth he, is payd in warfare as a debt, and not geuen as a gift, therefore Paul sayth, the stipend of sinne is death, to declare that death is rendred vnto sinne not wythout desert, but as due. But grace vnles it be free it is not grace. Wherefore as touching the good workes of man, forasmuch as they are the giftes of God, in that vnto them eternall life is rendred, grace is recompensed for grace.
The same Augustine in his booke De gratia & Libero arbitrio the ix. chapter.
In the Gospell of Iohn (sayth he) it is written, that we all haue receaued of hys fulnes, and grace for grace, euery man as God hath denided vnto him the measure of sayth. For euery man hath receaued a proper gift from God, one thus, and an other thus. Wherefore when eternall life is rendred, grace is rendred for grace. But so is it not of death: because

cause it is rendred, as due unto the warfare of the deuill. Wherefore where as the Apostle mought haue sayd and that rightly, the stipend of righteousness is eternall life, he would rather say, But the grace of God is eternall life, that thereby we myght vnderstand, that God bringeth vs vnto eternall life, not for our owne merites, but for his mercy. Wherefore it is written in the 103. Psalme. Which crowneth thee in mercy and compassions. Because it is he which worketh in vs both to wyll and also to performe. The Apostle had sayde before, Worke your saluation wyth feare and trembling. Afterward, least we should attribute this thyng vnto our selues, he sayth, that God worketh these thynges in vs: and that not for our merites, but according to his good pleasure. And in the same booke the 8. chapter he sayth, that there is no small ambiguitie, how eternall life is rendred vnto good workes. For the scripture sayth that euery man shall haue according to his works. And yet on the other side Paul calleth grace eternall life. But the propriety of grace is to be redred freely. Paul also sayth, vnto hym which worketh not, the reward is not imputed according to debt, but accordyng to grace. And saith moreouer that grace, if it be of workes, is not grace: Also, that the reuantes shall through the electio of grace be saued: Agayne vnto the Ephesians: Grace hath made vs safe through he sayth: and that not of our selues: Agayne, Not of workes, least peraduenture any man shoulde glory. This doubt Augustine sayth can not otherwise be dissolued, vntill we graunt that an vpright and holy life is grace. For so ether sentence may take place. For eternall life is rendred vnto workes. But because workes are freely geuen vs of God, therefore also is eternall lyfe called grace. And in his booke De correctione & Gratia, the 13. chapter he sayth, that Iames writeth, that iudgemente shalbe wythout mercy vnto hym, which sheweth not mercy. By which wordes (saith he) appeareth that they which lyue well, shall in the last iudgement be iudged wyth mercy, and they which haue liued wickedly shalbe iudged wythout mercy. And if that in iudgement we haue nede of mercy, the is it not now done for merites. And in the same sence he alleageth the mother of the Machabees: who as it is written in the 2. booke and 7. chapter thus speaketh vnto her son: That in that mercy I may receaue the wyth thy brethren. In which place she calleth the day of iudgement, mercy. And vndoubtedly when we shall come before the iudgement seate of God, who shall boast that he hath a chaste hart? Or who shall boast that he is cleane from sinne? Wherefore there also mercy is nedefull, whereby he may be made blessed, vnto whome the Lord hath not imputed sinne. The same father in his 105. epistle to Sixtus. When the Apostle had sayd. The stipend of sinne is death, who would not iudge, that he should most aptly and consequently haue added, but the stipend of righteousness is eternall lyfe? And it is true. Because euen as vnto the merite of sinne is death rendred as a stipend, so also vnto the merite of righteousness is eternall lyfe rendred as a stipend. But the blessed Apostle most vigilantly warring agaynst pride, when he had sayde, that the stipend of sinne is death, least humane ryghteousnes should extoll it selfe sayd not contrariwyse, that the stipend of ryghteousnes is eternall lyfe, but the grace of God (sayth he) is eternall lyfe. But it is not sufficient to thynke that these things are spoken for humility & moderation sake. For the matter is so in very dede. For our workes receaue not eternall life for a iust and deserued stipend. And therefore he sayth, that humane righteousness is pride, and which in name only is called righteousness. But that ought to be a true righteousness vnto which eternall life is due, which righteousness if it be not of thy selfe, then is it from aboue, descending from the father of lightes. Wherefore O man, if thou shalt receaue eternall life, it is in dede the stipend of righteousness: but vnto thee it is grace, vnto whome also euen righteousness is grace. For it should be rendred vnto thee as a debt, if the righteousness vnto whome it is due were of thy selfe. By all these thinges is gathered, that, with Augustine, eternall life is therefore called grace, because the workes which go before it, are geuen freely. Farther he confelleth, that in the last iudgement, when God shall reward them, we shall haue nede of mercy and compassion. And that also we haue alwayes nede of mercy, that our sinnes should not be imputed vnto vs. Lastly that eternall life, although it may be the stipend of righteousness being taken by it selfe, yet vnto vs it is grace: partly because it is not of our selues, and partly also because it is vnperfite. Hilarinus also writeth vpon the 50. Psalme: My hope is in the mercy of God for euer, and euer, world without out ende. For the woꝝkes of ryghteousnes are not sufficient vnto the merite of perfect bles-sednes, vnles in thys wyll of ryghteousnes the mercy of God impute not the fautes of humane changynges and motions. Also Ierome vpon Esay the 46. chapter, If we should consider our owne merites, we shoulde dispayre. Our aduersaries and we contende not, whether by the grace of God good woꝝkes are geuen vnto the regenerate. Although neither herein also do we vtterly agree with them. For they thinke, that it lieth in our power, to receaue good woꝝkes, when they are offered. But we say, that it is needefull, that our will be changed by the grace and spirit of God: otherwise as touching in this point also we abhorre from the gistes of God. But of this matter, we haue befoze sufficiently spoken, when we entreated of grace. Wherefoze I will now stand no longer about it. But there is an other thing, about which there is at this day a moze waighty controuersye. They which defend merites, do thinke, that the good woꝝkes which are geuen of God vnto men, are sufficient vnto eternall life. Which thinge we do vtterly deny. And this maketh very much on our side, which a litell befoze we alleged out of August. That in the last iudgement we shall nede the mercy of God: not only because good woꝝkes were geuen of hym freely, but also, because, when the iust iudge shall sit in hys throne, no man can boast that he hath a chaste hart, or that he is cleane from sinne. Wherefore it is needefull, that sinnes (as sayth Dauid) be not imputed vnto hym, which shall come vnto felicity. Wherefore sayng we haue nede of mercy, it is manifest that our good woꝝkes are not sufficient.

The same Augustine writeth in an other place that the perfection of the sayntes herein consisteth, to acknowledge, how much they want still of perfection. And that sentence of Paul, I haue fought a good battayle, I haue finished my course, I haue kepte sayth, he so expoundeth: that he thinketh, that the Apostle sayth not, that he is vtterly wythout sinne, but that he, leaning vnto sayth, and vnto hope, did wholly appoynte wyth hymselfe, that it shoulde come to passe in the laste houre of hys death, whiche was euen then at hand, that whatsoeuer sinne or wickednes had crept into hym, the same should by the mercy of God through Christ be wholly forgiven hym, euen as he had forgeuen vnto others theyr offences. And it is so farre of, that Augustine thought, that Paul was vtterly without sinne, that he interpreteth this place vnto the Phillip-pians (Yea also I thinke all thynges to be but losse for the excellent knowledge sake of Jesus Christ my Lord, for whome I haue counted all thynges losse, and iudge them to be dongue) of woꝝkes done after he came to Christianity. For when as befoze, hauing made mencion of woꝝkes done when he was yet of the Jewishe religion he sayd, But the thynges that were vantage, the same I counted losse for Christes sake, those woꝝdes which are afterward added, he addeth by the way of correction, shew-ing, that not only woꝝkes of Jewishe religion, but also all other were to bee counted for losses and thynges vncleane. For he considered that in all thynges is some fault and defect or want. And that sinnes are mingled with our good woꝝkes, the scriptures most manifestly teach, when they say, that no man can be iustified in the sight of God. And the sayntes do make intercession against that exact examination of righteousness. Enter not (say they) into iudgement wyth thy seruauit O Lord. And Ihon sayth, If any man say, he hath no sinne, he deceaueth hymselfe, and the truth is not in hym. And Salomon sayth in the bookes of kinges, That there is not a man on earth so iuste, that he sinneth not. Which woꝝdes Augustine diligently weighing, applieth them vnto the forme of the present time: least any man should referre that sentence of Salomon vnto those thynges which we haue committed befoze re-generatio. We ought all to pray, that our trespasses may be forgiven vs: as which in this life may rather thirst after righteousness, then y we ca attaine vnto a perfect & absolute righteousness. For, that precept of y lord, wherein we are comanded to loue God with all our hart, with all our soule, and with all our strengths, shall then at the laste be performed, when we shall come to that place where we shall se God face to face as he is: as Augustine writeth in his booke, de Spiritu & Litera, towarde the end. In which place also he demaundeth, why this commandement was geuen, if it can not be performed in this life. He answereth, that therefore God commanded it, that we should know, what by sayth we ought to desire, whereunto our hope

hope shoulde be leueled, and what we ought continuallye to go aboute in all our actions. And he thinketh him to haue much profited in this life, which can at the length se, how farre he is of fraim that, which is perfect. The same Augustine (in his seconde booke De peccatorū meritis, & remissione chap. 16. 17. 18. writing many thinges as touching this matter) sayth, that in the scriptures men are sometimes called perfect, not because they are viterly without sinne, but because in innocency of life they haue much profited, and because that to obtaine perfection they continually bend theyr studie and endeuour, & because also God forgiveth them theyr faultes, and that whiche they wat of righteousness, he imputeth vnto the of the fulnes of the righteousness of Christ. Neither denieth he but that God requirerh of men, that they shoulde viterly be without sinne. For there could be no sinne, vntill there were a law, which whē we sinne we transgresse. Farther he demandeth, why God gaue that Lawe, which he right well saw, could by no meanes be perfozmed. And he answereth, that he did it for this cause, that he mought worthely condemn those which contemned it, & thorough contempt transgressed: & mought here theyr prayers, which applied theselues vnto it, and more and more helpe them dayly to accomplishe the same. And to this purpose he bringeth that sentence which is written: namely, that God correcteth and chastiseth those whom he loueth: but yet not with fury or auengment, but with a fatherly correction. But there is none chastised or afflicted which is without sinne. For this thing only suffred our Saviour: namely, wout any fault committed of him selfe to susteyne most bitter paynes. Wherefore seeing all men whom God loueth are corrected with aduersities, it followeth of necessity that they all are subiecte vnto sinne. Which thing Paul vnto the Galathians most assuredly affirmeth of the saintes. For he sayth, that in them the flesh so repugneth against the spirite, that they can not doo those thinges which they would. And in the next chapter he writeth, that he himselfe did the euill which he hated. By all these things may easely be gathered, that a man though he be neuer so holy, yet so long as he here liueth hath alwayes somewhat in him that hath nede to be forgiven of God. Which thing Augustine also testifieth towarde the end of his booke De Spiritu & Litera. And hereby is most evidently gathered, that our good workes are not sufficient vnto eternall life. But our aduersaries crake and boast, that the regenerate are not vile in the sight of God. But we say, that we before God are not without miserie. For vnles we were so, God could not vse mercy toward vs: which mercy yet, Augustine writeth, that we haue altogether nede of, if we desire to be crowned. For mercy is an effectio wherewith we are moued towards them that are in miserie: wherefore, if eternall life be geuen vnto vs of mercy, then must we nedes be viterly miserable before God. But, if they vnderstand, that the regenerate are not vile in the sight of God, because God beawiseth them with many giftes and ornamentes, we graunt to that. Yet those giftes whatsoener or how great soener they be, ought not to seme of so great force, to be sufficient vnto eternal life. And that commeth not thorough defaults of the giftes, but thorough our default, which in all thinges obey them not. For we still cary aboute in our flesh much of old Adam, and of naturall corruption. Farther, our aduersaries put a difference betwene the good workes of men regenerate: for they say y those are partly of our selues, and partly of God. Those (say they) as they are of vs can merite nothing, but as they are of God, they do merite, and are causes of eternall life. And by this distinction they thinke that y matter is made playne. But we graunte not so much vnto them. For if we diligently and thoroughly consider any worke, we shall of necessity graunte that it commeth of the grace of God, and that we muste not leaue vnto our selues any prayse thereof, though it be neuer so smal. But because God vseth vs to worke, who so long as we liue here are not fullye cleansed, thereof it commeth that our workes are alwayes vnperfect. Wherefore, if they were the causes and merites of eternall life, we might with security put confidence in them. But that the holy scriptures playnely forbid. For Paule in this epistle sayth: I iudge, that the sufferings of this time are not worthy the glory to come, which shall be revealed in vs. In this place Paul considereth good workes in that they are of God. For we haue not of our selues, to suffer aduersities for Christes sake. For it is God which worketh in vs that suffering. And yet though it be neuer so greace, Paul sayth that it is not to be compared vnto the glory to come. But these men appoint in a merite, as they vse to speake, de Condigno, that is, of worthines. Thirdly, the aduersaries contend that good workes are the cause of eternall lyfe, sine qua non, that is, without which it cannot be obteyned. Which sentence howe ridiculous it is, younge infantes (whom we knowe are saued without workes) can testifie. For although they by reason of age can do nothing that is good, yet do they obtayne eternall lyfe. Wherefore this cause is not of so great weight, that without it no man can be saued. And in those that are of full age, to speake properlye, good workes can not haue the nature of a cause. For in them those are nothing els, but a beginning of eternall lyfe. Wherefore saying they are a certaine part of eternall lyfe, they cannot be counted causes thereof. Yetther ment I any other thing els, why before I said, that good workes are meanes, and as it were certaine steps, by which God leadeth his vnto eternall lyfe. I graunt in dede, y among the fathers is oftentimes found y name of merite: which word I would to God they had more seldom, & with greter consideration vsed. For that word hath engendred most vile errors. Although the fathers themselves in many places mitigate and lenise that worde by expositions: to the end we should vnderstand, that they ment not the iust and proper nature of merite. For they alwayes aduonish, that eternall lyfe is geuen freelye, and that the saintes are crownded by the mercede and compassion of God: and that we oughte not to truste vnto merites, because they can be noton- sistent before the iudgemente seate of God: and other such like. Whiche sentences if our aduersaries would earnestly weigh and ponder, they would not so malepertly and stubberly defend those merites which they call ex Condigno. But (as I haue said) it is y safest way utterly to abstain fro this word, especially seeing it is neuer once vsed thorough out the whole Scriptures. But they vse to obiect a place out of the 12. chap. of the epistle vnto the Hebrewes. Talibus hostis promeretur deus which after the Latine is thus englisshed: With such sacrifices is God worne as by merite. But in the Greke in the place of this word promeretur, that is, is worne or merited, is writtē this word, εὐδοκῶ, which signifieth, is delighted, or accep- teth the. They obiect also a place out of the 18. chap. of Ecclesiasticus. Omnis misericordia faciet locum unicuique secundum meritum operum suorum: which according to the Latine is thus englisshed. All mercy shall make place vnto every one according to the merite of his workes. But first, that booke is not in the Canon: farther the place is not wel cited. For in Greke it is thus writtē: ὁ θεὸς ἕκαστον κατὰ τὸ ἔργον αὐτοῦ ἀποδοῖ. That is, all mercy shall make place: every one shal finde according to his dedes. In which wordes is no mention at all made of merite. Now let vs examine that which before we said, Augustine writteth: namely, that the Apostle might truly haue sayd, eternall lyfe is the stipend of righteousness, but he would not. Here first I say, that argumentes ought to be taken of that which we are taught in the holy Scriptures: and not of that which might other wise be writtē in the Scriptures. Wherefore it is a weak argument for a mā to say, y apostle might haue said, eternall lyfe is y stipend of righteousness wherfore righteousness deserueth eternall lyfe. Because y argument ought to be take of y words of Paul. For if it were lawfull to reason after this manner, the sound arguments, which leane vnto the worde of God should be weakened: For there might be alwayes obiected, although the Scripture so haue it, yet it might haue ben spoken other wise. And by that meanes we should haue nothing certain. And although I haue declared what Augustine ment by these wordes, yet I can not therfore be easily persuaded to thinke that the Apostle could haue writtē other wise then he wrote. For if the other kinde of speech should haue geuen occasion of hauntnes and pride, then could it not redesse: it behoued him also to follow the say- ings inges of the holy ghost. And although that sentence mought peradventure be spoken of righteousness taken by it selfe, yet can it by no meanes be spoken of vs, & of our righteousness. Wherefore seeing that sentence could neither edifie, nor make any thing to the purpose, I see not how Paul could so haue written. Howbeit in this matter I will not contend more then is mete with Augustine.

The seventh Chapter.

Now ye not brethern (for I speake to them that know the lawe) that the law hath dominion ouer a man so long as he liueth. For the woman which is in subiectiō vnto a man, is bound by the law to the man while he liueth: but if the man be dead, she is deliuered from the law of the man. So then if while the man liueth, she take an other man, she shall be called an adulteresse: but if the man be dead, she is free from the law, so that she is not an adulteresse, though she take an other man. Wherefore ye my bretherne are dead, also to the law by the body of Christ: that ye should be vnto an other: namely, to him which rose agayne from the dead, that we should bring forth fruite vnto God. For when we were in the fleshe, the affectes of sinnes which were by the law, had force in our members, to bring forth fruite vnto death. But now ye are deliuered from the law, being dead vnto it, where in ye were bounden, that we should serue in newnes of spirite, and not in the oldnes of the letter.

In this chapter the Apostle answereth vnto the other objection of the aduersaries, namely, that he seemed to deie the lawe more then was mete. And he declareth, that he for this purpose did it, that they which had once taken vpon them the name of Christ, should no more take to be vnder the lawe, when as by the benefit of Christ they are deliuered from it. And here he at large prosecuteth that which in the chapter before he had but briefly touched, when he said, Ye are not vnder the law, but vnder grace. Wherefore first he setteth forth our liberty, wherby we are deliuered from the seruitude of the law. Secondly, that he should not seeme to haue abrogated it, for that it commaundeth things vile & vniust, he declareth that it is not sinne, but only sheweth and uttereth sinne. Thirdly, after he had declared that by the prohibitions of the law, sinne is both encreased, and more vehemently killeth, he defendeth the law it self not to be that cause of our death, and that it cannot by any meanes be counted guilty thereof. And after that he had taught, that all destruction, and the whole cause of evils is deriued of the corruption & perversity which is by nature in vs, at the last he addeth that it exerciseth a very sore and violent tyranny in men euen being regenerate, and with great affect crieth out & wylleth that he might be out of hand deliuered from that violence. Now at the beginning he doth not absolutely write, that we are deliuered from the seruitude of the law: but he addeth that as a reason to open vnto vs the way & meane wherby we come vnto such a liberty: namely, the death of Christ. After that he declareth the ende, wherfore we are brought from the law vnto Christ: which is, that euen as before we brought forth fruit vnto death, so now we should bring forth fruit vnto God. And because the Jewes which were now come vnto Christ, mought bene bane offended with this sentence of the deliuey from the law, therefore by a louyng and gentle name he calleth them brethern, and attributeth vnto them the knowledge of the law, lest he should seeme to be moved either of hate, or of contempt toward them, to abrogate the law wherin they so much glozied.

Know ye not brethern (for I speake to them that know the lawe) that the law hath dominion ouer a man so long as he liueth. The purpose of that, that he

saied, that we are deliuered from the law is taken of no other thing, but for that we are dead. For they which are dead are not bound vnto the law. And y<sup>e</sup> we are dead, he declarerh by the body of Christ: in which (he saith) we are mortified vnto the law. And this argument the Apostle therfore so diligently handleth, for that vnto the Jewes (of whom in those first tyme the greatest part of the church consisted) it seemed a thing vile and filthy, suddenly to fall away from the law, which they had receiued both of their elders, and also at the handes of God. Wherefore the Apostle now sayth, that that ought not to be layd vnto vs for a fault, seeing that we are exempted from the law, neither depart we from it against the will therof. For it also sendeth vs away from it self vnto Christ. But of what law Paul here speaketh, all men are not of one minde. Ambrose thinketh, that those things which are here spoken, pertaine to the commaundement of the Gospell, and not vnto the law of Moses. For in it is permitted diuorcement, neither is separation alwayes waited for till the death of the husband or wife. But (sauiug the authoritie of Ambrose) a man shall not easily finde in the scriptures, that the Gospell is plainly called a law. Farther it is very plaine, that Paul reasoneth these thinges against y<sup>e</sup> Jewes, who thought the obseruation of the law necessary also in the Gospell. Wherefore it was needfull to confute them, not only by the Gospell, but also by the authoritie of the law. In which law although diuorcement were permitted, yet the Apostle now speaketh not therof. For he followeth the ordinary way vied in matrimony right ly instituted, wherein separation happeneth not but only by death. But that matrimony should thorough diuorcement be loosed, happeneth not, as Chrysostome vpon this place noteth, but thorough some default. For therfore oftentimes in the olde law were wiues put away of their husbandes, for that they were infected wth some great haynous sinne: or, if they were vertuous and honest, for that their husbandes were to much froward and malicious towardes them. But Paul would not ascribe any such thinges vnto the law. And soasmuch as he had a certayne and necessary cause of separation, as which came by the meanes of death, therfore he thought it not good to make mentiō of y<sup>e</sup> other cause, which neither hapned alwaies, nor was at any tyme vied of the vertuous and honest. Wherefore by this place we cannot define, what and how much Paul permitteth as lawfull vnto Christians in the case of diuorcement. For here he bringeth only a similitude taken of matrimony. But it is not of necessitie, that similitudes should vniuersally & in al points be correspondent: which thing Erasmus also in this place noteth. And Paul therfore made no mention of that separation which happeneth by repudiation, for that we depart not from the law by repudiation, but by mortification. Wherefore he thought it good to set forth that cause of separation, which made best to his purpose. For, soasmuch as there are two causes of separation: namely, death, and diuorcement: Paul toucheth that only, whereby we are deliuered from the law. And that is death. Farther, soasmuch as in this similitude we occupie the roome of the wyfe, and the wyfe in the olde law, although she mought be put away by diuorcement, yet could not she repudiate her husband, only it was lawfull for her being put away to depart from her husband, vnles her husband had chance to haue died in y<sup>e</sup> meane tyme: therfore I thinke with Chrysostome, that the Apostle speaketh not of y<sup>e</sup> Gospell, but of y<sup>e</sup> law of Moses. Whereunto also I am so much the rather moued, for y<sup>e</sup> Paul after ward expessedly maketh mention of the commaundement of not lying: which without all doubt is contained in the decalogue or tenne commaundementes. But in these wordes, The law beareth dominion ouer a man, so long as he lyueth, there is some ambiguitie, whether this word, liueth, ought to be referred vnto the mā, or vnto y<sup>e</sup> law. Which thing I thinke y<sup>e</sup> apostle did of purpose. For at the last he concludeth, that not only we are dead vnto the law, but also y<sup>e</sup> the law it selfe is dead, and abolished. And therfore to whether part so euer that word liueth, be referred, it agreeth very well with his purpose. Chrysostome thinketh, y<sup>e</sup> this reason is concluded of an argument taken a minori, that is, of the lesse. For if the death of the husband deliuer the wyfe from the yoke of matrimony, then shall there there happen much greater liberty, if the wyfe her selfe also die. Whereas there were two wayes of liberty, yet Paul it should seme persecuteth onely one of them. For he addeth.

V Wherefore my brethern ye also are dead vnto the Law by the body of Christ. But he inferreth not, wherfore the Law is dead. The Apostle did that for the infirmity of the Jewes: howbeit in the meane time he sayth that which is al one as if he had sayd, the Law is dead. But it is necessarie to consider what Paul meaneth by, to be vnder the Law. And that is nothing els, but to be obnoxious vnto sinne. For the Law thorough sinne cōdemneth vs as guilty: but to be dead vnto the lawe is nothing els, but to haue that ertingished in vs, by which the law accuseth and condemneth vs. And that is, the olde man, the flesh, naturall lust, and corruption of nature. When these thinges be once deade in vs, and that Christ liueth and reigneth in vs, we can by no meanes be cōdemned of the law. But soasmuche as so long as we liue here, sinne can not be plucked by by the rootes out of our flesh, therfore it is most likely that the Apostle had a respect vnto that, which we hope shall one day come to passe, althoughe be so wyte as though we had already obteyned it: howbeit in the meane time he setteth before our eyes a marke, whereunto we ought to leuell in all our actions, namely, perpetually to repress this lust grafted in vs. Wherefore every one ought so far, soth to iudge himselfe deliuered fro y<sup>e</sup> law, how farsoth he cā mortify his lusts and alwayes more and more contend to go forward, that at the length he may attayne to that end wherunto we are predestinate, namely, to be made like vnto the image of the sonne of God, being made partakers of his death and of his resurrection. And wheras there is set forth a double death, namely, of the law, and of vs, Paul expessedly prosecuteth our death only, whereof also followeth the death of the law. For the law prouoketh not, compelleth not, accuseth not, nor condemneth them that are dead: nether can by any meanes be troublesome or odious vnto them. And they which are dead and ioined together with Christ, do in no case wayte to be iustified by it: partly for that the law can not performe that, and partly for that they haue already by the grace of Christe obteyned true righteousnes. And we are sayd to be mortified by the body of Christe: ether for that being now made the members of the Lord we followe our hed: that as he was crucified and died as touching this mortall and corruptible life: so we also must dye vnto sinne: or els for that the body of Christ was an oblation and sacrifice, wherby God being now pacified and merciful geneth vnto vs bys spirite, by whome the power of sinne is weakened. And sithen Paul preacheth not this liberty but vnto them that are dead vnto sin, thereby we vnderstand that there is no danger, least men should by reaso of this liberty geue themselves to vices: For they that are dead cā not be stirred by to sinne. Farther we should be vnder the law, if we should liue vnto sinne, and vnto the flesh. But being dead, we are not holden vnder it: vnles we will say that the commandementes of the Law pertayn also vnto the dead. Forasmuch as Paul in this place vseth a metaphoze taken of matrimony, we ought to marke, that it is the office of the husband to gouern his wife. But when as the lawe had long time possessed the rōme of the husband, nether could execute his office, namely to gouern men, and to call the backe from sinne (for so is it afterward witten, That it was vnpossible vnto the law, in as much as it was weakened thorough the flesh) therfore the Apostle when he teacheth, that we are deliuered from the lawe, as from an infirme and weake master, teacheth also, that we are led vnto the spirite as vnto a better & mightier master: who alone hath that force to change a man: and that that whiche letted the law from doing of this, came not thorough the default of the law, but thorough our default. Here is to be noted, howe great a conformitie there ought to be betwene the man and the wife in matrimony rightely instituted. For the proprietie of the husband ought to be cōmunicated with the wife. Wherfore euen as Christ died, so also ought we to dye vnto sinne: And as Christ rose agayne

What to be vnder the law is. What it is to be dead vnto the law.

The scope of our life. How much every man is free from the law.

The deliue ry from the law is to be preached vnto those onely that are dead vnto sinne.

The commandementes of the law pertaine not vnto the dead.

The law was not able to do the office of a husband.

In matrimony there is a great confor mation betwene the man and the wife.

again to an incorruptible and immortall life, so also ought we to rise againe to beginne workes of eternall life. Wherefore Paul when he had made mencion of death, added,

That ye should be vnto an other: namely, vnto him which rose againe from the dead. He setteth forth an example also of the resurrection of Christ: in which wordes as sayth Chrysostome he ment to stirre vs by to the desire of a new matrimony, by reason of that excellent estate of Christe, vnto whome we shall be ioined. And the end of this new coniunction is expessedly put in those wordes which follow

That vve should bring forth fruite vnto God. In the first matrimony we were baren: for the law of good workes can not make men fruitfull. But men being filled with the spirit of Christ, streight way aboundantly bring forth fruit. And this is it, which God promised by Esay should come to passe in hys. 53. chapter, If he shall geue his life for sinne, he shall see his seed for a long time. And the lord sayth in Iohn: when I shall be lifted vp from the earth, I will draw all thinges vnto my selfe. This is it which Paul sayth to bring forth fruite vnto God. And this at the length is brought to passe, when not only we our selues do good workes, but also we bringe others vnto Christ. These two ends are not seperated a sonder. For neither can we winne others vnto Christ (if we consider the matter as it most commonly happeneth) vnles an example of an vpright life be correspondent vnto our sound doctrine. Neither is it rashely done, that the Apostle chaungeth the person, for before he vsed the second person, when he thus wrote: ye are mortified vnto the law by the body of Christ, that ye should be vnto an other. And straight way he addeth, That we should bring forth fruite vnto God. When rather according to nature of the consequente he should haue sayd, that ye should fructifie vnto God.

There is none so holy but he hath nede of these fruites.

But he changed the person to declare that this is a generall sentence: least any man should thinke himselfe to be so holy, that he now hath no nede of these fruites. For that cause the Apostle putteth himselfe also among the. Chrysostome excellently well noteth, that it happeneth not in these thinges, as it commonly happeneth in ciuill matters. For there, the husband being dead, the widow if she wil, may abstaine from the second matrimony. But we, when sinne is dead thorough the holy ghost, must of necessity be brought vnto Christ as vnto a new husband. For we are not now in our own power. For he hath redeemed vs with a price, as Paul sayth vnto the Corinthians: and for that cause we are not our own. Wherefore we ought to glorifye and to beare Christ in our bodies. And in the latter to the Cor: One died for all: that they which liue, should now not liue vnto themselves, but vnto him which died & which rose againe. Wherefore seeing we are now married vnto Christ, we ought to imitate vertuous wives: which whatsoever they do, haue not a regard what may please themselves, but what may be acceptable vnto their husbands. Agayne by these wordes is ouerthrowe that middle estate, wherein some are dreemingly imagined to be. Which are nether deade vnto sinne, nor bozne againe in Christ, and yet worke certayne good workes, which are acceptable vnto God, and prepare them vnto iustification. Paul here manifestly teacheth, that they which are not grafted into Christ, are bound vnto the law, and doo liue vnder sinne, and bringe forth fruites vnto death only: so that whatsoever they doo, the same is wholly vnto them deadly. But they which are married vnto Christ: they I say bring forth fruite vnto God. For God by them, as by his members and instrumentes sheweth forth his fruites and good workes.

For when vve were in the flesh, the affects of sinnes which were by the Law had force in our members, to bring forth fruite vnto death. In these wordes is set forth the Antithesis betwene this newe matrimony and that olde. And the sence is: Now we ought to bring forth fruite vnto God. For hitherto we haue brought forth fruite vnto death. Our olde estate also is here described, namely, that we were in the flesh. He doth not say, while we were in the law. For he would eschew offence not necessary: which thing teachers and preachers ought also to imitate: neither they kepe in silence things which are necessary to be hard, nor also by

by speaking out of ceason, alienate the myndes of the hearers. When we were (sayth Paul) in the fleshe, the affectes of sinnes, which were by the law. &c. In these wordes he semeth so to speake of sinnes and of wicked affectes, as though before the lawe they were not in vs. But that we shoulde not erre from the meaning of Paul, we ought to know, that we all haue from our birth a corruption and lust naturally grafted and planted in vs, which continually stirreth vp in vs wicked motions, and rages, and sundry kindes of vices. And these motions and violences Paul calleth παθήματα. For there is a difference betwene ἡδον and πάθος. For ἡδον are called moderate and laudable affectations. But πάθος are more vehementer affectes, which are caried with a greater force. These strong affectations are sayd of the Apostle, διεγείδαι, that is, by an inward force mightely to worke. And therefore there is sayd to be in the sede and likewise in the minde of man δύναμις, that is, a certayne power, which although it be hidden, yet is it of most great efficacy. Now these παθήματα, or vehement affectes are sayd to be by the lawe, not that they were not before, but partlie because by the lawe they are made open, and partlie for that when as the lawe withstandeth them as a let in their waye, they are made much more vehement. And therefore Augustine in his questions vnto Simplicianus the first question. Sinne (sayth he) is increased by the lawe, fyrst, because by it, it is knowen: secondly, because by it, it is the more provoked. For we contend to that that we are forbidden. And he addeth, that sinne by the lawe is made more greivous: for the lawe being once put we are made transgressors. When he sayth, that these vehement motions are of efficacy in our members, by members he understandeth all the powers and faculty both of the soule and of the body. Neither yet ought we to thinke, that Paul accuseth the naturall constitution of the body and of the members. Only he condemneth the wicked affectes, which range abroade through these partes. Chrysostome applieth this reprehensio to the thoughts. But this vice is spred abroad through out all the powers, both of the soule and of the body. The Marcionites, Valentinians, and Manichies which condemned the lawe as proceeding from an euill God, took occasion out of this sentence of Paul and certaine other like places vnto whome Augustine maketh answer in his 4. Sermon De verbis Apostoli. For he sayth, That they beguile Christians, not such as are simple, but such are negligent. For it is no hard matter (sayth he) euen of these selfe same thynges, which the Apostle hath writte in the selfe same chapter to refell the blasphemies of these men. Which sentence of that holy man confirmeth that which we haue offentimys sayd, namely, that the holy scriptures touching these thinges which pertain to saluation is sufficient, and may be of the faithfull vnderstand: so that they be not sluggish and slouthfull, and neglect the reading of the holy scripture. Hereafter when we come vnto it we shall declare, in what maner, and with what moderation and wise dome the Apostle defendeth the lawe. And as touching this sentence, we ought to note that Paul therefore sayth, that the wicked affectes of sinnes by the lawe were of efficacy in our members, because we were in the fleshe. Upon this is the blame to be layd, and not vpon the lawe. For vnles we had bene in the fleshe, the lawe had nothing binded vs. And to be in the fleshe is nothing els, but to be stirred vp by our owne strengthes, and to be moued and impelled of our vitiate and corrupt nature: for whatsoever is in vs besides the spirite and grace, is called fleshe. Wherefore in that in vs are increased sinnes and lusses, that cometh hercof, for that we are in the fleshe. Men vse as much as lieth in them to eschew a pestilent and hurtfull ayre. So we also, if we will be saued must abhorre and fye this contagiousnes of the fleshe, and fye vp into heauen vnto Christ. And we can not depart from the fleshe, but by death. And for that cause Paul exhorteth vs that by the body of Christ we shoulde dye vnto sinne. For the fleshe is a slippery place. Wherefore so long as we abide in it, we must needes oftentymes slide. Wherefore we must cleue fast vnto Christ, which may so gouerne and uphold vs, that in this slippernes of the fleshe we fall not into eternall destruction.

But now ye are deliuered from the lawe, being dead vnto it, wherein

by the lawe.

Paul accuseth not the naturall constitution of the body.

The holy scripture is sufficient touching those thinges which are necessary to saluation.

Unles we had bene in the fleshe the lawe had not binded vs what is to be in the fleshe.

The fleshe a slippery place.

ye were holden. &c.] Now he returneth vnto that estate, wherein we are now placed by Christ. Now (sayth he) are we deliuered from the lawe: he sayth not from the flesh or from sinne: for these two thinges he counteth for one and the same. Being dead vnto it, wherein we were holden. He sayth not that either sinne is dead, or that the lawe is dead. He sayth only, that we are dead. By that wherein we were holden, he vnderstandeth the lawe, and not sinne. For in the Greke is redde in ε, being the neuter gender. But ἀμαρτία, that is, sinne, is the feminine gender. Whobest it appeareth, that there were sundry readings amongst the Grecians. For whereas we haue now ἀποθανόντες, that is, being dead, some redde θανάτου, that is, of death: so that the sence should be, But now ye are deliuered from the lawe of death, that is, from the lawe that bringeth death. Others redde ἀποδυνάστεως, in the genetive case: as thought Paul would say, that we are now deliuered from the lawe that is dead. Although that reading, which we first followed and interpreted is both more common and also more receaued. And the Apostle in such sort sayth that we are deade vnto the lawe, as before he sayd that we are mortified by the body of Christ. And as Chrysostome sayth, we are therefore sayd to be deliuered from the law, for that that bond is now broken, whereby the lawe held vs obnoxious. And that bonde was sinne. And we were holden in the law, not as obseruers thereof, but as men condemned and guilty. Now are we, which are made partakers of the death of Christ, deliuered from it. By these thinges we vnderstand, that the lawe is sayd to be dead and to be abrogated, not through it selfe, but by reason of an other thing. For therefore it ceaseth now to accuse, to prouoke, to compell, to condemne and to be grieuousome, because sinne is dead. Wherefore the ende thereof was not to iustifie vs: for, that thing could it not performe, in as much as it was weakened through the flesh. The ceremonies also of the lawe were taken away by reason of an other thing: namely, because Christ is now come. And ciuile commundementes are now abrogated, because the common wealth of the Israelites is destroyed. And therefore Paul escheweth plainly to say that the lawe is dead, for that this thinge is not agreeable with it according to his owne nature. But he alwayes runneth vnto our flesh and vnto sinne, and freely pronounceth that they are dead. For by reason of their death, the lawe it selfe also ceaseth and dieth. But this is to be marked, that we in the meane while so long as we liue here are not perfectly dead. And therefore the lawe so long is not vnprofitable. For we are not endued with so plentifull a spirite, that we do all thinges by the impulsion thereof. Wherefore there are many thinges in vs, which the lawe may accuse and reprove. Wherefore holy men so long as they liue here, cease not to looke vpon the lawe, that slieng the condemnation thereof, they may be more and more conuerted vnto Christ. For although we be by sayth grafted into Christ, yet may that coniunction euery day encrease. For the life of the godly is sayd to be a perpetuall mortification and repentance. Neither is this any let vnto our regeneration, that we say, that much of the olde Adam is still remayning in vs. And therefore when we consider the lawe, and see what is still to be mortified in vs, we are more and more drawn vnto Christ. And this is it which Paul writeth vnto the Galathians: that he by the lawe is dead vnto the lawe. Wherefore euery Christian ought thus to count with himselfe, that so long as he seeth any thing in his conscience worthy to be reprovied, or any prouokemente to sinne, or any hatred or lothsomnes against the lawe of God, or that he is drawn against his will to do good, so long (I say) sinne is not in him dead and there is much remayning in him which may be reprovied of the lawe.

That we should serue in newnes of spirite, and not in the oldnes of the letter.] If thou demaunde whome we must serue, and were is to be made, we must serue God, to worship him as it is mete. The Apostle in this place bleseth this Greke word δουλεύειν, that is, to serue. Wherby it is manifest, that that difference which Augustin assigneth betwene δουλεύειν & λατρεύειν is not alwayes obserued. For Scriptures vse either word indifferently to signifie & worshippung of God. Vnto

Now we were holden vnder the law. The law is abrogated not by it selfe, but by an other thing.

So long as we liue here we are not perfectly dead.

Our conjunction with Christ may euery day be made greater and greater.

What are the tokens of sinne yet liuing.

The difference betwene δουλεύειν and λατρεύειν is not perpetuall.

to the spirite is attributed newnes. For the spirite by regeneration, reneweth vs both in body and in soule: and moreover in the beleuers it sheweth forth new and vnaccustomed workes. The antithesis also is to y<sup>e</sup> oldnes of our old estate, which y<sup>e</sup> Apostle expresseth by the name of letter: in which word he comprehendeth what soeuer doctrine may be outwardly set forth vnto vs. For whatsoeuer is such, proceedeth from the strengths of nature. And it is called old, because it cometh not from a hart regenerate, and a will changed. In this also is a certaine kind of obedience: but yet not such an obedience as God requireth. And therefore it is called y<sup>e</sup> oldnes of the letter, for that it is a certaine slender imitation of that doctrine which is set forth vnto vs. Workes of this kinde, come not of the impression of the lawe in the harts of men. For God in Ezechiel promiseth to geue vnto his people a fleshy hart. Those thinges also, may after a sort pertaine to outward discipline. But they neither please God, and moreover to them that do them, they are sinnes, and therefore Paul sayth: that they pertaine to oldnes. Certaine of the fathers imagine many thinges touching the spirite, and the letter: but by the letter they vnderstand an historicall sence, by the spirit they thinke are signified allegories. But the Apostle ment farre other wyse. But of this matter we haue spoken somewhat vpon the second chap. of this epistle, vpon these wordes of Paul, the circumcision of the hart is, which consisteth of the spirite, and not of the letter. Neither ment Paul any thing els in the latter to the Corinthians, when he sayth: That the law killeth, but the spirit quickeneth. For he calleth the law grauen in stones, the ministry of death: & sayth that he is not appointed the minister of the letter, but of the spirite. Chrysostome thinketh, that this sentence, that we should serue in newnes of spirite, is therefore added of the Apostle, that we hearing mention made of liberty, should not liue loosely through licentiousnes of the flesh: but should vnderstand, that we are bound to a certaine other kynd of seruitude, and that is, to serue God. Although, as we before admonished, it can not properly be called seruitude: for in it we follow not an other mans will, but our owne. Neither are these wordes of Paul so to be taken, as though all the fathers of the old Testament liued in sinne, and in the oldnes of the letter. They pertaine vnto them only, which either in this tyme want Christ, or in the old tyme liued without him: such as were many of the Israelites, which waited for Christ according to the flesh: as though Messias should be onely a pure man, which should come and bring nothing vnto the Iewes but a carnall kingdom, pompe, riches, glory, and a large dominion. But the godly fathers as Abraham, Iacob, Dauid, Esay, and many others of that race, wanted not the benefite of Christ: but being endewd with the spirite of God, had the fruition of the liberty of the Gospell, so much as the nature of the tyme then suffred. They in dede obserued the ceremonies of their times, & such other like precepts: but this they dyd of their owne accord, not being compelled, neither bare they any hatred against the law of God. And although at this day after y<sup>e</sup> Christ hath appeared, y<sup>e</sup> spirit of God be more largely poured abroad, and the mysteries of our saluation are more plainlier manifested, then they were in times past, yet dare I not affirme that those holy patriarches had lesse of the spirite of Christ, then haue many cold Christians in our tyme. And I wonder at Chrysostome being so great a man, y<sup>e</sup> when he wrote vpon this place, he would say: That the elders had a body heavy, and sluggish, and vnapt vnto vertues: but our bodies after the comyng of Christ are made lighter, reddier, and cherefuller: and for that cause the preceptes of the Gospell are more hard & higher then were the commaundementes of the law. For vnto them it was sufficient not to kill: but vnto vs it is not lawfull so much as to be angry. Vnto the it was sufficient not to commit adultery, but vnto vs is also prohibited the lustful looking vpon an other mans wife. And such other thinges of y<sup>e</sup> same sort. I graunt in dede y<sup>e</sup> certaine thinges wer permitted in y<sup>e</sup> old law, which were reuoked by Christ. For it is not lawfull for christians as it was for y<sup>e</sup> Iewes, for euery light cause to geue a boke of divorcement. But those thinges which Christ admonished of lust & of anger pertained no lesse vnto y<sup>e</sup> Iewes in y<sup>e</sup> old time, then they do to vs in this time. And wheras Christ sayth: It was said to the

Why newnes is attributed vnto the spirite.

What is to be vnderstand by the name of letter.

The difference receaued touching the spirite and the letter is refelld.

To obey God is not a seruitude. Not all the fathers of the olde testament liued in sinne

The interpretation of the law deuinered of Christ pertained also vnto the elders. Somewhat was graunted in the law which is denied vnto vs.

in olde tyme, that is not to be referred vnto the sentence of the law, but vnto the wisked interpretations of the scribes and pharisees. For otherwise, when as in the ten commaundements it is sayd, Thou shalt not lust, all maner of wicked lust both of the flesh, and of vengeance, and of other mens goods is vtterly forbidden. But not only Chrysostom, but also many other of the fathers erred in this matter. But to returne to our purpose, we ought to know that certaine men are by the lawe stirred up only to certaine outward ceremonies, and certaine cold woorkes, which pertaine only a certaine discipline: but those selfe same can in no wyse attaine to the iust and perfect obseruance of the will of God: but there are others, which whē they very diligently consider the law, and behold the boyroz of sin, and the unclea-nes and weakenes of their strengths, at the last vtterly dispaire and begin to hate and abhorre God, and to blasphemize him and his law, and to fall hedlong into all mischiefe and wickednes, vntill they drowne themselves in eternall destruction.
But vnto godly men the consideration of the lawe is profitable and healthfull: for when as in it, as in a glasse, they consider their owne infirmity, they are compelled, to get them vnto Christ as vnto an haven, of whome they may both obteyne forgiuenes of sinnes, and also day by day greater instauration of strengthes.

What shall we say then: is the law sinne? God forbidde. But I knew not sinne but by the law: for I had not knowen lust, except the law had saide: Thou shalt not lust. But sin toke an occasion by the commaundement, and wrought in me all manner of lust. For without the law sinne was dead. For I once was aliue wpythout the law: but when the commaundement came, sinne reuiued, but I was dead, and the same commaundement which was ordeyned vnto lyfe, was found to be vnto me vnto death. For sinne tooke an occasion by the commaundement, and deceaued me, and thereby slew me. Wherefore the lawe is holy, and the commaundement is holy, and iust, and good.

What shall we then say? Is the law sinne? God forbid. Here Paul beginneth after a sort to defend the law. For before he sayd, that we are deliuered from it. And he mought haue seemed not very godly to haue esteemed of the law, especially when he sayd: That the affectes of sinnes, which are by the law, were of efficacy in our members, that we should bryng forth fruite vnto death. For these and such other lyke things which seemed to be contumeliously spoken agaynst the law, he was comonly ill thought of, of the apostles. Wherefore by pzeuention, he obiecteth vnto himself that, which he knew was by them layd to his charge. Is the law (sayth he) sinne? By the figure Metonymia he putteth sinne, for the cause of sinne, or for that doctrine whiche perswadeth to sinne. He speaketh it by way of interrogation, as though he would put forth a question to be debated. And to cleare himselfe of all manner of suspicion, and to declare how farre he was from this impietie, straight way without any tarpeng, he answereth, God forbid. But to make that which followeth easlier and plainlier to be vnderstand, this is to be noted, that Paul attributeth not vnto the law the woorkyng of sinne. For sinne commeth of it only per accidēs that is, by chaunce. For the true and proper cause of sinne is in our selues. For, the lust which is grafted & infused in vs, when the law of God setteth it self agaynst it, wareth more fierce, and is more vehemently kindled: not that the law bringeth occassions to this infection. For it only sheweth things which are euill, setting forth what things are to be done, & what to be eschued. But when the corruption of nature perceyueth that those thyngs which are set forth of the law, are agaynst it, it gathereth together his strengthes, and strengthneth it selfe to resist as much as lyeth in it, and therefore it poureth out greater forces. As we see in the sommer, whē cold cloudes hange ouer vs, then in these lower regions are much greater heates.

The law is not properly the efficient cause of sinne.

In our selues is the true cause of sinne.

A simili-
tude.

And

And when as of the sonne al things are inflamed and made whole, yet by Antiprison, welles and places vnder the earth are moze cold. For such is the nature of things contrary, that to repell the presence of their contrary, they moze vehemently bend themselves, and gather greater strengthes.

The nature of things contrary.

But I knew not sinne but by the Law, For I had not knowen lust, except the Law had sayd, Thou shalt not lust. By these wordes the Apostle teacheth, that the Law encreaseth not sinne, but so farre forth as it setteth before our eyes the knowledge thereof. And he speaketh of himselfe, to geue vs to vnderstand, that he speaketh or declareth nothing, but that which he had learned by feeling and experience. And by the same example he secretly exhorteth vs, wholly to discend down into our selues, if we will together with him know the grounds of our saluation. If thou demandst what time Paul sayth, that he knew not sinne, and was ignorant of lust, many thinke he meaneth this of his childehood: in which time by reason of age, he could not vnderstand the commaundementes of the law. This answer although I meane not to disprove, yet do I not thinke it to be sufficient. For after that we are come to discretion, nether age nor naturall knowledge can of themselves shew sinne, vnles we most attentively consider the Law of God. For if it be but lightly and skenderly looked vpon, it engendreth not a true knowledge of sinnes. Wherefore we may say, that sinne is not knowen of men, both when they are letted by age, and when being come to age they neglect the Law of God, and also when they doo not attentively enough either heare or rede it. This place manifestly teacheth, that Paul entreateth not only of ceremonies, but also comprehendeth the ten commaundementes. For out of the he bringeth a confirmatiō of his sentence, when he citeth this precept, Thou shalt not lust. And even this Law whereof he speaketh, is it from which he pronounceth that we are deliuered. Which thing were not possible, if, as our aduersaries affirm, we should be iustified by the workes thereof. But thou wilt say, did not the Law of nature shew sinne? why then doth Paul say, that he knew not sinne, but by the law geuen of God by Moses? Indee the law of nature shewed sinne, but yet so long as it was sound and whole. But it being in a maner cleane blotted out, partly by the fall of the first parentes, and partly by many other corruptions, which it had now by long vse and continuance contracted, could not performe his office so much, as should be sufficient vnto the saluation of men. Wherefore God gaue a law which should restore all things, which our prauity had corrupted in the Law of nature. And yet could not the presumption of men be so repressed, but it went aboute in the Law also geuen of God to deprave many things. For the Scribes and Pharisees with theyr interpretaciōs had corrupted the nature and proper sence of the Law. Wherefore Christ was compelled to bring it to perfection from theyr deprauation: and to shew that it is farre otherwise to be vnderstand, then they in the olde time had interpreted it. And hereby we vnderstand that there is no small difference betwene the Law and the Spirit. The Law may be blotted and corrupted by euill interpretations. Farther also, although it be perfect, yet hath it not suche strengthes that it can either extinguishe sinne, or alienate the minde from sinne. But the spirit can not be vitiated nor corrupted: and it breaketh sinne, and chageth the minde. But we ought to know that the Law geuen by Moses could not so much be corrupted, as the Law of nature. For although it were by interpretations corrupted, yet the Law written remayned alwayes one, which being rightly examined was able alwayes to reprove the corrupters thereof. But the Law of nature inasmuch as it is situated in the mindes of men, if it be there once corrupted, can neuer be made sound agayne. But there are many which say that Paul vnderstode these things of the Law of nature, of which opinion Origen seemeth to be. But Paul himselfe confuteth them when he bringeth a testimony out of the Law of Moses. Others thinke, that the Law of nature did indeede shew sinne, but taughte not the offence of God, and as they say the guiltines whereby we are by reason of the sinnes

How the law encreaseth sinne.

At what time Paul knew not sinne.

Both age and sinne let vs from the knowledge of the law. Where is proved that Paul entreateth also of morall preceptes. The law of nature also shewed sin. The law of nature was in a manner cleane blotted out.

The presumption of hypocrites went about to deprave many things in the law of God. An euident difference betwene the letter & the spirit.

The law geuen by Moses could not be so corrupted as the lawe of nature was.

The law committed, condemned to punishmentes. But the Law geue of God performed both. And forasmuch as this guiltines and the offence of God are the principall thinges which are considered in the Law, therefore the Law geuen of God is sayd to shew sin. But this can not be attributed vnto the Law of nature, because it sheweth not that thing, which in sinne is the chiefest. But nether is this sentence sufficient as I thinke. For vnles men had by the Lawe of nature vnderstande, that God had bene offended, they woulde neuer haue endeouored themselves by sacrifices and oblations to satisfie his wrath, or by bowes and purifications to redeme theyr murders. Farther those thinges whiche happened in the floude and in Sodome, and in many other places, may be a sufficient argument, that God punisheth sinnes. This thing also the historiographers, poets, orators, and philosophers, haue euery where in theyr writings taught: and in the holy scriptures bothe Pharao and Abimelech testified the same, as we haue before sayd.

Wherefore omitting all these opinions, we say, that Paul speaketh these thinges of the Law geuen by Moses. For of it arose the controuersie. And although it be longe to all good lawes, to better and to shew sinne, yet is there no law which so fully doth it as doth the Law geuen of God, so that it be rightly vnderstande: that euen for this cause chiefly, for that it is geuen of God. For other Lawes, although sometimes they commaund thinges by right, yet because they are thoughte to be onely inuencions of wise men, doe not much moue the minde. Iudebe the excellent sentences of philosophers, and poetes, delight the mind: but they doo not so vehemently reprove a minde hardened, as doth that Law which we are fully perswaded to haue ben geue of God. For in it we seme to hear God himselfe speaking vnto vs. Farther it may at the firste bryng some wonderfull, why the Apostle amongst all other preceptes, brought this only precept, Thou shalt not lust. But the Apostle did this, as he did also all other thinges, moste warely. For he thought chiefly to take that kynde of prauity, which is most hidden from the iudgement of men, and is not set forth in other lawes. For the naturall lust and corruption which impelleth vs to all euils, is in this place touched, and layd abrode, as the fountayne and hed of all euilles. Wherefore this is an excellent sayinge of Augustine, that no sinne is committed without luste.

The lawes of men not such efficacious as the law of Moses.

Why the precept of not lusting is aboute other here brought. Lust is here touched because it is the heade of all euils.

Wherefore Paul woulde not speake of the grosser outward sinnes, for that he saw that they pertained vnto discipline, and are not onely set forth by the ciuill Lawes, but also punished. Rather woulde he speak of wicked affections and perturbations, for that he saw them condemned of the philosophers in theyr Morall discipline, and rules geue by them, to bring them to a mediocrity: he wot rather to the very roote of all sinnes, and sheweth that it being vknownen and hidden, is manifested and brought to light by the law of God. And to expresse this thing more playnly, this is to be obserued, that all the commaundementes of God ether commaund something, or forbid something. And they commaund not only that a thing should be slenderly done: but also that it be done, with all the soule, with all the hart, and with all strengths, and most exactly: so that there be utterly nothing in vs, which is not obedient vnto the will of God. And that which they forbid, they doe not only so forbid it, that it it self be not in vs, but also that there be not least in vs any affect or proues thereunto. And therefore God gaue this commaundement, Thou shalt not lust, that we should both in minde, will, and wholy in al the partes both of the soule and of the body, abhorre fro those thinges which God hath prohibited. And in this manner answere together these two commaundementes: Thou shalt loue the Lord thy God with all thy soule, and with all thy hart. &c. Whiche is to be repeated in all the preceptes that commaund any thinge to be done: and the laste precept, Thou shalt not lust, which agayne is to be vnderstand in all thinges that are forbidden. Wherefore in these two commaundementes is the pith, and if I may so speake, the soule of the lawe, as without whiche the other commaundementes of God can not be full and perfect. And all men although they be neuer so holie, yet are they accused, ouercome, and condemned of

of either of these preceptes. For unless the grace of God throughte Christe shoulde succour vs, we haue nothing before our eyes but certayne destruction. For so long as we here liue, how free we are from lust, Augustine most plainly declareth in many places: and especially in his 200. epistle to Asellius the bishop. For thus he sayth, That in mynde, he may do that which he loneth, and not consent vnto the flesh, which doth that which he hateth: that is, not that he should not lust at all, but, that he should not follow after his lustes. And straight way: We shall one daye come to the ende thereof, when the lust of sinne shall not be restrained or bridled, but shall not be at all. For this thyng hath the lawe set forth saying, thou shalt not lust: not that we are here able to performe this, but as whereunto by going forward we bend our selues. And against Julianus in his 6. booke and 5. chapter; but who doubteth, but that lust may in this tyme be diminished, but yet not consumed. What is the property of the lawe Paul now declareth, namely, to shewe sinne. And that alwayes it doth, where soeuer any commaundement of the lawe is, whether it be in the five bookes of Moses, or in the prophetes, or in the bookes of the new testament. For the lawe is not distinguished from the Gospell by bookes, but in forme and maner of teaching. But this property of the lawe, when it is lightly weighed, appeareth not. For the knowledge of sinne is two maner of wayes: the one is whereby we only beholde the nature thereof: the other is whereby by experience or some certayne byting, we haue a feeling thereof, in our selues. And this latter way is the fruite that cometh of the reading of the lawe: namely, not only to know sinne, but also to be daunted at the feeling thereof when we vnderstand that we are in a maner consumed of the wrath of God. The Apostle waresly sayth, that he knew not sinne, and was ignorant of lust, vnles the lawe had sayd, thou shalt not lust. But he sayth not, that he had not sinne before the lawe. For there was euen then also sin in him, but it was not acknowledged. And a litle afterward, how sinne was in him then he declareth, saying, Sinne before the lawe was dead: but so soone as it came it reuiued agayne. Sinne in dede was before, but yet not so vehement: wherefore also it seemed the les to be accused. And for that cause Christe said, If I had not come, and spoken vnto them, they should haue had no sinne. By which wordes he signifieth, not that they should vtterly haue bene without all sinne, if he had not come, but that they should not haue sinned so greuously. But thou wilt say, seing the lawe sheweth not only sinnes, but also good dedes, why doth the Apostle only say, that it sheweth sinne? I answer, as before I answered. For that the lawe was not able to shew vertues (which are known by experience and feeling) neither in men strange from Christ, nor in the regenerate. For in men strange from Christ, the lawe found nothing but sinne. And in the regenerate it found rather certayne inchoations or beginnings, then perfect vertues. Farther by this place we vnderstand, that the lawe is with great diligence to be learned and to be peysed in the minde: as without which both the force of sinne is not knowen, and the grace and mercy of him that forgaueth is contemned. And because this is very hurtful, therefore the holy scriptures alwayes inculcate into vs the knowledge of the lawe, and pronounce them blessed, which are occupied in it day and night. Which is true if therewith all be ioyned Christe the only ende of the lawe. And that the lawe might the easelper be vnderstand, God alwayes rayled by and inspired holy prophetes to expound it vnto the people: when they sharply cried out agaynst the sinnes of their times. Christe also our Sauour hath deliuered vnto vs a most exquisite interpretation of the lawe. Now they at the last are to be counted to rede the lawe of the Lord with fruite, which so often as they lay away the booke, acknowledge in themselves somewhat, which must be by the mercy of God forgiven, and by his grace be amended. Agayne by these wordes of the Apostle, is the lawe defended from their slander, which crye out that it is euill, and proceedeth from an euill God. For they say, that the lawe is euill and sinne, which thing Paul expessedly denieth. For he answereth, God forbid. Farther how can it be ill, which condemneth and forbiddeth lust, which they are compelled to confesse to be ill? But wher-

These two precepts accuse men though they be neuer so holy.

Where the law sheweth sinne. In the scriptures the lawe is not distinguished from the Gospell by bookes. The knowledge of sinne is two fold.

Why the law is sayd to shew sinne and not vertues.

The law is diligently to be learned.

Who are with fruite occupied in the contemplation of the lawe.

as he saith by the law sin entred in, that is spoke by a metaphore. For that blame which the same ascribe vnto þe law, ought to be transferred vnto corruptiō þe natural ly grafted in vs. And although the lawe in many seme to worke nothing els, but moze and moze to heape vp sinnes, yet that commeth not therefore, for that it selfe is euill, but for that it can, of a corrupte nature bying forth no other thing.

law is obligous vnto
vs.

But why the lawe is vnpleasant and hatefull vnto vs, that hereof commeth (saith Ambrose) for that it alwayes sheweth thinges euill, namely, sinnes, and con- demnation. But there is none which will gladly heare of those thinges. Yet they, that be godly indee, although they are by it bitten, for it, doe geue thanks vnto God. For they feele, that by the preaching thereof they get incredible frutes. But before we passe ouer this place, there are a fewe thinges to be spoken of, whiche in my iudgement seme very necessary to the full vnderstanding thereof.

What is prohibited in this commaundement Thou shalt not lust.

There are some which thinke, that this commaundement, Thou shalt not lust, forbiddeth not the prauity and corruption of nature, or the first motions, whereby we are afflicted towarde those thinges which God hath forbidden: But by that commaun- dement (say they) is only prohibited the consent of the will and of the minde. And then at the length they confesse that we sinne, whē we geue place vnto those first motions, and suffer sinne to raigne in vs. But those thinges, whiche followe in this selfe same chapter do most manifestly reprove them. For Paul sheweth, that he entreateth of that lust, which is irkesome vnto a minde that serueth the lawe of God. And he addeth, that by it he doth that euill which he hateth. But these thinges haue no place, where the consent of the minde is ioyned with all. And of this kinde of lust he cryeth out: Unhappy man that I am, who shall deliuer me fro the body of this death? And he addeth, that he is of it drawen captiue agaynst his will, and resisting it. Wherefore seeing this lust is of this nature, there is no cause, why it should be wpested vnto the consent of the minde.

That com-
which can not be fulfilled is not in vaine geuen.

But herein our aduersaries are exceedingly deceaued, for that they thinke, that this precept is in vaine geuen, if it prohibite that which can not be aloyded in this life. And it is a thing ridicu- lous, say they, to commaunde any thing vnto the brute and foolish fleshe, and to the irrational partes of the minde, whiche vnderstand no such thing, and are of necessity moued to do that whereunto they were instituted. But these men ought to haue remembred, that this precept was geuen vnto man endued with reason: and that not in vaine, nor without purpose. For God had created man to hys owne image and likenes. Wherefore it was requisite, that he should haue nothing in him, which should not agree with the will of God. Neither are the commaun- dementes, which can not be perfozmed in this life, geuen in vaine to men, as these men sayne. For the lawe of God hath a farre other ende, then that it should be absolutely perfozmed of vs, or that we should by the obseruation of it obtayne righteousness.

Lust of two sortes.

Wherefore lust is of two sortes: the one is a manifest consent of the minde, which pertayneth to euery one of the commaundementes of God. For anger and hatred pertayne vnto this commaundemente, thou shalt not kill: Lust and filthy desire pertayne vnto this commaundement, thou shalt not com- mitte adultery: the other is a generall lust, which is a prouesse against the will of God, and is, with all the motions thereof expzessed in the last precept, thou shalt not lust, but there is yet remayning a doubt, for Moses setteth not forth that pre- cept, so simply and playnely as doth Paul: but sayth he, Thou shalt not lust after thy neighbours house, hys field, hys seruauit, hys mayde, hys oxe, or hys wyfe. The cause of this diuersity is, for that whē as Moses should geue the lawe to men being rude, he would moze openly and moze plainely describe lust by the obiectes whereunto it is caried, that they mought the easlier vnderstande it. But Paul which sawe that he had to do with them that knew the lawe, thought it inough precisely to say, thou shalt not lust, supposing yf it should neede no farther declaration. Yea neither did Moses reckon vp all thinges, whereunto we are by lust led. He thought it sufficient to reckon a certaine fewe thinges which straight way were perceaued of euery man, as grosse and manifest. And so we see, that God in like maner vsed the figure

Moses recounted not all thinges whereunto our lust is caried.

Synecdoche

Synecdoche in a maner in all the rest of the commaundementes. Which thing Christ in Matthew hath plainly taught vs, when against the traditions of the Scribes and of the Pharisees, he defended the true meaning of the law. For he taught, that in that commaundement, thou shalt not kill, is not only prohibited the hand, but also continually, hatred and wrath. And that in this commaundement, Thou shalt not commit adultery, is not only forbidden the vncleane action, but also the lustfull looking and all maner of inflammatiō of the minde towards a woman not being thy wife. After the same maner we could easily declare that in all the rest of the commaundements is used the figure Synecdoche. Farther in every one of the commaundementes are commended the vertues, which are contrary to that vice which is there prohibited. For when we are forbidden, to beare false witnes against our neighbour, therewithall also we are commaunded, to defend the truth, and earnestly to succour the good fame of our neighbour & when we are forbidden to steale we are also commaunded to be liberal towards our neighbours & to communicate such things as we haue to them yf want. And so declare yf which oftentimes cometh into my minde, the ten commaundementes of the lawe seme in my iudgement in all partes as touching honesty, filthynes, vertue, and vice, to extend as farre as the ten predicamentes of Aristotle, For, as there can nothing be found in the nature of thinges, which pertayneth not to those predicamentes, so is there no vertue, no vice, nothing honest, nothing filthy, which can not be referred to some of the ten commaundementes. And as all the generall wordes, and perticular kindes of the other predicamentes are resolved into the predicament of substance, so may all outward sinnes be resolved into lust. And as the predicament of substance hath matter and forme, as the first and chiefe ground, so the whole consent of our minde to sinne, is resolved into the prauity of our nature. Wherefore although in the lawe are set forth thinges knowen and grosse, yet in them God requireth that, which is commaunded in the first and last commaundement, namely, that we should haue the motions both of the body and of the minde honest and cleane, and that we should abhorre from all those thinges which God hath forbidden vs. Farther this to be noted that Paul bringeth this as one only precept. Thou shalt not lust. Wherefore I meruaile at certayne amongst whom also is Augustine, which of one commaundement do make two: as though in the one is prohibited adultery, when it is sayd, thou shalt not lust after the wife of thy neighbour: and in the other is forbidden, that we couet not an other mans land, house, ore, seruaunt, and maide. But if the preceptes shoulde increase in number according to the number of the thinges that we lust after, we shoulde of one commaundement make in a maner infinite commaundementes. For it is possible that we may couet our neighbours honours, dignities, vessels, money, garments and infinite other such like thinges. But there are others, which to kepe the full number of ten in the commaundements, haue left this commaundement: Thou shalt not lust, vndeuided and haue deuided the first precept into two partes: so that in the first part they put this, thou shalt haue none other Goddes: and in the second, thou shalt not make to thy selfe any grauen image &c. But I thinke that either of these partes pertayne to one and the same precept. And I suppose the first commaundement to be that, which is set before the rest in steede of a prohemie: I am the Lord thy God which hath brought thee out of the land of Egypt. For in those wordes are we commaunded to count him for the true God. And that we should not thinke that he is to be worshipped together with other Goddes, straight way is added the second precept, wherein we are prohibited to worship strange Gods, and grauen thinges and images. And if a man will more narrowly consider the thing he shall see that together with as it is his first commaundement is offered vnto vs the Gospell. For God in it promiseth that he will be our God. And in that which is mencioned of the deliery out of Egypt, is containned a promise touching Christ. But to returne from whence we are digressed, we ought certainly to hold, that in this precept, Thou shalt not lust, are prohibited our corrupt inclinations

God in the commaundementes used the figure synecdoche.

In all the commaundementes are commended the vertues contrary vnto that vice which is prohibited. The ten commaundementes like the ten predicamentes of Aristotle

The commaundement against lust is not well deuided into two.

Whiche is the first precept.

In the first commaundement is offered vnto vs the Gospell.

nation and euill motions of the minde: which we should not acknowledge to be sinnes, vnles the lawe had shewed them vnto vs. Aristotle, Pighius, and such other like, for that they were ignozante of the lawe of God, contende that these are not preceptes.

Difficiles

But sinne tooke an occasion by the commaundement, and wrought in me all maner of lust. Hetherto Paul hath declared, that the lawe only sheweth sinne. Now he toucheth the true cause of all transgressions, which cause he plainly calleth sinne by which word he vnderstandeth the corruption of nature & remnants of original sin. The law is as a scholemaster: & therfore it only teacheth & in-structeth. But of it selfe it bringeth not forth these euils. This place of Paul excellently setteth before our eyes, what maner ones we are by the transgressiō of our first parentes. When we are called vnto God, we flye away from him, when we are inuited to brightness and eternall life, we runne away hedlonge vnto sinne and death. So that thing which ought to be vnto vs a remedy, increaseth & aggra-uateth the disease. Desperate diseases, as a canker, and the leprosy, are of so great stubburnes, that by laying remedies vnto them they ware worse and worse, wherfore the phisitions geue them ouer. Euen such is our lust. Who will abide such an hoise, which how much the more he is picked forward with spures, so much the more goeth backward: Undoubtedly that sonne is of a very wicked nature, which as soone as he heareth the commaundement of his louing father, straightway with all his endeour laboureth to the contrary. But we are fallen so farre, that certaine thinges therfore seme sweete, for that they are forbidden vs. Therfore Salomon sayth: Waters stollen are the sweeter. Augustine wisely waighyng wyth hymselfe thys prauity, in his booke of confessions accuseth hymselfe, for that when he was yet a childe, he wyth others stole away other mennes peares, not for that he was hungry, or for that he would eate them himselfe, or geue them vnto others (for they were sower, and he had much better at home) but only to do ill, and to committe those thinges which were forbidden him. Pauls whole scope is this, to transfer the fault which was layd vpon the Law, vnto our prau-ity. For the Law ought not to be accused, that it was an occasion of sinnes.
For there is nothing so good, but that it may be an occasion of greates euilles.
Our sanctor saith of himselfe, If I had not come & spoken vnto the, they had had no sin.
And in the 10. chapter to the Hebrewes: How much more greauous punishment se- meth be worthy of, which hath troden vnder foote the sonne of God? And Paul straightway in the beginning of this epistle reponeth the wise men of the Gentles, for that when they knew God by the wonderfull order and beawty of thinges created, they yet glorified him not as God. Whereby it came to passe, that the knowledge of God, which they had gathered by nature, was vnto them an occasion of greater damnation. If a phisition should forbid vnto one sicke of an agew cold drinke, and he should therfore begin more feruently to thirst, that is not to be attributed vnto the phisition. And euen as in this case, the corrupt affection of the sicke party is the ground of this euill, so the corruption of our nature is the true and proper cause of sinne. Therfore we must continually pray vnto God, that it would please him to renew in vs our will. Farther we must put away infidelitie, which exceedingly strengthneth the lust that is grafted in vs. For if we verily beleue, that those thinges which are prohibited of God will certainly bring vnto vs destruction, we would not vndoubtedly commit them. For when before our eyes is set present death of the body, we all flye from it. But when we beleue, that that which is set before vs is not present death, or that we thinke we shall escape it by some meanes, we contemne the admonition: so if we beleue God when he threatneth death vnto sinners, we would vndoubtedly obey his commaundements. But forasmuche as there still cleaueth vnto vs that payson of infidelitie, which the deuill breathed into Adam, when he perswaded him, that that thinge should not come to passe, whiche God had threatned, our luste thus subtelly reasoneth with vs, that those punishments which God hath threatned in the law, shall not be inflicted vpon the transgressors so roughly, as they are there set set forth: and that it is possible that we may by some meanes escape them. More ouer by this place we see, that they are in miserable and vnhappy case, which are straungers from Christ. For al thinges though they seeme neuer so good, turne to them vnto euill, which thing Paul durst affirme of the law, that is, of the word of God, how then can it be doubted of other thinges? And that which Paul sayth, by the law is wrought in vs all maner of lust, some so interpretate, as though before the Law there was no lust in vs. But these men ought to consider, that Paul wrote, that sinne by the law wrought in vs all maner of lust. And if sinne wrought it, then must it nedes be, that it was in vs before. And when as such sinne is called lust, it is not simply sayd, that it wroughte luste, but there is added this word All, which signifieth, whole, perfect, and absolute lust. Wherefore Augustine expounding this place, sayth, lust was before the law, but not full and absolute. Neither disagreth Chrysostome from this exposition. Ambrose also sayth, when the Apostle sayth, All maner of lust, he thereby signifieth all maner of sinnes. Wherefore it is very manifest, that Paul ment nothing ells, but that out of our contaminate and corrupt nature, when it was prouoked by the Law, sprang all maner of sinnes, or (as they vse to say) actuall sinnes. Neither wanteth this an Emphasis, in me. For if these thinges happened in Paul, who, as he himselfe writeth vnto the Galatians, had profited in the religion of the lawes above all the men in his time, and as he sayth vnto the Phillippians, Had walked without blame in the righteousnes of the law, and as he writeth in the first to Timothee, Had from his elders serued God in a pure conscience, What is to be thought of vs, whiche are neyther studious of the Lawe, nor yet do in any part performe the thinges which we do know? I know there are some which thinke, that the Apostle here toke vpon him the person of an other man, so that these thinges are not pertainyng vnto him, but vnto men not yet regenerate, or still wallowing in sinnes. And Augustine semeth sometimes to haue bene of that minde. But in his. 2. booke of Retractions the. 1. chap. he sayth, that he was moued vpon most iust consideration to reuoke that. For it is very playne by those thinges which follow, that Paul entreateth of such a man, as in mind serueth the Law of God, and delighteth himselfe therein, which hateth euill, and is drawen agaynst his will vnto the Law of sinne. Wherefore he concludeth that these wordes ought to be vnderstand both of Paul and of all the godly. And yet followeth it not of necessity that we should say, that Paul by reason of natural lust fell into al kindes of sins. For here is not entreated of the outward actions, but of the affectes of the mind, and the first motions. Neither is here considered what is done, but what may be done by our naturall prones vnto euill.

For without the law sinne was dead. ] Then men are sayd to be without the Law, when ether by reason of age they can not attayne to the vnderstanding therof, or ells whē now being come to full age, they ether nothing at al pesse it, or very scenderly. He sayth that sinne was dead, because, as it is written to the Corinthians, The force of sinne is the Law. And euē as that body is said to be dead, which utterly wanteth all maner of strenghts, so sinne also was said to be dead for that whē the Law was not, it was not of efficacy, & waited his power. That which is dead moueth not it selfe. So sin, whē it was not impelled by any law, nothing at all moued vs: but was sluggish, & after a sort dead, so that it was ether litle or in a maner nothing at al felt. But as sone as the Law came, it receaued strenghts. Chrysostome interpreteth That sinne was dead, for that it was not known. Vnto which opinion Augustine leneth, when he sayth that it was hidden. But al these thinges tend to one end. For the Law strereth not by sin, but by knowledge. Ambrose sayth, that sinne was dead, because men before the Law thought they might sinne freely without punishment. But this sentence we haue before con-futed. For we haue shewed, that men also by the Law of nature felt, that God was angry agaynst sinne, and greuously punished it. Vnto paradueneure Ambrose ment this, that thing was the more obscurely knowne then it was afterward, when the Law was geuen. But he sayth moreouer, that by sinne may be vn-derstand the deuill. For he toke an occasion by the Law, to worke in vs all manner of lusts and he is sayd of Paul, to haue bene dead before the Law, for that he not so carefully tempted men, as being sure of them, as of his owne possession. But as sone as the Law was geue, he ceased of from that quietnes. But this interpretation is farre from the scope of the Apostle. For he entreateth of sinne, which is shewed by the Lawe. And the Law sheweth vices and wicked actes, and not the deuill. Which thing is proued by that which streight way followeth.

For I knew not lust, except the Law had sayd, Thou shalt not lust. But it is wonderfull how Ambrose entreating of this argument, should say, that the deuill when the Law was geuen, lost his dominion ouer men. For by the Law and sinne, we were made more obnoxious vnto the deuill. This benefite we owe vnto Christ, and not vnto the Law. Howbeit the Greke Scholies I knowe not by what meanes bend vnto this sentence touchyng the Deuill. For they say, that it is possible, that as our sauiour is sayd to be the way, the truth, and righteousness: So the deuill may be called sinne, a lye, and death. The commentaries which are ascribed vnto Jerome, fauouring this sentence, bying a similitude of an enuious ma, which is commonly so much the more moued against him whom he enuieth, how much the greater the benefite is which he seeth is bestowed vpon him. So the deuill when he saw the singular gift of the law of God, geuen by God vnto man, began so much the more to rage against him, and by the commandement of God, toke an occasion of raging. But whatsoeuer these fathers say, it is very plaine by the wordes of Paul, that he in this place speaketh of that sinne which is by the lawe brought to light, such as is lust. But they when they heard, that sinne toke an occasion by the law, and seduced, and killed, thought that these things ought to be referred vnto some certaine person, which might be distinct from vs which are sedured and killed. But they saw not, y Paul by the figure Prosopopeia speaketh eue of our sinne and lust. And they followed Origene as their author. But most of all, do those commentaries erre, which beare the name of Jerome. For they in this place utterly make with the Pelagians touching originall sinne. For thus in the is it written. If when the law was not, sinne was dead, they are out of their wits whiche anouch, that sinne by traduction cometh from Adam vnto vs. Therefore here he sayth sinne was dead for that it liueth not in infantes, which are without the law: that is, it is in them committed without punishment. For when the infante speaketh ill vnto the parentes, it seemeth to be sinne, but yet sinne not liuing, but dead. Although the child sinne, yet sinne is dead in hym: for he is not subiect vnto the law. Thus much in that place.
But touching the sinnes of infantes, and especially of them that are not regenerate, Augustine, was of a farre other opinion, and especially in his booke of confessions. Neither do the Catholikes doubt, but y Originall sinne is traduced from Adam into his posteritie, and that by it are condemned those infantes which are straungers from Christ. Howbeit sinne may be said to be dead in them, for that it is not known of them, and for that they feele not themselves moued therewith.

be dead.

tude.

But when the commandement came, sinne reuiued: but I was dead, and the commandement which was ordeyned vnto lyfe, was found to be vnto me vnto death. When sinne was dead, he saith that he liued, for y he was not troubled, neither was his conscience made ascard. Yet did he not liue in dede: but as Augustine saith, he seemed vnto himselfe to liue. As, when a man thinketh that his enemy now cealeth, and is quiet, he beginneth to be secure. So Paul saith, that when he was without the law, he seemed vnto himselfe to liue: but when the commandement came, things began a new course. Sinne (saith he) reuiued, and I was dead. So vndoubtedly standeth the case. When sinne is dead, then do we seeme vnto our selues to liue. But when it once reuiueth, we straight way are dead. For we feele in our selues the wrath of God, and condemnation. And when the elect are so dead, Christ rayseth them vp agayne, and killeth sinne in them. For he pardoneth whatsoeuer is done amisse: and breaketh and diminisheth whatsoeuer of the corrupt lust is remayning. Therefore the death of sinne is two manner of wayes, the one

one is not a very death, but a counterfeit death, so that the law is absent. For sinne without the law is neither knowne, nor any thing moueth vs. But the other death of sinne, is the true death, when as it is slayne of Christ, and crucified together wth him. But this is to be noted, that whereas sinne reuiueth, and killeth m<sup>e</sup>, some are killed to saluation: as are those which flye vnto Christ, and are by him reuiued: but others are killed to destruction: as Judas, Cain, and such other lyke, which when they knew their sinne, dispaired of saluatiō. Sinne is sayd to haue reuiued, because it was in vs before: and as sayth Augustine and other interpreters, because it had from the beginning, sone after the fall of Adam, liued in the nature of man: but by little and little all the feeling therof was cleane blotted out. But because these m<sup>e</sup> seme by the law to vnderstand the commaundement geuen vnto the first parents in Paradise, which (as I before declared) is strange from the purpose of Paul: therefore we must simply say, that sinne reuiued, for that it now began to poure forth his strengths, which before it did not, when it seemed to be dead.

And the commaundement which was ordeyned to lyfe, &c.] He sayth of the commaundement was instituted to lyfe: not that it gatte lyfe, but for that it teacheth those thinges which serue vnto lyfe, and severely requireth them, and vntles they be done threatneth destruction. He sayth not, that the commaundement is death, but only turned to death: for otherwise the scope of the law is, to shew and aduance lyfe as much as lieth in it. But that it cannot performe it, it cometh through our default.

For sinne toke an occasion by the commaundement, and deceiued me, & by it slew me.] He repeteth that which he before sayd, that sinne toke an occasion by the commaundement, to encrease in vs transgressions. This repeticion (as the Græke Scholies note) declareth that this doctrine is very necessary. For so great was the authozity of the law amongst the Iewes, that they could not be perswaded that they were through Christ deliuered from it. But in this repeticion Paul addeth certayne thinges, which before he spake not of. For before he wrote, that sinne taking an occasion by the commaundement wrought in him all manner of lust.

Now he declareth also, how it wrought it: namely, by deceauyng. Farther also he addeth, what followed after al this lust, being thus wrought. By it (sayth he) it slew me. In summe he sheweth three thinges, which sinne (being stirred by by the law) wrought in vs. First, it deceaueth: Secondly, in them that are deceaued, it engendreth manifold kindes of sinnes: which is to worke all manner of lust: last of all it slayeth. But what this deceauyng is, all men are not of one opinion. Some which by sinne will haue to be vnderstand the deuill, referre these thinges to hys temptyng, wherby they say that he deceaueth vs, taking an occasion by the law. But sayyng this exposition is not (as we haue sayd) to be allowed, therefore we must of necessity seeke for an other. Augustine thinketh, that here is vnderstand a double deceauyng: for first by the prohibition of the law is stirred by our lust, so that sinnes forbidden vs, are moze pleasant vnto vs, & we take greater delight in them. Farther if there be any thyng done of vs rightly, & same we wholly attribute vnto our own strengths, and thynke that we haue fully satisfied the law. Others say, that our corrupt and vitiate nature herein deceaueth vs, for that it sayneth it selfe gladly to admitte, and wyth great reioycing to allow the law. For we wyll all seme to be louers of the vertue. And hereof it cometh, that so many so sone as they heare the Gospell preached, wyth great reioycing receiue it: but when a life correspondeth to the Gospell is required at their handes, straight way they step backe fro it. So sinne grafted in vs, although it sayn it selfe to fauour the law of God: yet it continually dratweth vs from it, so far is it of, that it truly consenteth vnto it. Although all these thinges be true & worthy of noting, yet vnto me this semeth a moze playner exposition, to say, that sinne therefore deceaueth vs, for that it perswadeth vs, that those thinges which are against the law, are profitable, and for that it turneth away our thought from the punishments which the law threatneth vnto vs, and biddeth vs to trust that those punishments may either be auoyded, or els shall not be be so greuous as they are there set forth. And so in all sinnes which we committe is mingled some ignozaunce, which is poured into vs by the decreate of our naturall lust.

VVherefore the Law is holy, & the commaundement is holy, & iust, & good.

The conclusion of this part.
Paul followeth Da-uid.

Here haue we the conclusion of this part. The Lawe is acquitted from all that suspicion, whereby it was sayd to be the cause of sin. For it (sayth he) is holy. The Apostle semeth to haue taken these properties of the Law, out of the 19. Psalm, where the Law in the Hebrew is sayd to be: Torah lehouah Temimah meshi- uah nephelch, that is, perfect, upright, and pure. And when he had pronounced, that the Law is holy he addeth touching the commaundement, that it also is ho- ly, iust, and good. He so sayth as I thinke for no other cause, but for y he would commend the Law, and whatsoener is contained in it. Chrysostome vpon this place proueth, that the Apostle speaketh these thinges of no other Law, but of the law of Moses, which thing seeing we also before proued, there is no neede here to re- hearse again his reasons. And although the Law by very good right, be set forth with these praples, yet ought we not therefore to thinke, that we are by it iustifi- ed. For Paul most manifestly sayth, that it was ordeyned to life, but is turned yn- to vs to death.

Was that then which is good made death vnto me? God forbid but sinne that it might appeare sinne wrought death in me by that which is good, that sinne might be out of measure sinnefull by the commaundement. For we know that the Law is spirituall, but I am carnall being sold vnder sinne.

VVas that then vvhich is good, made death vnto me? God forbid; but sin, that it might appeare sinne, vvrought death in me, by that vvhich is good. ] Wither to he hath cleared himselfe of the sleauner which was rayled by agaynst hym by his aduersaries, as though he should teach that the Lawe is the cause of sinne. Now he dischargeth himselfe of an other crime wherof he was publickely accu- sed, as though he should say, that the Law is the cause of death. For so much as death and sinne are so ioyned together, that the one is alwayes engendred of the other, therefore Paul, when he had confuted the first obiection touching sin, goeth to the other obiection concerning death. For before he denied, that the law was of it selfe the cause of sinne: now he also denieth it to be the cause of death. And euen as before he defended the Law by translation, when as he sayd, that the lust naturally grafted in vs is the true and proper cause of sinne: So now al- so he vseth the selfe same translation, and ascribeth death not vnto the Law, but vnto the vice grafted into vs by nature. If a man demaund what commoditie hereof followeth, that our lust beinge irritated by the Lawe, committeth more hapnauer wicked facts and bringeth death, he answereth, that we are thereby brought opely to the knowledge of the malice of our naturall prauity: which prauity herein chiefly consisteth, that it perniciously abuseth the most excellent Law of God: so that y which was ordeyned to good, both now bring vnto vs de- struction. And yet must we not sticke & stay in this knowledge of our misery. For the more we know, that we are in perdition, with so muche the greater endea- our ought we to flye vnto Christ: at whose hands alone we must looke for saluation, and who is the only remedy of our so greate misery. And this is the scope of the whole scripture. For euery where in it is ether declared our prauity, or els set forth the mercy of God thorough Christ. The reason whereby Paul proueth, that the Lawe is not the cause of death, is this: That whiche is spirituall and ordeyned vnto life, can not bring death: But the Law of God is spirituall and or- deyned to life, wherefore it can not properly be the cause of death. The 11. of 1. Cor. first proposition hath two parts: the first is, that the Law can not bring death, so: that it was ordeyned vnto life. This sentece is proued by the nature of things

As the law
by it selfe is not the
the cause of sinne so also is it not the cause of death.

contrarie: For death and life, so much as they are things contrarie, can not at one time be found in one and the selfe same subject. For it is not possible, that of one and the same Law, should in the selfe same men together at one and the same time, be engendred both life and death. The second part is, that the Law is spirituall, and therefore can not bring death. And that is hereby proued, for that the nature of the spirit is, to quicken, and not to destroy.

Vvas that then which vvas good, made death vnto me? ] Thys he therefore objecteth vnto himself, for y<sup>e</sup> before he seemed to speak things repugnant, namely, y<sup>e</sup> the commaundement was ordeyned vnto life, but yet turned to him to death. These things seme at the first sight not well to agree. It semeth that he should rather thus haue sayd: What then? Is the Law which bringeth life, made vnto me death? But Paul to set forth the oblation more vehemently, comprehendeth the Law vnder this word Good: or this promise which, is referred to y<sup>e</sup> which was before spoken, namely, ordeyned to life. For before he had affirmed both: namely, that the Law is both good, and also ordeyned to life. Wherefore he now not without cause objecteth vnto himself: Was that then which was good, made vnto me death. God forbid. But Sinne (here vnderstand) vvas made vnto me death. For so is the sentence to be made perfect. Now he declareth what vtility the Lawe, which was geuen, brought. For he sayth that sinne abused it and by it slewe vs: that (sayth he) it mought be knowen and appeare that sinne, by that which was good, wrought vnto me death. God would haue vs to vnderstand, that our corruption is greate, that by the Law, that is, by a thing most good, it bringeth death. Paul speaketh not here chiefly of the death of the body, althoughe it also doo follow, but rather of that death, whereinto we incurte, when we earnestly fele our sinne by the knowledge of the Law. For hereby we see that we are obnoxious vnto the wrath of God, & adiudged to hell fire. Which thinge when we wth efficacy & seriously consider we fele in our selues some taste of eternall condemnation. By which meanes it cometh to passe that although in body we liue, yet we are sayde to be slaine of sinne by the Lawe. And as they which are kept in prison, after that they know that sentence of death is geue vpon the, although they are permitted to liue two or three dayes to take their leue of theyr friends, yet are they filled with incredible heauines and hozro, and every houre haue a taste of theyr death, so that al that time they may seme rather to dye then to liue. And eu<sup>e</sup> as they which are sure to be very shortly rewarded with a greate and looked for reward, although in the meane time they take greate paynes, yet do they nothing weighe that trouble, for that eu<sup>e</sup> in theyr labors they seme to the selues to haue after a sort the fruition of theyr hoped for reward, and to haue it in a manner in theyr hands: So they which by the Lawe see & fele, that they are now condemned to eternall death, take no pleasure at all in the delights of thys life, For eu<sup>e</sup> now they fele in themselves, that those paynes are begon. But many maruell, that Paul should say that this came to passe in himselfe, and especially when as he writeth vnto the Galatians, that he had profited in the religion of the Iewes aboue all the men in his time. And vnto the Phillippians, That he had bene conuersant in the righteousness of the Law, without blame: And vnto Timothee, That he had from his elders serued God with a pure conscience. But Augustine in hys first booke agaynst the two epistles of the Pelagians in the 8. and 9. chapters diligently dissolueth this doubt. He mought (sayth he) be honestly conuersant in outward workes, so that before men he mought without blame performe the righteousness of the Lawe. But before God, and as touchinge the affectes of the minde he was not free fro sinne. For it mought be that he thorough feare of men, or through feare of punishments, which God threatneth vnto transgressors was moued to liue vprightly: but as touching lustes and inward motions, agaynst which, men would not that God had made any Law, he also was obnoxious vnto vice & sinne. Nether was he by faith and charity as he ought to haue bene, stirred vp to the workes whiche he did. And that he erred, he hymselfe testifieth of himselfe in many places. Vnto y<sup>e</sup> Eph. the 2. cha. he sayth, And you that wer dead in sinnes, wherein in times past the walked according to the course of this world, after the prince that ruleth in the ayre, euen the spirite that now worketh in the children of distrust. Among whome we also had our conuersation in times past, in the lusts of our fleshe, in fulfilling the will of the flesh, and of affections, and we were by nature the children of wrath as well as others. But G O D, which is rich in mercye, thorough hys great loue, where with he loued vs, euen when we were dead by sinnes, hath quickened vs together with Christ. And vnto Titus: For we also were once fooles, disobedient, straying out of the way, seruing the desires, and pleasures in malitiousnes and enuy, one of vs hating an other. Such a one was Paul befoze he was conuerted vnto Christ, although he mought not vnworthely make great boast of his outward righteousness. And that thou shouldest not say, that he was changed and deliuered fro these sinnes, when he began earnestly to apply himselfe vnto the doctrine of the lawe, wherein he so much profited, that he coulde now be neither accused nor slayne of it, he hymselfe in the selfe same epistle to Titus auoucheth, that he was by Christ only iustified, and by the benefite of the holyghost acquitted. Wherefoze befoze he was come to Christe, the knowledge of the lawe coulde do nothing but kill him. For thus he sayth, but when the bountifullnes and loue of God our Saniour to wardes man appeared, not by the workes of righteousness which we haue done, but according to his mercy he saued vs, by the washing of regeneration, and of the renning of the holyghost, which he shed on vs most abundantly through Iesus Christ our Saniour, that being iustified by his grace, we might be made beyres according to the hope of eternall life. But vnto that which he writeth vnto Timothe, that he had from his elders serued God with a pure conscience, answere may thus be made. That although he had not in him his conscience accusing him, yet this acquitted him not from sinne. For there are many and haue bene many Scribes and Pharises, which being instructed with an ill conscience, had an ill iudgement of the lawe of God: whome yet Christ manifestly repproueth. Wherefoze when as afterward came a moze sounder knowledge of the lawe, by it by reason of sinne now known were they slayne. Farther we must see what it is that Paul goeth about in that place to perswade vnto Timothe, he sayth, that he geueth thanks vnto God, that without ceassing he maketh mencion of him in his prayers, and desireth to see him. And that he should not thinke that he spake this after any common maner, as though he did it only to flatter him, but spake not from the hart, he sayth, that he had neuer bene accustomed to lye. And although his conscience could not repproue hym of lying, yet were there a greater many other thinges, which the lawe being truely known inought repproue in him. And that he had not the perfect knowledge of the lawe, hereby it is manifest, for that he persecuted Christ in hys church, who is the ende of the lawe. In which thing he did nothing agaynst his conscience: for it was then in no other sort instructed. And therfoze he sayth, he did it through ignorance and infidelity. Neither hath the lawe of God that power to kill, through sinne, but when it is perfectly known. And these thinges are spoken of Paul when he was yet of the Jewishe religion. And how these thinges pertayned vnto him after he knew Christ, and how they pertayne to vs, shall afterward be declared. Howbeit in the meane time, these thinges ought to moue vs, to detest the naturall sinne grafted in vs.

That sinne might be out of measure sinfull by the commaundement. ] Here the Apostle declareth, that he entreateth not only of the knowledge of sinne, which is perceaued by the lawe, but also of the comming of that wickednes which is wrought by taking an occasion of the law. For by y figure Hyperbole he saith, that sinne is made sinfull aboue measure: And vnto sinne by a figure he sayneth a person, which sinneth, deceaueth, and slayeth. Which he therfoze did, for that he considered, that we are slow and blockishe, and vnderstand not the pernicious blot of our originall sinne. But because the latten translation hath aboue measure sinfull, Ambrose demaundeth whether peradventure there be any measure of sinne granted by the lawe. And he answereth, that there is none: for the lawe condemneth all sinnes vniuersally: although he confesse that there is a certayne measure as touching the seuerity of God: aboue which measure God differreth

Paul affirmeth that he was iustified by Christ only.

They which are not well instructed in the lawe are not sometimes repproued of their conscience.

differreth not his punishments and vengeance. As it may be sayd of the Chanaanites, Sodoma, Gomorrha, and other nations, whome God suffered a longe while to escape unpunished: But afterward when they exceeded that measure, whiche God coulde no longer suffer to exceede, he vtterly ertinguished and destroyed them. Although some say, that sinne aboue measure encreased after the lawe was geuen, if it be compared with that tyme wherein the lawe was not. For then mought haue bene pretended some ignorance: but that ignorance, so sone as the lawe was geuen and published, was taken away: But I would rather expound this by the figure Hyperbole, that is, vnmeasurably. For when lust wareth of force, we fall into all kindes of sinnes. But the kindes of sinnes can not be expessed. For euen as archers but one only way hit the marke, but yet infinite wayes mysse it: so vertue consisteth in the middelt as a marke, we may infinite wayes erre from it, but there is but one only way to attaine vnto it. That which is in the Greke, ἀμαρτωλός ἢ ἀμαρτία may thus be turned in Lattin, Peccatum peccator, that is, sinne a sinner. But because that soundeth not so well, it may be turned, sinne out of measure vicious. Aristotle in his 3. of Ethikes sayth, that of extreames the one is more vitious, and the other lesse.

The lawe is spirituall, but I am carnall, being sold vnder sinne.] Here is rendred a reason why it is not to be imputed vnto the lawe, that of the knowledge thereof followeth death. For (saith he) the lawe is spirituall, but the propriety of the spirite is, to geue life. And this thing experience well teacheth vs. For we see, that bodyes do so long liue, how long there is in them spirite: and in nature, what soeuer is moued of it selfe, and hath in it by any meanes life, it hath it by the benefite of the spirite. Wherefore if the lawe should of it selfe bring death, doubtles it should do it against the nature of the spirite. And the lawe is called spirituall for two causes. First because it was not deuised of mans vnderstanding, as ciuill lawes are: but was wrytten by the ministry of Moses in mount Sina, God himselfe by his spirite being the inditer thereof. Wherefore comming of the spirite being the authoz thereof, it is call spirituall. It is called also spirituall: for that not being content with outward actions, it perleth euen to the will and to the minde, and to the inward motions, senses, and spirites of a man, and commaundeth vs to obey it with all the soule, and with all the spirite. Wherefore they are sotoy deceaued, which so distinguish the olde lawe from the new, that they thinke that the olde lawe only restrayneth the hand, but the new pertayneth also to the affectes of the minde. For they are not to be counted to satisfy the olde lawe, which obserue only an outward righteousness. And if they do not that which the lawe commaundeth, that which they do doubtles pleaseth not God: yet rather it is to be counted sinne. The lawe of God soasmuch as it dealeth not with vs after a ciuill maner, is not content only with an outward honesty of maners. Wherefore nether Socrates, nor Aristides by their righteousness satisfied the lawe, though they be neuer so much commended of wryters. And when the Pharisey had geuen thanks vnto God, for that he was not as other men, but fasted twise in the weke, and did many other thinges which mought please men, Christ pronounced, that he went not to his house iustified. But without al doubt he should haue obtayned righteousness, if by those his workes which he made mencion of, he had satisfied the meaning of the lawe. This excellency and perfection of the commaundementes of God, carnall men vnderstand not, so that the Israelites when Moses came downe from the mountayne, could not loke vpon the brightnes of the countenance of Moses. neither could they abide it. And we also so long as we vse this bayle of humane reason, shall not be able to behold the spirituall light of the lawe. Origene thinketh that the lawe is therefore called spirituall, for that it is not to be expounded according to the letter, as commonly it is sayd, but by allegozicall senses. But seing Paul here entreateth of the ten commaundementes, as that precept which is of him cited, Thou shalt not lust, plainly declareth, this interpretation ought vtterly to be counted from the purpose. For in this part of the lawe we may not deale with alle gories. Neither doth Paul therfore say, that he is carnal, for that he vnderstand not allegories, but for that he felt in himself affections struing against the law of God. Now then soasmuch as the law is spirituall, in that manner that we haue now declared, it followeth of necessitie, that it of his owne nature bringeth not death, but rather lyfe. For so Moses in Deut. the 30. chap. sayth: that he had set forth vnto the Israelites life, and death: good, and euill: blessing, and cursing. For the perfect obseruation of the law draweth with it, blessing, life, and good: and by violating therof bringeth cursing, euill, and death. And the law commaundeth not transgression, but obseruation. But yet it lieth not in our choise or will, of our owne accord to chuse god, life, and blessing. For the commaundments of the law, are displeasing vnto vs, vntill the spirite of Christ come. And Christ sayth: If thou wylt enter into lyfe, kepe the commaundments. And David in the 119. Psalmie saith: That the law reioiceth the mynde. Which testimonies if they be rightly vnderstanded, teach this selfe same thing. But if a man demaund, whether these proprieties of the law, at any time attaine to their effect. We answer, that they do: but yet euen then when the law is written not only in tables, but also in our hartes, and bowels. For the, although the law be imperfectly expresse in our woordes, yet are not the promises therof made frustrate, which in the elect of God are performed, not thorough merites, but thorough grace and mercy. After that the Apostle had in such sort commended the law, he rendereth a reason, why of it he receiued not life, but death.

Bicause (saith he) I am carnall, sold vnder sinne. Here the crime of slaying, & the increase of sinne is transferred from the law to the corruption of our nature. And there is nothing more gratefull vnto God, then for vs to accuse our selues, & with due prayes to set forth his worde. It was not possible to deuise a more apte commendation of the law. For Paul doth not only set forth the singuler dignitie therof, but also speaketh that, which he saith is well knowen and vnderstande of all the godly.

We know (saith he) that the law is spirituall. And to make this the more playne, he setteth against it our uncleannes.

I (saith he) am carnal, and sold vnder sinne. The law is the maistrisse of vertue, and enemy of all vices. I abhorre vertue, and follow vices euen against my will. When he saith that he is carnall, he meaneth that he was infected with originall sinne, and corruption. For, that euill is deriued from Adam by the flesh, whiche yet containeth not it selfe in the flesh, but possesseth the whole man and all his strengthes. And the better to declare what this worde carnall, signifieth, he addeth, sold vnder sinne. For euen as bondmen are oftentimes drawen and impelled of their masters to that which they would not: so are we by originall sinne drawen to many things which we allowe not. Neither are we only vnder bonds of originall sinne, but also through our owne will we adde therunto a great heape of sinnes. Wherfore we are bound with many kindes of snares. By this metaphoze Paul notably setteth forth our captiuitie. The Iewes were oppressed with greuous seruitude, when they were captiues in Egypt: neither were they any gentler delt with, in Babilon: but most cruelly of all were they handled vnder Antiochus. But there can no seruitude be compared with this, wherof Paul now speaketh: for in those seruitudes was only an outward enemy, and the case was only touching the life and goodes of the body. But here we haue an enemy in the inward partes, and in the very bowels: and our minde is subiect vnto sinne, euen against our willes, and we resisting it. We were sold, so some as Adam had sinned. For by one man sin entred into the world, and in hym all men haue sinned. We were solde gratis, that is, for nothing: for there was no iust cause which drawe our first parentes to sinne. Farther also, soasmuch as when we are bozne, we draw sinne with vs, neither take we it vpon vs of our owne will, therfore are we said to be sold gratis. Augustine vpon the booke of Judges the 17. questiō, wondreth at this phrase of speech in the Scriptures, wherby men are said to be sold gratis, when as no price at all was payd for them. And he saith, that by this phrase is signified nothing els, but that the Israelites

Israelites were deliuered of God into the power of their enemies, of whom they should be afflicted no other wise, then if they had bene bought bondmen. And he sayth that this word gratis, which is red in the Psalmes and in Esay, is very aptly put: For that God when he in such sort deliuered the Jewes into the power of straungers, got thereby no honour or worshipping at all, as a reward or price. For they were idolaters. So we are sayd to be deliuered gratis both vnto the deuill, & to y<sup>e</sup> corruptio<sup>n</sup> naturally grafted in vs: for y<sup>e</sup> by the redoundeth vnto God, neither honour nor thanks. For they are enemies vnto God, & do continually beare hatred against him. But as we are sold gratis, so also are we redeemed gratis: not but y<sup>e</sup> Christ hath paid for vs both his lyfe & blood: but for y<sup>e</sup> we haue therunto geue nothing of our owne, neither ar we iustified by any our merite. The self same phrase of speach is red in y<sup>e</sup> 1. booke of Kings y<sup>e</sup> 21. cha. of Achab y<sup>e</sup> wicked kyng: He was solde to do euill in the sight of the Lord. But in the Hebrew phrase this word, Hichmabo, signifieth, that he sold himself: both for that he willingly, and of his owne accorde vnto those things, wherunto by the lust grafted in hym he was moued: and also for that thorough his owne will he had therunto added many kindes of sinnes. Augustine in hys 41. treatise vpon John, compareth this seruitude wherby we liue in vnder sinne, with the ciuill and outward seruitude: and in that comparison setteth before our eyes in how vnhappy estate they are, which are in such sort solde vnder sinne, and made seruantes vnto the tyranny therof. A bondeman (sayth he) is in some hope to chaunge hys lord or maister, if he chaunce to be ouer cruell and froward towarde hym. For by one meanes or other he practiseth wyth some to buye hym of hys Lorde, and counteth it a great benefite, if he may leaue his cruell Lorde, and obteyne a gentler. But sinne so cleaueth in vs, that there is no man whiche can hope for any suche change. They which are seruants as touchyng ciuile seruitude, are in good hope, that they shall at one tyme or other, find the meanes to runne away from theyr Lords. But as for vs, whether shall we go? whersoener we shall be, we shall draw wyth vs the tyrant sin. Suppose that there were one which would redeme vs. Is it not of necessity, that he be free from the common Lord, whose seruantes we are, that is, from sinne? I thynke verily it is. For other wyse, whatsoener he should buye, should be bounde vnto sinne, vnto whome he, though he were now a redemer, is also a seruant. But there can none be found free from sinne, except only our Lord Iesus Christ. Wherfore vnto hym let hym go, whosoener wyll be deliuered from sinne. But a man will object. But the Apostle sayth, that we are now deliuered from sinne: for thus he writeth: But now we being deliuered from sinne, are made the seruantes of righteousness. Why then doth he nowe complayne, that he is sold vnder sinne? Here must we call to mynde that which we haue oftentimes said: that we are in deed deliuered by Christ, but yet not with a full deliuey, but only with a deliuey begonne: which then at the last shall be perfect, when our last enemy death shall be destroyed: and when (as Paul sayth) this mortall body, shall haue put on immortality: and this corruptible body shall be made incorruptible. But in the meane tyme we possesse not a full liberty, but a liberty hoped for. Now then sayng that we are still carnall, and sold vnder sinne, it is our partes continually with faithfull prayers to cry vnto the lord: & not without good aduise ment to approue those things which are pleasant vnto vs: but rather let vs haue in suspicio<sup>n</sup> all things y<sup>e</sup> are ours: for that fro the bondslaues of sin can nothing lightly be looked for, which is in very dede good. And whē we are oppressed with any calamity, let vs in no wise complain of God, as though he afflicteth vs without any our desert. For it is not possible, but that of them whiche liue vnder sinne should be many thinges amisse committed. The thinges which Paul before spake in this chap. that he knew not sinne, and was ignorant of lust, when he wanted the lawe, and as sone as it came, sinne exceedingly encreased in him, and so increased, that of it through the commaundement he was slayne, and such other like thinges, all these (I say) the Pelagians easely graunted mought be vnderstand of Paul, both when he was yet an infant, and also whē he was of full age so long as he endeoured not himselfe to an vpright life. But here they somewhat staggered, when

A comparison betweene the seruitude of sin, and ciuile seruitude.

Our deliuey is not yet full and perfect.

It is not possible but that we must needs commit many thinges amisse.

they saw that he sayd of himselfe, and that in the present temple, The lawe is spirituall: but I am carnall being sold vnder sinne. For here they felt that somewhat, but what do I say somewhat: yea rather, that very much falleth away from free will. They saw moreover, that he can not be iustified at his owne pleasure, which is giuen to be the seruant of sinne, and which after he is come vnto Christ, is sayd yet notwithstanding to be sold vnder sinne, so that he can not in all poyntes fulfill the lawe of God which is spirituall. Wherefore they went about to wrest these wordes of the Apostle to an other sense. For they sayd, that he called himselfe carnall, so that whilest he here liued he had not yet put on the spirituall fleshe, which we shall haue in the resurrection: but still caried it about with him, which in the meane tyme was obnoxious to many troubles. They added moreover, that therefore he sayth, he is sold vnder sinne, so that he was subiect vnto that death, which had through the sinne of Adam crept into the worlde. For to be sold vnder sinne, after them, is to be subiecte vnto death, and vnto other iniuries, and troubles of this life, which haue by the meanes of sinne crept into the worlde. And by this meanes, in Gods name, they thought, that they had excellently well interpreted Paul, although they make no mention at all of the vice of nature, of the corruption of mans disposition, and of the prauity of all the partes both of the soule and of the body, traduced through Adam into all his posterity. But Paul far otherwise therefore saith, that he was sold vnder sinne, so that he did those things which he would not: but those thinges which most of all he would, he did not: and so that when as to will was present with him, yet he found no ability to performe that which is good: and so that he fel into that infelicity which he lamented, so that he felt a lawe in his members, which sharply fought agaynst the vnderstanding of the minde. These sentences and causes being diligently considered, it is very manifest, that Paul bewayled not the death of the body, or the afflictions of this life, but his owne corruption, which he had (as wel as other men) drawen from Adam. Forasmuch as there are certain thinges which Ambrose noteth in this place, which are not to be contemned, it shall not be amisse here to write his iudgement. First he acknowledgeth, that these thinges are to be vnderstand of the lawe of Moses. Farther, that the lawe is therefore called spirituall, so that it calleth vs backe from sinne, and prohibiteth vs to geue vnto creatures that worshipping, which is due vnto God only. Moreover he testifieth, that we are fast bound with a double bond: first by reason of Originall sinne, which we haue drawen from Adam: secondly by reason of infinite other sinnes, which we our selues haue added. He confesseth also that we are so bounde vnto sinne that we can not vse our owne power. By which wordes we may gather, that our free will is not a little hindered. Farther he sayth, that by reason of all these thinges it commeth to passe, that the deuill minglet himselfe with all our thoughts: which he could not do but through sinne. Wherefore seeing that we can not discern our owne thoughtes from those, which are of the deuill offered vnto our mindes, it is necessary, that we oftentimes looke vpon the lawe of God. Here we ought to note, that Ambrose affirmeth that the deuill minglet himselfe with our thoughtes: which the Scholemen will not absolutely graunt.

For, that which I do, I know not, for what I woulde, that do I not: but what I would not, that do I. If the I do that which I would not, I consent to the lawe that it is good.

For that which I do, I know not. He now by reason he proueth, y he is sold vnder sinne, so that he doth not those thinges which he would himselfe, but is rather violently drawn to those thinges which he would not. But he y of necessity followeth the will of an other man, and doth not his owne will, vndoubtedly is in no better estate then a seruant bought for money. And this is to be vnder tyranny, to be led vnto those thinges, which thou thy selfe in minde and in will allowest not.

And

And when he sayth, that he doth not those thinges which he would, he meaneth that will, which is now by the benefite of Christ made comfortable vnto the law of God; which neither willet, nor not willet any thing, but so farre forth as it seeth it either allowed or disallowed of the lawe of God. Wherefore the Apostle rightly of this concludeth, that the lawe of God is good: because the minde of men regenerate being now after a sort amended so iudgeth of it. And whē as he saith, that he doth not those thinges which he would, and imputeth not that let vnto the lawe, it remaineth, that that is to be ascribed vnto our lust, and naturall vice, which of his owne nature is euill. For besides these thre, there is no other thing, wherunto that can be imputed. And he sayth that he doth not the thinges which he would, for that he is not led by his iudgemente as he is regenerate, but is resisting and against his will drawen backward of lust. Into this infelicity incurre we through sinne, so that we cease to be Lords of our owne motions and workes. But we were not so at the first framed. This place declareth how broken and diminished, our free will is left vnto vs. For we freely and of our owne accorde do those thinges, which in our owne iudgement we allow not. Neither are we the seruantes of sinne, only touching the inferior partes of the mynde, (as some hold) but all whole, whatsoever we are touching nature. For if there be any thing in vs which resisteth, that cometh of the spirite of Christ. Neither are we for any other cause sayd not to will, or not to do that which we do, but for that being instructed by the spirite of God, we determin & appoint with our selues that is not to be done which we do. Holy men are sometimes angrie more then they would be, and speake sometymes many thinges, which they would afterward were vnspoken. Dauid in his anger swaie, that he would kill Nabab the Carmelite, with all his whole famelye. But beinge admonished by the wordes of Abigail, he reuoked his dangerous othe. Our hart, sayth Ambrose (as it is cited of Augustine) is not in our owne power. We sometymes appoynt with our selues, that we will with an attentive hart pray vnto God: but for that many thinges offer themselves vnto our thoughtes, we straight wayfily wander from our talke with God. That which I do, I know not.]

That which he afterward sayth, he hateth, and would not, he now sayth, that he knoweth not. But soasmuch as knowledge is of two sortes, the one simple, which iudgeth or determineth nothing of the thing knowen: the other which either alloweth or disalloweth it, Paul speaketh of this latter knowledge: so that the sense is, that which I do, I know not, that is, I allow not with the full assent of my minde. Although, as Chrysostome admonisheth, out of these wordes may be picked an other sense. So great a perturbation cometh of the affects, that what we do we consider not. For the deceit of the entisements of lust is subtle & great. Subtle men having ben long time practisers of craftines, although we see what they do, yet oftentimes they sobeguile our eyes, & we perceave not what they do. Aristotle sayth that in every sinne is mingled some kinde of ignorance. Although betwene the philosophers & the stile of Paul there is some difference. For they thinke this powder to be grafted in the nature of the minde, reason and will, alwayes to desire and to approue that which is good: but the confusion becometh only in the grosser partes of the soule. But the apostle affirmeth, that all the partes of man both the inferior and the superior, doo by reason of originall sinne resist the spirite of God. But seeing that both from himselfe and from the Law he remoueth away the cause of sinne, it is manifest that it hath his place only in lust grafted in vs. And seeing he sayth, that he himselfe doth not the thinges which he would, and which are euill, much les vndoubtedly doth the Law them. For he by the Law vnderstande that these thinges are not to be done. Wherefore here hence haue we a commendation of the Lawe, and he doth not here (as heretikes saie), which forwardly peruerter the sayings of Paul blame the Law.

For that which I would, I doo not, but that which I hate that doo I.] Some thinke that this is to be referred only vnto the first motions. But seeing the scripture manifestly sayth, that the lust also saith: and that we all in many thinges of

These things are not to be drawe onely to the first motions

The iudgement of the spirite abideth not sound in faultes that are very hapnours.

send: I se no cause why we should into so narrow a streight contract this saying of the Apostle. For I doubt not, but that euen holy men also haue not only some times euill lusts, but also sometimes doo certayne thinges which ought not to be done. But they are streight way sojers, and they accuse themselves, and as much as lieth in them correct the sinne. And yet I would not that any mā should hereby thinke, that I affirme, that the iudgement of the spirite, and the purpose of the will renewed, abideth sound, whē the godly fall into most heynous wicked factes: as when Dauid committed adultery, and murder. For these sinnes are of that kind, whereof the Apostle sayth, They which doo suche thinges, shall haue no portion in the kingdome of God. Wherefore Augustine made an excellent distinction, namely, that a crime is one thing, and sinne an other thing. Wherefore seinge in this kinde of crime the right of regeneration is after a sort lost, it is not to be thought, that Paul thereof speaketh in this place.

Now then it is no more I that doo it, but the sinne that dwelleth in me. For I know that in me, that is, in my flesh dwelleth no good thing: for to will is present with me, but I finde no ability to performe that which is good.

It is not I that doo it. I He affirmeth, that he doth it not, for that he all whole doth it not. For in respect that he is regenerate, he abhorreth from that whiche he doth. The lust and vice whiche is by nature grafted and planted in vs, is it which wresteth from vs many thinges. But they which are wise by vnto Christ, that he may make that seruitude which they serue more milde: which thinge he not only doth, but also mercifully forgiueth the thinges that are committed as misse. Wherefore for these causes Paul denieth that he doth that thing, which he doth. And vndoubtedly it is to be ascribed vnto the singular gift of God, that we will not, and that those thinges displease vs, which we doo: and contrariwise that we wil, and wishe those thinges, which we doo not. For thys property is not in all men. For it is in them only which are now grafted into Christ, and regenerate in him. In dede Judas, Cain, and Esau were displeased with their sin, but yet not therefore, for that they allowed the Lawe of God: but for that they now began to sele their own discommodity, and calamity, and destruction. For they were not touched with any lone of the Law, and wil of God. So much difference is there betwene a godly man and an vngodly: The godly mā although he fall, yet he doth not from the hart violate the lawe of God, for he hath euer thys in hym, that continually he resisteth, and repugneth sinne. But the vngodly man neuer doth good from the hart, or eschebeth euill as the lawe commaundeth. For he alwayes hath a regard vnto gayne, commodity, fame, and such other like thinges, and not vnto the will of God. These declare that Paul speaketh those thinges, which are contayned in this chapter, of himselfe and of the sayntes, which are now in Christ regenerate: for he sayth that in mind he serued the Lawe of God: and to will was present with hym: but to performe that which is good he found no ability. And when he had cried out, unhappy man that I am, who shall deliuer me from this body subiect vnto death, He added a geuinge of thanks, for that he knew that by Christ he shoulde attayne to it. Thys can not they do which are strangers from Christ, and vngodly, and boyd of h holy ghost. They which deny thys, are thereunto by thys reason chiefly moued, for that they perswade themselves, that sinne can haue no place in holy men: when yet the scripture teacheth farre otherwise. For Paul vnto the Galatians speaking of the godly, writeth in a maner the selfe same thinges that he doth now in this place: walke ye (sayth he) in spirite, and performe not the desires of the flesh. He sayth not, haue ye not the desires of the flesh, but performe them not. And the fleshe (sayth he) suffeth agaynst the spirite, and the spirite agaynst the flesh: so that whatsoeuer thinges ye would, ye doo not. This is it which he here sayth, I doo not that which I would

Howe much displeaseth that are desperate. Difference betwene the godly & the vngodly.

Paul in this place speaketh of himselfe and of the regenerate.

Testimonies where by is proued that holy men haue sinne.

David sayth, Who vnderstandeth his finnes? Cleave me from my hidden finnes. Enter not into iudgment with thy seruant, for in thy sight shall no liuing creature be iustificed. And Clay sayth, that our righteousneses are like a clothe stayned with the naturall disease of a woman. And the Lord commaundeth vs to pray. Forgiue vs our trespasses If we say we haue no sinne (sayth John) we deceaue our selues and the truth is not in vs. James saith, We all offende in many thinges. The Fathers also affirme, that Paul in this place speaketh of himselfe. And amongst other, Augustine agaynst the two epistles of the Pelagians the 10. chapter. And the reasons that moue him thereunto are those, for that the Apostle sayth, It is no more I that do it, I delight in the Law of God. Vnbappy man that I am, who shall deliuer me fro the body of this death. There is no condemnation to those which are in Christ Iesus. Agayne. We also grone which haue receaued the first frutes of the spirite. Ambrose in his booke de Paradiso, is of the same iudgement: And to the same purpose is he cited of Augustine in his .6. booke agaynst Julianus: in his booke de philosophia, or de Sacramento: which booke is not at this day extant.

Augustine proueth that Paul speaketh of himselfe and of the regenerate. Ambrose of the same iudgement.

But sinne that dwelleth in me. This metaphore of dwelling, is very much vbled in y<sup>e</sup> holy scriptures: nether signifieth it vnto vs any thing els, but a true & mighty presencc. In this sence it is said, The word was made flesh: & dwelt amongst vs. And in the old testament is oftentimes red, that God dwelt amongst the children of Israell. And Paul to the Corinthians sayth, That we are the temple of God, & that the holy ghost dwelleth in vs. But here we must beware of the error of y<sup>e</sup> Manichees, which hold, that man consisteth of two natures, the one good, and the other euill: and y<sup>e</sup> they are both mingled together: but thorough Christ it is come to passe, that the euill is seperated from the good: and thrust out, to the people of darkenes. For they saw not, that y<sup>e</sup> euill was y<sup>e</sup> corruptio of nature, which nature other wise was good but they sayd, that it doth by it selfe exist, & hath a certayne substance: and that it is seperated from the good by thrustinge forth, and by spinge away, and not that it ceaseth to be. But the truth teacheth, that Christe healeth sinne and the effect of want, and so healeth the, y<sup>e</sup> they haue no moze any being. The Apostle in this place entreateth not of our comon euils: but of our chiefest euils whiche pertaine to the strife betwene the spirite and the flesh, and doo trouble and confound both whatsoeuer we haue inwardly or outwardlye. For whē we do any thing we not only not do so much as both we our selues desire, & also is required of y<sup>e</sup> law: but we haue also y<sup>e</sup> flesh by all maner of meanes raging fighting, and strining against the will of God. Neither do we y<sup>e</sup> good which we would, but that euill which we hate. If thou demaund what that good is, which we would, we can aunswer nothyng els, but y<sup>e</sup> it is y<sup>e</sup> which the law commaundeth vs. For it is the onely maistres of all that which is good. Hereby it is plaine, that we do not that which is commaunded in the law. Againe, the euill which we hate is nothing els, but that which by the law is prohibited. Wherefore we cannot deny, but that by our euill motions and wicked desires, the law of God is violated. Neither ought we to deny, but that they are finnes: which yet our aduersaries will not graunt. Moreover hereby we gather, that in all the things which we do, we haue nede of forgiuenes: and that our workes are not of so great waight: that for them we should be made acceptable vnto God, and merite the eternall kyngdome. In this place are vbled the names of the flesh and of the members: and on y<sup>e</sup> other side of the minde and of the inward man. Which are not to be distinguished touching the partes of the body and of the mynde. But on the one side is signified the whole man, as he is not regenerate, neither hath yet perfectly and vniuersally put of the prauity of nature. On the other side also is vnderstande the whole man as he is now regenerate, and hath retained at the least some parte of spirituall regeneration. They are farre deceived which thinke, that although we beleue not in Christ, yet the minde and will in vs is wholly perfect in nature. For they remember not what Paul writeth to the Corinthians: The naturall man vnderstandeth not the thynges which are of the spirite of God. For these wordes plain ly declare, that our vnderstanding hath in it much darkenes & corruption, whē as we are so vnapt to the vnderstanding of thinges spiritual. And that thou shouldst not thinke that these thinges pertaine vnto them only that are not regenerate, & which are yet straungers from Chyist, Augustine declareth, that they belong also vnto the beleuers, both by those thinges which go before, and by those also which folloiw. For, that Paul there entreateth of them that are baptised, is by that proued, which he before wrote. Are ye baptised in the name of Paul? It is proued also by that which followeth after: Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that his spirite dwelleth in you? And if they are pronounced to be such, which are of the vnperfecter sort amongst the beleuers, what is to affirmed of those which are utterly straungers from Chyist? Doubtles seying they haue receiued no part of iustificati on, there can dwell in them no god. Let them go now which bable, that before re generation may be done of vs some good woorkes, which may please God, & wher by we may (as they speake) merite of congruity. Let them also consider how wise ly they are wont to say, that if men do that which lieth in them, God will graunt vnto them his grace. For, if they do that which lieth in them, they shal do nothing but that which is euill. For, as Paul sayth, there dwelleth in them no good. Wher fore, seying they are moued only by the ground of their corrupt nature, doubtles they commit sinne. And that the Apostle speaketh not of the nature of y outward flesh, and of the visibie body, it is hereby proued, for that when as in the epistle to the Corinthians he admonisheth them to eschew fornications, he sayth, that our bo dies are the temples of the holy ghost. Wherfore it should be false, that in our flesh dwelleth no good, if flesh should be taken in that signification. Wherfore, in thys place as we haue sayd, flesh is taken for the whole nature infected wyth sinne. Of this Paul pronounceth that he knoweth, that in it dwelleth no good: Neither wan teth this an emphasys, that he sayth that he assuredly knoweth. For he saw, that o thers, and in a maner the most part of me felt not this. And I would to God y we once thozough felt it.

For to will is present with me: but I finde no abilitie to do that whiche is good.] Neither doubtles had he this power to wil, but so farre forth as he had it of the spirite which renueth vs. This he proueth in the epistle to the Philippians. For when he had sayd: Wyth feare and trembling worke your saluation, lest any man should thynke, that he can perfoyme thys by his owne strengthes, straight way he addeth: For it is God which worketh in you both to wyll, and to performe: And that no man should thinke, that he may thzough his holines deserue this, he addeth, accor dyng to his good wyll.

To will is present with me.] Some thynke that by the nature of this woorde Adiacere, which is englisshed, to be present, is signified the weakenes of our wyll. But I do not thynke that Paul had hereunto a regard. For, that euill also of lust, which is mighty & of force in vs, is a little afterward sayd to be preset with vs by the same word. It is true in dede that these men say, that the vpzight purpose in vs, beyng neuer so much regenerate, is yet weak. Which thynge although it can not sufficiently be proued by thys woorde Adiacet, yet is it proued by that which followeth. But to do good I finde no ability. For that must nedes be a weak wyll, which can not burst forth into acte. For this verbe Adiacere signifieth to be on euery side at hande, to be readye, and to picke forthwarde. We are in the myddest, and eche part is at hand. On the one side we are vrged wyth the picke of the spirite, to wyll good thinges: on the other side euill is at hand, wherby the good wyll is letted. Augustine in his booke de natura & gratia agaynst the Pelagiāns confuteth theyr error by thys place. For they sayd, as it is there had in the 50. and 51. chapters: If to sinne be in vs, there must nedes be in our nature a possibility not to sinne. And if it be in vs to see or to hear, there must nedes be in our nature a possibilitie of not seying or not hearyng. And this possibility they will haue to be so fixed vnto nature, that it can not be separated from it. Thys (sayth Augustine, mought haue after a sort some lykelihoode of truth, if our nature were perfect as it was in stituted of God. But forasmuch as it is now maymed and weake in vs, we can not be said to haue naturally any possibility not to sinne. For he which is whole in hys legs and feete, as in hym it lyeth to walke vpryghte, so in hym is a possibilitye not to halte. But if thou suppose one that is now lame, in hys nature is no possibility of walking vpryght. Farther Augustine reponeth this sentence, although it be vnderstand of nature being perfect. For neyther was the possibility not to sinne geuen vnto vs at the beginning inseparable from nature. For although it were in the first man, yet was it separable both from hym and from hys posterity through hys fall: euen as both we thereof haue in very dede experience, and Paul also here bewayleth the losse therof. For he sayth: That to wyll in dede was present wyth hym: but how to do good he found no ability. Where then is that possibility not to sinne? Why doth not the Apostle vse it: Merely of it was entreated in this place. But Paul right well saith, y he found no ability how to do good. Augustine de nuptiis & concupiscentia, in his 1. booke the 29. and 30. chap. excellently well declareth this place. That which is good (saith he) is not performed, vnlesse wycked desires be absent: which thyng is not had in this lyfe, neyther is this fulfilled which is written: Thou shalt not lust. And yet is not this precept vnprofitably set forth vnto vs to be beleued. For by it we vnderstand, that we ought to seeke a medicine, when as we see, that we are dangerously sicke of this disease. It is commaunded also, that we mought know, wherunto we ought in this mortall lyfe by profiting to endenour our selues, and wherunto we shall attayne in that most blessed immortalitye. For vnles it should one day be performed, it shoulde not haue bene commaunded at all. Wherfore godly men as they performe not that which is good, forasmuch as they wanne not euill desires: so also performe they not that which is euill: for that although they oftentimes fall, yet the good and holy desires cease not in them: wherby they resist sinne, & are called agayne into the ryght way.

In our corrupt nature we haue not the power not to sinne.

The power not to sinne was separable from man.

Good is not perfectly done vnlesse wicked desires be absent.

We should not be commaunded not to lust, vnles it might at the leaste way be performed in an other life.

For I do not the good thing which I would: but the euill which I would not, that do I. Now if I do that which I would not, it is no more I that do it, but sinne that dwelleth in me. I finde then a lawe vnto me, when I woulde do good, for that euill is present with me. For I delight in the lawe of God concerning the inner man. But I fele an other lawe in my members rebelling agaynst the lawe of my mynde, and leading me captiue vnto the lawe of sinne, which is in my members. O wretched man that I am, who shall deliuer me from the body of this death? I thanke God thorough Iesus Christ our Lord. Then I my selfe in my mynde serue the lawe of God, but in my fleshe the lawe of sinne.

For I do not the good thing which I would, but the euill which I would not, that do I. He before spake the selfe same sentence, nowe only he addeth these two wordes, good and euill, which before he added not: although the latten interpreter hath added them of his owne head.

Now if I do that which I woulde not, it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. Here endeth he the reason, whereby he proued, that he was sold vnder sinne: for that he did not his owne will, but the will of it. And here in dede he mought haue made an end. Howbeit it seemed good vnto the holy ghost, to venge the thing more vehemently. And therefore Paul tarieth the longer in this matter, and more plainly openeth what he had had experience of in this strife. He speaketh with great affection, so that he containeth not himselfe from crying out, wherby to bewaile y misery of our conditio. And he sheweth y there is but one only way of liberty, and y same is through Christ. Wherfore for it he geueth thanks. This is the skope of the Apostle in this whole disputation, to leade vs from the lawe (by which we coulde not be set at liberty) vnto Christ: and by that meanes to proue that which he at the beginning entended, namely, that we can not by the lawe be iustified. The thinges which are so often repeted, we ought to thinke ted, are both

to be very necessary, and also not very well knowne vnto vs. Farther these things are not repeted without some addition, whereby are not a little made plaine those things which were spoken. Here the Apostle intended to declare two things: first that he would that which is good: and thereof he reasoneth, that he felt in his minde a delectation in the lawe. But those things wherein we delight we desire to be brought to passe. The second is, that he declareth that he is plucked away and letted, so that he can not fulfill his owne will. And this he hereby proueth, for that he doth those things from which he abhorred. But these things are to be vnderstand in a diuers respect as they terme it. For as he was regenerate, he abhorred from things euill, and desired better: but as hee was not regenerate, he was drawen vnto those things whiche hee would not, and fell into worse and worse. The effecte of his exclamation is therefore expressed in this strife, to geue vs to vnderstand, that these things are not entreated of, lightlye or coldly, but with great feeling and with certayne experience. Now that I haue briesely declared the exposition of this place. I will come to the knitting together of the wordes of the Apostle, and examine euery perticuler part of them.

I find a law vnto me when I would do good, for that euill is present with me. ] This is doubtles an obscure sentence, and may haue diuers senses. For if we take the lawe, (which we see is here put infinitely and without contraction) for the vice and corruption of nature, then may we thus interpret it, that it is a let vnto vs when he would do good. Of which saying is rendred a reason, for that euill is present with me. As if he should haue sayd, this is the cause why I am letted from doing good. But if this word lawe, be taken in good part, and do signifie the commaundementes of God, then must we of necessity adde a verbe whych signifieth not a let, but an exhortation and stirring vp. And so may be gathered this sense, when I would do good I finde the lawe of God, allowing, approuing, exhorting and instigating me. But if thou demaunde, why then do I not good? I answer: for that euill is present with me, therefore am I letted and called backe from the good purpose of my minde. Wherefore the obscurenes commeth two manner of wayes. Firste the lawe is put infinitely, whiche maye be drawen ether vnto luste or vnto the commaundement of God. Secondly there is no word added, whereby is signified, ether let, or contrariwise impulsion or exhortation. Ambrose thinketh, that here is signified the lawe of God, which he sayth geueth a consent. For, that can not be vnderstand of our consent, whereby we in minde serue the lawe of God. For, this we owe, not vnto the benefite of the law, but to the spirite of Christ only, that the will of God shoulde be pleasant to our mynde. But after that by his helpe we come once to this poynt to will things good and by righte then if we loke vpon the lawe, we shall finde that it (as Ambrose sayth) geueth a consent vnto vs. Chrysostome confesseth that it is a hard place: howbeit he thinketh that by it is signified the lawe of God: and sayth that it prayseth and approueth all the good and iust things which we would do: but the euill which is present with vs is a let that we can not performe those things. And hereby is manifest the infirmity of the lawe, which can in dede approue things right, & commendeth the will of hauing them: but can not remoue away the impedimentes and lettes, neither can bying to passe that we should not sinne, or not be condemned. But I, if I may herein declare my minde, do by the lawe vnderstand that conditio whereunto we ought to obey: and this I iudge to be the minde of the Apostle: I finde a condition and a decree layd vpon me. namely, by originall sinne, and naturall lust, that when I would do good, euill euer is present with me. This is the punishment of the lawe whereinto we al incurre by the transgression of our first parentes. Ambrose semeth to demaunde, where sinne or euill is present with vs. And he aunswereth, in the fleshe: it lieth and watcheth as it were before the doores, and at the gate: so that the will after y it hath decreed any thing that is good, if it will come forth and performe the same, findeth a let euen at the very gate. A pleasant inuentio doubtles, and such which semeth to expresse that which which shall afterward be spoken of. That we in mynde serue the lawe of God, but in fleshe the lawe of sinne. If thou agayne demaunde, how it cometh to passe that y<sup>e</sup> euill is present with vs in the flesh & not also in the mynde, he answereth, that it thereof cometh, for that y<sup>e</sup> flesh only is by traduction deriued from Adam. For therefore sinne passeth through the fleshe, and after a sort dwelleth in it, in manner as in his house. Which other wise should rather be placed in the soule, as which should rather sinne then the flesh, if it should be by traduction. But seeing it is not by traduction, thereof it cometh, that sinne dwelleth not in it, but in the flesh. What the soule is not by traduction, let vs for this tyme graunte: althoughe Augustine be somewhat in doubt touching that matter. Yet do I not see, why we should deny but that sinne is also in the mynde. I graunt in dede, that the first entrance of corruption is through the flesh, and that originall sinne is traduced from the parentes through the seede and the body: but it stayeth not there. For from thence it strayeth throughout all the partes of the soule and of the body. Howbeit this word Adiacere, which is englisht to be present, I vnderstand no other wise then I before interpreted it: namely, to be at hand, to be redy, to byge, and to pricke forward.

presente not only in the flesh but also in the soule.

I delight in the lawe of God concerning the inward man.] Two things he put forth, that his will was to do good, but euill was present with him, where by his entent was made frustrate. Now he diligently explicateth ech part. If we should follow Chrysostomes mynde, namely, that when we appointe to do any thing rightly, we finde the lawe allowing and approuing our purpose, then should not this sentence be amisse, that we on the other side, delight in the vnderstanding of the lawe, as it seemeth to delight in our purpose, and to consent vnto it. But this is now to be of vs considered, with how great warines, Paul now encreaseeth and amplifieth that, which he before had simply spoken. He before sayde, that he willed that whiche is good, that he consented vnto the lawe that it is good: now he after a sort goeth by one steppe higher, which pertayneth only vnto the Godly. For they will towardes the lawe is not a colde will, but pleasant, seruent, and vehement. With great endeuor they contend, that they may in dede perfoyme that which in minde they desire. But the vngodly although by a naturall light which is not vtterly extinguisht in them, they haue some knowledge of iustice, and vertue, yet are they not kindled with a true loue of things good. Wherefore y<sup>e</sup> Apostle writeth not these things vnto the, but vnto y<sup>e</sup> godly, which euery moment strue against y<sup>e</sup> lust which is grafted in the by nature. But how great a pleasure y<sup>e</sup> good me take of y<sup>e</sup> law of God, many places of y<sup>e</sup> scripture testifie. Dauid in his 119. psalme sayth, Blessed are they which walk in the Law of the Lord, and which seke the testimonies thereof. And in his 1. psalme. Blessed are they which meditate in his Law day and night. And in an other place, The Law of God (sayth he) is more precious then gold and precious stones, and more sweete then bony and the bony combe. And other infinite such like testimonies. But there is very much difference betwene the godly and men straungers from Christ. For the wise men amongst the Ethnikes did put the greatest part of they<sup>r</sup> felicity herein, that they might alwayes remember the notable actes by them done. But they greatly reioysed not of the knowledge of the true and perfect righteousness, because they perfectly knew it not. But the sapntes contrariwise alwayes cast they<sup>r</sup> eyes vpon the Law of God, and when in it they se before they<sup>r</sup> eyes drawn out the portraiture of a iust man, and the perfect image of God, whereunto we are created, they can not but wonderfully reioyce. But afterward when they turne aside they<sup>r</sup> eyes to their works they are exceedingly soyy, for that they se them so much to fayle of the example set before them. So paynters, when they se an image excellently set forth, they take therein great pleasure. But when as hauing enterprised to make such an other, they se that they can not attayne to that liuelines and excellency, they begin to be soyy and to be angry. There is noted also in Decockes the selfe same kinde of affection: for when they haue erected by they<sup>r</sup> sethers, they delighting in the pleasant variety of the colours, some much to reioyce. But agayne, when they behold they: deformed and blacke fete, streight way they: courage is delected, and they let downe they: fethers. So the godly delight in the Lawe of God, and are inflamed with great loue to his commaundementes: but contrariwise they lament and are sozry for the filthines, which they find to be in al their woorks.

Concerning the inward man. ] Sithen Paul calleth the regenerate part of man by this name, it can not be doubted, but that he speaketh of the whole man: For man consisteth not only of the body and of flesh, but also of the soule, and of that part, whiche they commonly call, rationally. And this whole man is called both inward & outward. He is called the Inward man, in that he is moued by the spirite, which woorketh in our inward partes, and of stony hartes maketh fleshy hartes. But he is called outward in that he is taken with the delights of this world, with riches, honours, goodly shewes, and such like thinges. For all these are outward thinges. So the Apostle hath now proued the first part which he put forth, namely, That he would doo good, and that he delighted in the law of God concerning the inward man. Now he goeth to the other part: to declare, that he is agaynst his will drawen to other thinges.

I fele an other Law in my members, resisting the Law of my mind, and leding me captiue into the Law of sinne, vvhich is in my members. ] This Law which he describeth is the force of sinne, and of our naturall corruption. He calleth it the Law of members, for that befoze he called this whole euill the body of sinne, but a body hath members. Farther members in this place signifieth (as I haue befoze admonished) all the powers of the minde, and all the partes of the body now contaminate with sinne. The Apostles minde was to declare, that this disease drawen from our birth stayeth not only in some one part of vs, but perferth thorough out the whole man, and thoroughout all his partes. Here we haue sondry names of Lawes: for here is mencioned, The Lawe of God, The Lawe of the minde, The Lawe of sinne, The Lawe of the members. And this hereof cometh, for that the Law is largely taken for all that whiche gouerneth, & moderateth our actions. And because our actions procede not all from one ground, thereof it cometh, that there are diuers names of Lawes. Although the Law of the mind, and the Law of God, is one and the same. It is called the Law of God, because by it is expressed the will of God. And it is called the Law of the mind, for that it raigneth chiefly inwardly, and is most known in the minde. The Law of sinne also, and the Law of the members is one and the same. It is called the Law of sinne, because such lust is of it selfe sinne, and of it selfe bringeth forth other sinnes: and it is called the Lawe of the members, for that it vseth all our partes, strents and faculties for instruments. Chrysostome warily admonisheth, that sinne is not for any his owne dignity adozned with the name of Lawe: for that cometh thorough our default, for that we obey sinne as a Lawe. For so Christ called Hammon, Lord, and Paul called the bely, God.

Rebeling, αυτιστασιασμος. ] There is a greate conflict betwene these two Lawes, for the Law which is in my members, laboureth to lede me away captiue, and to make me a bondslauie vnto the Law of sinne. But if the Law of God and the Law of the members, be one and the same, how is the one sayd to lede away a man captiue vnto the other? This is not without greate consideration sayd: for so long as lust grafted in vs, which is sinne, resisteth the Law of God, by which Law the knowledge of the minde is instructed, it impelleth vs to many kindes of sinnes. Those are commonly called actual sinnes, whereunto our lust and corrupt disposition incline vs. But this maketh vs subiect vnto the law of sinne, that is, vnto death: for death (as we haue befoze hard) followeth sinne, as the fruite and stipend thereof. And although that Law be placed in the members, yet ought no man therefore to surmise, y the nature of the body or of the flesh is euill. Sinne passeth in dede through the flesh, but thereof it followeth not that the constitution of the flesh is euill and condemned: If a man shoulde

In this place Chrysostome reasoneth agaynst the Maniches. For they sayd that both the Law of God & our flesh are euill, for that ether of them proceeded from a certayne euill God. Here sayth Chrysostome, If the flesh be euill, as ye say, then must ye nedes confesse, that the Law is good, as that which resisteth the flesh. Wherefore which way so euer ye turne your selves (sayth he) ye are confuted: which thing cometh not to passe in doctrines of the Church. For it bouldeth, that both the Law of God, and also the nature of our flesh are good: but sinne only is euill.

An argument against the Mani-ches.

O vvretch that I am, who shall deliuer me from the body of this death? ¶ When he felt himselfe in a maner oppressed in the conflict of these two Lawes, he crieth out, and confesseth himselfe to be miserable: which he would not haue done, vnales he had felt himselfe oppressed with some great & greuous euill. But there can nothing be moze greuous then misery and death. These two Paul iopneth together, and complayneth, that he is agaynst hys will dyauien vnto them. By the body of death he vnderstandeth our vitiate and corrupt nature: the whole man (I say) as it is brought forth of the parentes. From this body he desireth to be deliuered. Vnto the Phillippians he sayth, That death, if it should happen vnto him, should be vnto him greete gayne, not that he desired to put of his life: but for that he wished to put on a better life. And this exposition is moze agreable with the wordes of the Apostle, then that which Ambrose hath, that by the body of sin are to be vnderstand all maner of sinnes. And this exclamatiō cometh neither from an vngodly man nor from one liuing in security: but from one conuerted vnto Christ, and struing agaynst sinne and detestling it, which he feleth to be still strong in him. Here is set forth vnto vs an example of true repentance, which life of a Christian ought neuer to waite. Paul in this place wisheth not for death, but to be deliuered from prauity and corruption. And he useth an interrogatiō, to signifie that he can not be deliuered ether by the Law, or by a good conscience, or by the shew of good workes: but deliuerie is to be hoped for at Christs handes onely.

That
whiche man hath misfepentance.

He wisheth

I geue thanks vnto God through Iesus Christ our Lord. ¶ He useth also an other exclamatiō, for that he felt that thing to be by faith & grace graunted vnto him, which by any other meanes he could not attaine vnto. These affectes are contrary, and succeeding the one the other in the mindes of the Saintes: that first they are exceedingly soye for their misery, and after that they exceedingly reioyce for the redemption which they haue obteyned through Christ. And so vehement are these motions, that Paul by the figure Apostrophe, leaueth the sentence cut of and vnperfect. For, that is left vnspoken, which should finish by the sentence. For neither doth Paul aunswer to the first interrogation, neither also doth he here expresse, wherfore he geueth thanks. And if a man rightly weigh these two affectes, he shall finde that they are in most due order placed the one to the other. For in the first exclamatiō being oppressed of sinne he implozeth aide. But in the second, when as he felt that he was now heard, holpen, and deliuered, he geueth thanks: and that through Iesus Christ our Lord: not through Mary, or through John Baptist, or through his owne workes, or through any such like kinde of thing: but through him only, which is alone and the only mediatur betwene God and man.

He sayth that he is a bond seruaunt, which is to be vnder Tirans, and sayth not that he freely assenteth thereunto. But straight way in the next chapter he will declare, how it was no hurt vnto hym through Christ, that in flesh he serued the lawe of sinne: for that there is now no condemnaof the libertines, and faries of our tymes: which by these wordes of the Apostle go about to excuse their most haynous wicked factes. For they say, that they in fleshe only committe fornication, and drunkennes, and lyue vncleane: but in mynde and in spirite are pure, and do serue the lawe of God. Of which matter, Augustine excellently well entreateth in his 45. Sermon, De tempore. The lyfe of man (saith he) is a warfare: but one day it shall come to passe, that we shall attayne vnto a triumph. Wherefore the holy scripture vseth the termes both of fighting & of triumphing. Here is set forth the description of the battaille when as mention is made of the lawe that rebelleth, and leadeth away captiue: and he which is against his will led away captiue implozeth ayde. The ioy of the triumph is set forth vnto vs in the epistle vnto Corinthians, where it is sayd, death is swallowed up in victory, death where is thy victory? death where is thy sting? These doubtles are the wordes of them that deride their enemyes, and which, when they haue gotten the victory, triumph. Wherefore there is no cause, why they should ascribe vnto themselves these wordes which fight not, which resist not, which strue not: but fall now headlong into all manner of sinnes, boasting y they haue in the meane tyme a cleane harte. Vnto this battaille cometh also lust, & labourerth to wrest somewhat from thee. But it is thy part not to geue place, but to resist, to fight, and to continue still in the battaille: wishe yet in the meane tyme with Paul, to want this enemy. Because in this battaille although thou wholly yeld not thy selfe yet alwayes will thou or nill thou, thou shalt be somewhat hurt. It were a greate deale better for thee to performe that which the lawe commaundeth, thou shalt not lust, so that there mought be in vs no euill desire. But this is a full righteousness: which forasmuch as it can not here be had perfect, this only remayneth, that we follow not after lustes. They will not follow thee if thou desire thinges iust and sound: why then shouldest thou consent to follow after them. This is doubtles a thing vnseemely, seing they are thine enemyes. For no man that is wise will follow his enemy. When Paul saith In mynde I serue the lawe of God, but in fleshe the lawe of sinne, shall we thinke that he or such like as he was, would for euery light prouokement to wrath, haue hurt or killed his neighbour: or for euery impulsio[n] of the flesh, haue committed adultery or fornication: No doubtles. But he fought, he stroue, he suffered not sinne to beare rule and to raigne in his mortal body. And Paul thus wrote of himselfe, that the godly mought by this place receaue some consolation. For otherwise when they should sometymes feeble themselves moued and tickled with such desires, they mought thinke that they are vnacceptable vnto God and hated of hym, and that they pertayne not vnto Christ. But when they see that Paul writeth these thinges both of himself, and of other godly men, and of the regenerate, they beginne to plucke vp their spirites, and to haue a good hope of their saluation. Wherefore they which thinke, that Paul in this place transferred vpon himselfe the person of an other man, let them consider of how great a consolatio[n] they deprive the church of Christ. Wherefore let these wordes so be taken, that they both bring consolatio[n] vnto them that strue, and also nothing helpe the outrageous opinions of the libertines.

Forasmuch as the Apostle hath in this chapter spoken many thinges of the infirmity of our strengthes, and of that seruitude whereby we are obnoxious vnto sinne, it shalbe good somewhat in this place to entreat of the liberty of our wil: that we may after ward teach, how the prouidence and predestination of God taketh not away will from men: which neither also is taken away by his power whereby he doth whatsoever thinges he will, nor by the appoynted order, or connerion of causes of thinges. Of which matters (as I hope) we shall more largely entreate in the 9. and 11. chapters. Wherefore at this present we will only enquire, how much our naturall prauity which came by originall sinne hath left vnto vs offre wil: especially, seing that whatsoever we do rightly, the same is said to be attributed wholly vnto the grace of God. And although this word, fre wil, be not red in the holy scriptures, yet ought it not to seeme a thing ether sayned or inuented ne nte d. The Grecians call it Αὐτεξουσίαν, which is, of his owne power, or of his owne right. Which self thing the Latines signify when they say, Arbitrij libertatem, that is, the liberty of the choyce or will. For that is free, which followeth not the will of an other, but his owne will. But the choice seemeth herein to consist, that we as it seemeth good vnto vs, follow those things which are decreed by reason. But then is the will free, when according to his lust, it embraceth those things which are appoyued of the vnderstanding part of the minde. Wherefore the nature of free choise, although it most of all consisteth in the will, yet hath it his groundes in reason. But they which will rightly vse this faculty or power, must chiefly see vnto, that there be in reason no error. And that commonly commeth two maner of wayes. For other it is hidden from vs what is iust and vniust in the doynge of thinges: or if we see that, yet in iudgyng of the reasons whiche are accustomed to be alledged on other side, we faile. For allwayes in a maner our lust adioineth it selfe vnto the weaker argument. By whiche meanes it oftentimes cometh to passe, that the stronger and better reason is neglected and forsaken: which thing in disputations, we see oftentimes happeneth. For they whiche will defend the weaker part, are accustomed with all maner of ornamentes & colours to پوش it and to set it forth, that the hearers beyng allured by eloquence and counterfeate shewe, should not please the strength and waighte of the reason. Farther this is to be knowen, that men commonly deliberate not touching all maner of thinges: but onely touching those whiche are called πραξιμα, that is, which are to be done of vs. Neither do all y thinges which we either follow or refuse, neede deliberatio. For there are certayne good things so manifest & sure, that it is inoughe y they be once nanted. For streight way they are ether chosen or refused. Such as are felicity, infelicity, life, death, and such other like. But there are other thinges more obscure, or meane, about which men are wont to deliberate. That God is to be worshiped all men without any doubting cōfesse. But in what maner and with what rites or ceremonies he is to be worshiped, there is greate doubt put. That it is profitable for men to inhabite in cities, and to maynteyne felowship together, all men knowe. But with what Lawes they are to be gouerned, or what kinde of common welth is best to be vled, therof oftentimes great doubtis arise. In these and suche like thinges is free will occupied, and thus we may define it. Free will is a faculty or power, whereby we ether take or reiect, as it seemeth good vnto vs, thinges iudged by reason. But whether there be any such power or no in man, or how it is in him, can not with one answer be declared. First, it is necessary, that we distinguish the state and condition of man. Now, in man there are found at the least fower differences of states. For the state of Adam when he was at the beginning created was far diuers from that state after his fall: such as is also now y state of all his posterity. Farther they which are regenerate in Christ are in a far better state, then they which liue wout Christ. But we shalbe in most happy & most free state, when we shall haue put of this mortal body. Wherefore we will vnto y questiō make answer according to these fower conditions or states. That Adam when he was first created had free will all men beleue. Whiche thinge before I shall declare I will note three distinct kindes of workes whiche are in vs. Some workes pertaine to nature, as to be sicke, to be in health, to be nozished, to concoct meate, and such other like, where in although the first man was farre more happier, then we are at this present, yet was he subiect vnto some necessity: for it behoued him both to eate, and to be nozished, and to receaue meate. Howbeit he was free from all calamities, which mought bring death. There are other workes, which after a ciuill or morall consideration are ether iust or vniuste. The third kinde is of those workes, whiche please God, and are acceptable vnto him. As touching all these, man at the beginning was made free. For he was created vnto y image of God, vnto whō is nothing more agreeable the true and perfect liberty. And of him it is thus writte God crowned him with glory and honour. Againc. When he was in honor he vnderstode is not. But what honoz can there be, where liberty wanteth: lastly God made subiect vnto him all thinges which he had created: whiche doubles he could not truly and after a right maner haue gouerned, if he had ben created a seruant to affectes and lusts. But touching that state in what sort it was, sozasmuch as therein scripture sayeth vs, there can nothing certainly be affirmed. Augustine in his booke de Correptione & Gratia, The helpe (sayth he) *of the grace of God was geuen vnto Adam. Such an helpe it was, which he mought both forsake when he would, & wherein he mought abide if he would: not wherby, to wil. And as touching this, Augustine is not afeard to preferre that grace which we now haue obtained thorough Christ, before that grace which Adam had in paradise. For now by the grace of Christ we doo not onely abide if we will: but also as Paul sayth, by it we haue both to will and to perfoyme. For the harte of the beleuers is changed, so that of not willing, they are made made willing. But this, To will, was in the choise of the first man, nether was it the grace of God which wrought this in him. But why God gaue vnto Adam free will, when he was first created, Augustine bringeth this reason in his 2. booke de libero Arbitrio, for that God had decreed to declare towards him, both his goodnes and his iustice. And would haue declared towards him his goodnes, if he had done well: which vndoubtedly he could not haue done but les he had ben free. But if he should behaue himselfe filthily and haue done ill, God would vse towards him the severity of his iustice. But he when he was free fell miserably. And euen as Christ describeth the man that went downe from Jerusalem to Jericho to haue fallen vpon thienes, & to haue ben soze wounded of them: so he hauing not only his gariment taken away, lost al his ornaments, but also hauing receaued many woundes, was left for dead and past all hope. Wherefoze we say, that as touching this second state, when we are strangers from Christ, there is but a litle liberty remayning vnto vs. For we are both subiect vnto the necessities of nature, and also will we or nill we, are afflicted wth diseases, and last of all are killed by death, howbeit there is some liberty left as touching wothes ciuill and morall. For they are both subiect vnto our naturall knowledge, and also passe not the strengths of our will, although in them also men fele a greate difficulty: for that ontragious lusts resist morall honesty. Entisements and pleasures alwayes beate our senses: and these are furthered by euil counselors: Sathan also continually vrgeth, and impelleth vs: for he enueying the commodities of man, and perceauing that by such wothes is still retayned ciuill discipline, coueteth by all maner of meanes to ouerthrowe them. But the mans power and strengths may do much in these ciuill thinges, at the least as touching iudgements many good Lawes set forth by Licurgus, Solon, Numa and by others manifestly declare. And Paule to the Romanes: doost thou thinke (sayth he) o man, that thou shalt escape the iudgement of God, when as thou doost the self same thinges which thou iudgest? Moreover in these thinges there are two poynts which are not to be ouerhiped. First that God vseth the wil of men to those ends, whiche he himself hath appoynted. The second is, which dependeth also of the first, that those euentes followe not, which they, which apply themselves vnto these ciuill wothes, appoynte. For oftentimes farre other thinges happen, then they could euer haue thought vpon. And therefore the Ethnikes were oftentimes very soze troubled. Pompey, Cato, and Cicero thought to themselves, they had take very good counsels. But when they tooke not place, there remained nothinge to the authozs of them, but desperation. For they being frustrated of theyr counsels, ascribed al thinges to fortune and chaunce. But that the successe of thinges, & euent of counsels is in the hand of God, Jeremy declareth, saying, The waye of man is not in his owne power: nether lieth it in man to direct his owne steppes: whiche place the Hebrewes expound of Nabucadnezzar: who they say wet forth of his house not to make warre agaynst the Jewes, but agaynst the Ammonites, as it is written in the 21. chapter of Ezechiel. But when he came into a waye that had two turninges, he began to deliberate, and to aske counsell of the inwardes of beastes* beastes, of idols, and of lottes, by the brightnes of a sword, and beinge by that meanes admonished, turned to invade Jewry, and leauing the Ammonities beset, geo Jerusalem. These two thinges are not hidden from y godly: both that God is the autho: of all counsels, and also geueth vnto matters whatsoeuer successe pleaseth him. And therefore they appoynt nothing with theselues, but with thys condition added, If God so will: which thing James warned vs that we should doo. And Paul in his epistle to the Romanes saith: that he desired to haue a prosperous iorney vnto them, but yet by the will of God. Wherefore if thinges happen otherwise then they hoped for, they comfort themselves, for that they know that God they: most louing father prouideth better both for his kingdome and for they: saluation, then they coulde haue prouided for themselves. And they haue alwayes that in they: mouth which David sang, Vnto the Lord builde the house, they labour in vaine which build it. Wherefore this is they: care, to frame they: counsels to the word of God. And the euent they committe vnto God. And so on euery parte they worke surely. But in those workes which are acceptable and greatefull vnto God, men being strangers from God haue no libertie at all. Hereof it came, that Augustine sayth in his Enchiridion, That man vsing free will ill, lost both himselfe and free will. For, when in the battaile sinne got the vpper hande, it broughte man into bondage. I knowe there are some, whiche thus interpretate thys sentence of Augustine: that Adam lost free will, as touchinge grace and gloire, wherewith he was adozned, but not as touchynge nature. Wherefore here I will not muche strue, to denye that reason and will whiche pertaine vnto nature were left vnto man after the fall. But that the same nature is mapned & wounded, nether can they themselves vndoubtedly deny. For thys thinge also affirmeth the Paster of the Sentences in hys .2. booke and xxx. distinction. For he sayth, that man nowe after hys fall is in that state that he maye sinne: and that he is in such condition that he can not, not sinne. And although Augustine and others should not so affirme, yet may most firme reason teach it. For holy workes depend of two groundes, namely, of knowledge and of appetite. Of knowledge Paul sayth, The naturall man understandeth not the thinges which are of the spirite of God: yea neither vndoubtedly can he. For vnto him they are foolishenes. But now if we know not what is to be done, and what pleaseth God, by what meanes then can we performe it in ad? And in what sort our appetite and cogitations are towarde those holy workes, it is manifest by the first chapter of Genesis. My spirite (sayth God) shall not strue in man for euer, for he is flesh. And straight way: God saw that the malice of men was great: and all the imaginations of the thoughtes of his hart were only vnto euill continually. And in the 8. chapter: The imagination of mans hart is euilleuen from his infancy. And these things speaketh God himselfe. And we ought touching our strengthes to beleue none more then our maker, when he geueth testimony of his owne worke. In Jeremy the 18. chapter, the people sayd, we wyll go after our own thoughtes. Which place Jerome expounding thus wytteth: Where then is the power of free wyll without the grace of God? and the iudgement of a mans owne wyll? When as it is a great offence to God for a man to follow his own thoughtes, and to do the will of his wicked hart? What we are obnoxious vnto seruitude, Christ declareth in John saying, he which doth sinne, is the seruauant of sinne. Wherefore seing we sinne in many thinges, and haue from our mothers wombe sinne fast cleuing vnto vs, we must of necessity confesse that we are seruantes. But then shall we be in very deede free, when the some hath deliuered vs. Otherwise we serue a most bitter seruitude. Wherefore Paul sayd, that he was sold vnder sinne, and so solde, that in his fleshe he confessed to dwell nothing that is good: and that he did the thinges which he would not, and which he hated, and felt an other lawe in his members, resisting the lawe of hys minde, and leauing him away captiue vnto the lawe of sinne. And vnto the Galathians he sayth, that the flesh fighteth agaynst the spirite, and the spirite agaynst the fleshe, so that we do not the thynges which we would. Which thinges if they be true of

The godly alwayes appointe thinges with this condition, if God so wil.

In those workes which are acceptable vnto God, they that are strangers from Christ haue no liberty at all.

After sinne nature remayned but yet mapned and wounded.

I reason why man can not, not sinne.

Touchinge our strengthes we must most of all beleue him that made vs.

Without grace we are seruants.

so great an Apostle, and of holy men regenerate by Christ, what is to be thought of vngodly which pertain not vnto Christ. For they can not come vnto him vnles they be drawen. For Christ sayth, No man can come vnto me, vnles my father draw hym. He which before would of his owne accord go, is not drawen, as sayth Augustine but is led. Wherefore if we must be drawen vnto Christ, before we would not: which is a most grievous sinne. And therefore we will not, because the wisdom of the fleshe is enmity towardes God. For it is not subiect vnto the lawe of God, yea neither undoubtedly can it. And as many as are not by Christ set at liberty, liue vnder the lawe, and as Paul adeth vnto the Galatians, vnder the curse: whiche should not be true, if they could fulfill the lawe of God. For none incur the curse, but they which transgresse the lawe. Farther Paul expessedly sayth, It is not of hym that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy. For our saluation is his worke, and not the worke of our strengthes. For it is he which worketh in vs both to wyll and to performe. Before he bringeth that to passe, if he deale any thing with vs either by the lawe, or by the doctrine of his worde, he dealeth with stones: for our hartes are stony, vnles Christ chaunge them into fleshy. Which thing in Ezechiel he promisseth that he will do, and will so worke, that we shall walke in his commaundementes. And doubtles if we coulde without grace liue iustly and vprightly, we should be able also by our workes to be iustified: which sentence is utterly condemned both of Paul and of all the whole scripture. Jeremy sayth, Conuert me Lord, and I shalbe conuerted. And Dauid sayth, Creat in me O God a cleane hart. And that this commeth not to passe in all men, we playnly see by the 29. chapter of Deutromony, where it is thus written. The Lord hath not geue vnto you eyes to see, nor an eare to heare, nor an hart to vnderstand. And in 30. cha. God promised to circuncise their hartes, and the hartes of their seede, that they may walke in his preceptes. For he both beginneth and maketh perfect our saluation. For so Paul sayth vnto the Phillippians, I hope that he which hath begon in you, wyll accomplishe it euen vnto the day of Christ. This thing holy men right well vnderstanding pray with Dauid, Incline myne hart to thy testimonies: and wyth Solomon: The Lord incline our hartes, that we may walke in his wayes: and wyth Paul to the Thesalonians, The Lord direct your hartes in patience, and in the wayting for of Christ. And Solomon in his prouerbes sayth, The hart of the kinge is in the hand of God, and to what end he wyll, he enclineth it. These testimonies sufficiently declare that it is the worke of God, and not our worke, to be conuerted vnto hym, and to liue vprightly. Here some obiekt vnto vs the commaundementes which are set forth vnto vs in the holy scriptures, for they seeme to signifie, that it lieth in our selues to performe the thinges which are commaunded. For Esay sayth, If ye will, and wyll harken vnto me, ye shall eate the good thynges of the earth. And the Lord oftentimes commaundeth vs, to conuert our selues vnto hym: Be ye conuerted (sayth he) vnto me. I wyll not the death of a sinner. I had rather he should be conuerted and lyue. And when he had published abroade the lawe, he sayd, that he had set before them life, and death, blessing, and cursing. And infinite such other like testimonies mought be brought. But here we ought to consider, that these thinges indeede are commaunded vnto men, but we are no where taught that a man is able to performe them by his owne proper strengthes. Neither is it mete, that by the preceptes of the lawe of God we should gather the power of our strengthes: as though we of our owne accord, are able to performe so much, as the lawe of God commaundeth. Yea rather hereby is to be measured our infirmity: that when we see that the excellency and dignity of the commaundementes of God infinitely passeth our strengthes, we should remember, that the law hath a certayne other end, then to be performed of vs. That ende Paul declareth to be sondry and diuers. By the lawe (sayth he) commeth the knowledge of sinne, which lawe he sayth, was therfore geuen, that the number of transgressions mought be increased. For by this meanes the lawe is made a scholemaster, to leade men vnto Christ, that when they see themselves oppressed with the waight of the commaundementes, and with

with the greatnes of finnes, they should vnderstand that their saluation lieth onely in the mercy of God, & in the redemption of Christ. For when we perceauē our owne imbecillity and vniworthynes, straight way we beginne to pray vnto God, that he would both forgeue our finnes through Christ, and also minister vnto vs the helpe of his spirite, that we may endeuor our selues vnto his will. Gene what thou commaundest (sayth Augustine) and command what thou wylt. Farther an other end of the law is, that we should see, whereunto we must apply our selues. It is possible also, that if by the grace of God there be geuen an obedience begon, men may frame theselues vnto y<sup>e</sup> law. Lastly, though in this life be not geuen vnto vs, to be able exactly to satisfie the lawe, yet in an other life, when we haue caste of all this corruption, we shall fully obtayne it. And yet ought not God therefore to be accused of iniustice: for it cometh not throughe his fault that his commaundements can not be obserued. Neither can any of vs be excused: for y<sup>e</sup> we willingly & desirously violate y<sup>e</sup> law geue vnto vs. The law was geue, as a thing most agreeable vnto our nature, as it was first instituted. For y<sup>e</sup> image of God could not otherwise more liuely & plainly be expressed. And although by reason of sin we are not able to accomplishe the law, yet this at y<sup>e</sup> least way we see, what maner ones we ought to be: And that sentence which is commonly objected, that nothing is to be counted for sinne which dependeth not of election, ought to be vnderstand, as Augustine interpreteth it, of that kind of sinne which is not a punishment of sinne. For otherwise originall sinne is neither voluntary, nor receaued by election. But thou wilt say. Seeing the matter goeth so, we shall see of necessity to sticke fast in sinne. Which thing doubles I will not deny. Although such is this necessity, that it hath not compulsion ioyned with it. God is of necessity good, neither can he by any meanes sinne: and yet is he not violently compelled to be good: which thing Augustine in his 22. booke De ciuitate dei, and 30. chapter excellently well declareth. Shall we (sayth he) for that God hymselfe can not sinne, therefore deny, that he hath free will? Ambrose in his 2. booke and third chapter de Fide, to Gratian the emperour testifieth, that God is free: when as (sayth he) one and the selfe same spirite worketh all thinges, diuiding vnto all as pleaseth him, according to the choise of his free will, and not for the dewty of necessity. In these sentences of these fathers, free will is so taken, that it is contrary vnto violence and compulsion: not that it is equally prone to ether part. Wherefore Jerome in his homely, of the prodigall sonne, which he wrote vnto Damasus, for that he tooke free will in an other sence, there fore wrote otherwise. For it is God only (sayth he) on whome sinne falleth not, neither can fall. But others, forasmuch as they haue free will, may be bowed to ether part. Vnto blessed spirites also and angells, forasmuch as they felicity is nowe confirmed this belongeth, that they can not sinne. Wherefore Augustine in his 22. booke de Ciuitate Dei, the 30. chapter: Euen as (sayth he) the first immortalitye whiche Adam thorough sin lost, was, that he mought not die: so the first free wil was, that he mought not sin: but the last free wil shall be, that he can not sin. And yet notwithstanding there is graunted a certayne kinde of libertye, not whereby, they can be bowed to ether part, but whereby, although that which they do is of necessity, yet are they not compelled or violently driuen. For euen as there are certayne true thinges so manifest, that the minde can not but assent vnto them, so the presence of God now reuealed and made manifest, is so greate a good thing, that the saintes can not fall away from it: So also, although we of necessity sinne before we be regenerate in Christe, yet are not therefore the powers of the will violated: for whatsoeuer we do, we do it both willingly, and also being induced by some certayne hope. And yet are we not therefore to be counted nothinge to differ from brute beastes. For they although they be moued by some certayne iudgment, yet is it not by a free iudgement. But in men although not yet regenerate, there is still as we haue sayd much libertye remayninge, as touchinge ciuill and morall workes. Farther euen amongst the finnes, in which they are of necessity conuersant, they haue yet a choyce to chuse one, and to reiect an other: although vnto those these thinges which please God they can not aspire, which thinges brute beastes haue not. For they are rather driven by the force of nature, then that they can do any thing with any liberty. Men may be said to be free either as touching compulsion, or as touching sinne, or as touching misery. The first liberty from compulsion is geuen vnto all men. But vnto sinne and misery all men doubles are subiecte, whiche are not yet come vnto Christe. But howe menne regenerate are subiecte either vnto sinne, or vnto misery so longe as they lue here, we will after ward declare. In the meane tyme this we ought to be certayne of, that by this necessity which we put, the will is not compelled to sinne: But the more playnly to declare all this whole matter, we must first be thoroughly settled, what these wordes signifie, Free, violent, and willinge: That we call free, which hauing two or mo thinges set before it, can as it listeth chuse what it will. And therefore we deny, that the wil of man not regenerate is vniuersallye free. For it can not chuse those thinges which pertaine vnto saluation. Violent is that, which is so moued of an outward beginning, that it of it selfe nothinge helpeth vnto that motion, but rather resisteth it. As when a stone is cast one high. That is sayd to worke of his owne accord, or willingly, whiche hath an inward beginning enclining to that motion wherby it is impelled. By these thinges it is manifest that to do of his owne accord, & to do of necessity, are not contrary the one to the other. For they may be ioyned together, as it is playne in our wil, which of necessity embraceth felicity, and yet it embraceth it not agaynst hys will, or by compulsion, but of his owne accord, and gladly. Neither is it possible, that the will should ener be compelled, to will that which it will not. For Augustine thinketh it to be so absurd, that a man should will that which he wil not, as if a man should say, that any thing can be hote without heate. Howbeit that necessity wherby the vngodly are said to sinne, is not absolute and perfect, that it can not be otherwise. For so sone as the spirite and grace of Christ commeth, that necessity is straight way loosed. Wherefore Augustine saith, that it is of nature to be able to haue faith, hope, and charity: but to haue them indeede is vnto grace. For that power or ability bursteth not forth into acte, vnto grace be geuen vs of God. Here in Augustine agreed with Pelagius, to be able is of nature. But this thing Augustine added, which Pelagius could not abide, that to will well, and to lue bryghtly is to be attributed vnto grace only. But I thinke that as touching this power of nature, is to be made a distinction. For if they meane this, that our nature is so made of God, that neither sayth, nor hope, nor charity strue agaynst it, if they be geuen of God, but rather accomplyshe it, make it perfect, and adorne it, I confesse that to be true which they say. But if they wil haue the power of nature to signifie any force that it hath, wherby it can clayme vnto it selfe these thinges, I will by no meanes graunt thereunto. For it is a wicked and damnable sentence. Wherefore we saye, that the wil of man hath a respect both vnto good, and to euill, but yet in a diuerse consideration. For it of hys owne accorde maye embrace euill: but it can not embrace good, vnto it be restored by the grace of God. For, that we haue nede of a certayn deuine inspiratio to performe those thinges which are in very dede good, euen the Ebnike writers also beinge forced by the trueth haue sometimes declared. For Aristotle in hys first booke of Ebnikes sayth: If there be any gifte of God, we must verely thinke that felicity is it. And felicity he defineth to be nothing ells, but a most excellent actio proceeding from the principallest power of our minde, by a most notable vertue. Plato also in a certayne place confesseth, that vertues are ingenerated in men by the inspiration of God. The Scholemen also (if there were any amongst the that were whom what sunder the the rest) confessed, that vnto every good work the grace of God is necessary, to ayde humane strengths. Howbeit after ward, howsoeuer they forgot theselues, they affirm that a man not regenerate may do some good workes, which may please God, and which may merite (as they vse to speake) of congruence, the grace of Christe. Congruence they call that which

which we may call mete & good: which is whē h̄ rigor & sharpenes of the law is remitted. But condignitie they call which is of right, due. But these mē which first deuised these terms, considered not, ȳ those goodly ciuil works, though in the w they seme neuer so much vnto men good, yet before God they are sinnes, as Augustine by moste certayne reasons proueth. And it hath bene before declared, neither wil we thinke it much agayne to repete the same, namelpe, That before we be conuerted vnto God, we are by nature the childe of wrath. And John sayth, He which beleueth not in the sonne of God, hath not eternall life, but the wrath of God abideth vpon him. But what can there be offered vnto God of enemies and haters of God, which may be acceptable vnto hym? Paul to the Ephesians sayth, that before we came vnto Christ we were dead in our offences, and sinnes. But dead mē as they seie nothing, so can they worke nothing, whereby to call themselves to life agayne. Paul vnto the Phillipians counted all the things which he had done before he was conuerted vnto Christ, for losse, and for dong: so farre is it of that in them he did put anye merite. God in Clape the first chapter testifieth, that he abhorred, detested, and counted for an abomination those oblations, which the Jewes offered without sayth & pietie. The same prophet compareth all our righteousness to a cloth stayned with ȳ natural disease of a womā. And our sauour saith, I am the vine and ye are the brāches. As the brāch cā not bring forth fruite vnles it abide in the vine: so ye cā not bring forth fruite vnles ye abide in me. And strait way he addeth: Without me ye can do nothing. And in an other place he saith, that an euill tree can not bring forth good fruite. For first it behoueth h̄ roote to be good, before there cā be hoped any good fruite to come fro it. But good trees we cā not be, before we be grafted into Christ. This grafting is in the holy scriptures called regeneration. And euen as no man can helpe anye thinge to the generation of himselfe: so can no man any thing helpe to the regeneration of himselfe. Paul also in this selfe same epistle sayth, whatsoeuer is not of sayth, is sinne. Wherefore seing the wicked want sayth, whatsoeuer they do, ought to be counted for sinne. If thine eye be single, thy whole body shalbe lightesome. But if thy light be darkened, how great shall that darknes be? Vnto the Colossians also he playnly teacheth what maner ones we be before we are iustified, Estranged (saith he) from God, enemies in mynd, conuersant in euill workes. And in this epistle vnto the Romanes, men not yet grafted into Christ, he calleth wilde Oliue trees. And we know that wilde Oliue trees are barren, neither can they bring forth fruite. Farther workes can not be good, vnles they either satisfy the lawe, or if they any thing stray from the lawe, the same be not imputed vnto the through Christ. But men not regenerate can not satisfy the lawe, for euen the regenerate can not do it. And soasmuch as they are not by sayth ioyned vnto Christ, they can not attaine vnto the benefite of Christ, whereby such defectes or wants are made whole againe. And he whiche teacheth that a man canne without the grace of God do workes which are acceptable vnto God must of necessity also teach, that Christ is not the redemer of the whole man. For he ascribeth vnto our nature no small portion of saluation without Christ, which teacheth that we can without the grace of Christ worke wel, and liue vprightly. Paul also in this place, When we were (saith he) the seruantes of sinne, we were free vnto righteousness. Which is nothing els, but that we had no consideration at all vnto righteousness, or fellowship therewith. Whereouer he exhorteth vs, that euen as we haue serued sinne, so we should now serue righteousness. And he also teacheth, that we should now altogether without any sinnes serue righteousness. Wherefore it is certaine that before we serued sinne, and were vtterly without all righteousness. Lastly, he hath left no meanes at all betwene the seruitude of sinne sinne and of righteousness. But these men contrariwise sayne certayne men (what they be I know not) which although they be not yet iustified, do yet not withstanding iust and good workes, which may be acceptable vnto God. All these thinges sufficiently declare how absurd and found these mens opinion is. Howbeit in the meane time they crye out, that we are blasphemous, which auouch the whole nature of man to be euill. But as Augustine warely writeth, Under the prayles of nature, he hidden the enemies of grace. They ought to haue considered vnto what ground we referre that euill, whereof we complayne. For we ascribe it not either to nature as it was created, or vnto God, but vnto sinne, which through the first man had an entrance made open vnto it. For by al manner of meanes we disagree from the Manichies. For they dreamed, both that our nature is euill, and that it was created of an euill God. But we confesse and acknowledge that man was created free. But that he hath now lost that liberty, we make not God the author thereof, but his owne fault. They were called of the Church heretiques, which denied free will. But this is to be vnderstand of the first creation of our nature. For otherwise there is none of the fathers, which if the truth be diligently examined, belwayleth not the calamity of man whereinto he fell through sinne.

Our aduersaries rather approach vnto the Manichies, which contend that our corrupt affectes as they are now, were so created of God. For so they affirme that he created euill. But we, soasmuch as we see that these troublesome affectes, want not sinne, therefore deny, that they were so created of God: but through our own fault are become vnbrideled, and resisting the word of God. For it is certaine, that man was at the beginning made vnto the image of God. But nothing moze be-seemeth it, then liberty. But seeing that image is in a manner blotted out in vs, so that it hath nede now to be restored through Christ, what meruayle is it if liberty also be for the most part taken away from it: when they reason that man is free, it is all one, as if they should say, that man is a two footed creature, and therefore must nedes go byright. But if they shoulde so conclude of a lame man, it shoulde easily appeare, how much they are deceaued. For the proprieties of man which belong vnto his nature being perfect, agree not when they are applied vnto his nature corrupted. Neither do the opinions of our aduersaries much disagree from the Pelagians. For they taught that nature being holpen by the grace of creation, and by the doctrine of the lawe may liue byrightly: and these men say, that nature being holpen by grace preuenting and knocking, may do good workes which may please God. The catholike Church resisted Pelagias, nether cotreded it about the grace of creatiō, or of the law, nor also about grace preuenting, but taught the without the grace of Christ, wherby we are iustified, no man can do any good workes. And with Augustine, who was a great fighter against these men, there is no difference betwene, to do good workes wout grace, & to do good workes wout the faith of Christ.
He vpon the 31. Psalme to declare that there is no good worke without faith, thus writeth: A good entent maketh the worke good: but that entent doth sayth direct.
Wherefore consider not what a man doth, but what he hath a regard vnto whilest he is in doying. And whē as in all the whole holy scripture, there is not one sentence which is against our doctrine, yet they continually object vnto vs the example of Cornelius who being not yet (as they thinke) regenerate, neither beleued in Christ, did not withstanding workes which pleased God. We in dede confesse that both the almes and prayers of Cornelius pleased God, for the Angell affirmed the same but these men adde of their owne, that Cornelius when he did these thinges was not yet iustified, neither beleued in Christ. But they consider not that the scripture in that place calleth him religious and one that feared God: Wherefore Cornelius be-leued, and beleued in the Messias, being instructed in the doctrine of the Iewes.
But whether Iesus of Nazareth were that Messias or no, he knew not certaynly.
And therefore Peter was sent to instruct him moze fully. But here to blerc our eyes, they say, that Paul in the 17. of the Actes, attributeth vnto them of Athens some pietie, when yet they were idolaters. For thus he sayth, ye men of Athens

I shew vnto you that God who ye ignorantly worship. But eue as if a mā can handsomly draw some one letter, is not therefore straight way called a good writer, neither he which can sing a song or two, is therefore straight way to be called a good singing man: for these names require consideration and art: but it may happen by chance, that a man may draw well, or sing well once or twice, and peradventure the third time: so none is to be counted in very deepe and plainly godly, which doth a worke or two, which hath some shewe of piety. And Paul called not the Athenians absolutely godly, but added certayne termes which diminish godlines: whom ye ignorantly (sayth he) worship. But what piety can that be which is ioynd wth the ignorance of the true God. Moreover a little before he had called the idolatrias, that is, verpe superstitious. By these two wordes he much diminished their piety. But Cornelius, Luke simply calleth religious, and addeth that he feared God: which addition is of so great force, that in the booke of Job, a man fearing God, is turned of the 70. interpreters dauidus, and tiros: that is, a true and religious man. And Dauid saith: Blessed is the man that feareth the Lord. And if he be blessed which feareth the Lord, how is not the same man also iustified? But besides these things, which after a sorte by the causes, proue the iustification of Cornelius, we haue an other testimony also of the effectes: for that he gaue almes, which were acceptable vnto God. But we haue already by many reasons proued, that no man can do workes acceptable vnto God, but he which is iustified and regenerate. Farther he distributed these almes vpon the nation of the Iewes, that as of them he had bene instructed in the doctrine of piety, so on the other side he would imparte vnto them some of his temporall good thinges. For it is meete (as Paul sayth vnto the Galathians) That he which is instructed, should communicate vnto hym, which doth instruct hym in all good thynges. Moreover that souldiour which was sent vnto Peter declared, that he had a good testimony of all the Iewes. All which thinges plainly declare, that although we read not that he was circumcised, yet he so approached vnto the doctrine of the people of God, that all men commended his piety. It is written also that he prayed, and that diligently. And if a man diligently peruse the whole history, he shall finde that he obserued the same houre, which the Iewes had appointed them for their common prayers. For it saith, that at the ix. houre he saw an Angell standing by him, which signified vnto him, that his prayer was heard. But we are taught by the first chapter of Esay, and by the xv. chapter of Prouerbes, and by a great many other places, that wycked me and sinners are not heard of God. Which yet is to be vnderstand, so long as they will be sinners, and retaine still a will to sinne. Neither maketh that against this sentence which Augustine writeth against the Donatistes, that the prayers of wycked priests are heard of God. For the same father addeth. That that cometh to passe because of the deuotion of the people. But Cornelius when he prayed, was holpen by his own fayth, and not by the fayth of others that stood by. And Augustine in his epistle to Sertus saith: that God useth in iustifying of a man to geue vnto hym his spirite, whereby he may praye for those thynges which are profitable vnto saluation. And seeing Cornelius prayed for those things, it can not be doubted, but that he was iustified. Hereunto adde, that no mā can rightly pray vnto God, except he haue faith. And that we are iustified by faith it is now already sufficiently testified and declared. Peter also before he began to preach vnto hym, said: that he now saw verely, that God is not an acceptor of persons, but he is accepted of hym (of what nation so euer he bee) which worketh ryghteousnesse. Which wordes plainly declare, that Cornelius was then accepted of God, before Peter came vnto him. And I maruell, that there are some which dare auaunch, y he had not the faith of Christ, when as Christ himselfe in the viij. chapter of John sayth: That he knoweth not God, which beleueth not in the sonne of God. And in the 4. chapter he admonisheth his disciples. If ye beleue in God, beleue also in me. And if ye beleue in Moses, ye would also beleue me. These thinges assure vs, that Cornelius beleued verily in God: and therefore also beleued in the Messias to come, as he was instructed of the Iewes, although he knew not that he was already come, and that had the faith of the fathers of the old testament.

An example of Nathaniel

Faith is not of our selues.

had faith in Christ, but not a distinct and plaine faith.

Peter came to Cornelius to edify him, & not to lay the foundation in him.

The saluatio which we haue in this life is not perfect.

The saluatio
begonne by iustificatio is dayly to be made perfect.

Jesus of Nazareth whome the Iewes had crucified, was the same Messias. He had that faith, wherby the fathers beleued in Christ to come. Wherefore, saying they were iustified by that faith, why should we take vpon vs to deny the same vnto Cornelius? Nathanaell which beleued in the Messias to come, and thought not y he was yet com, is pronounced of Christ a true Israelite, in whom was no guile, which two things cannot be applied vnto a ma not yet iustified. But Peter was therfore sent to Cornelius, that he might more plainly & more expessedly know the thinges which he had before intricately beleued of Christ. Of this mynde was Gregory in his 9 homely vpon Ezechiel. For he sayth: That saythe is the entry, wherby we come to good workes, but not contrariwise that by good workes we can come vnto sayth. And so he concludeth, that Cornelius first beleued, before he could bring forth workes prayse worthy. And he citeth that place to the Hebrewes, Vy without sayth it is impossible to please God. Which sentence, as it is very playne by that selfe place, cannot be vnderstand, but of that faith which iustificeth. Bede declaring the 1. chap. of the Actes, is of the same mynde, and citeth y wordes of Gregory. Neither is the maister of the sentences of any other iudgement in hys 2. booke, and 25. distinction. But our aduersaries object vnto vs Augustine in hys 7. chap. De predestinatione sanctorum, where he reasoneth against those, which taught that faith is of our selues, whē yet in the meane tyme they confessed, y the workes which follow are of God, but yet are obteyned by sayth. Augustine in dede confesseth, that y workes which follow sayth are of God, but he denieth that sayth is of our selues. For he saith, that Paul writeth vnto the Ephe. By grace ye are saved through sayth, and that not of your selues, for it is the gyft of God. But that is a harde saying which he addeth, that the prayers and almes of Cornelius were accepted of God, before he beleued in Christ. But we must here weigh the thinges which follow. For he addeth, And yet prayd he not, neyther gaue he almes without some sayth. For how dyd he call vpon hym, in whome he beleued not? These wordes plainly declare, that Augustine toke not away from Cornelius all maner of faith in Christ, but only an expessed and distinct sayth. Which thing that place most of all argueth, which is cited out of the epistle to the Romanes. Howe shall they call vpon hym, in whome they haue not beleued? For those wordes are written of the sayth, and in uocation of me regenerate, as the next sentence following, plainly declareth, Euery one which calleth vpon the name of the Lord shall be saved. For we cannot attribute saluation, but vnto them that are iustified. But Peter was sente vnto Cornelius to buylde vp, & not to lay the foundation. For the foundation of sayth were before layde in hym. But those thinges which Augustine addeth, seme to bring greater difficulty. For he saith: But if he could without the faith, namely, of Christ be saved, that singular workman the Apostle should not haue ben sent to edifie hym. But saying he already before attributed vnto him sayth and inuocatio, after which of necessity followeth saluation, wherof the Apostle speaketh in this epistle, how can he take away from him saluation: vnles we peradventure vnderstand, that sayth and saluation is in men iustified not perfect, so long as they liue here. For our saluation commeth not in this lyfe to that degree, nor to that greatnes which Christ requireth in hys elect. For no man doubteth, but that we shal not attayne to perfect saluation before our resurrection and eternall saluation, althoughe we now after a sorte haue the fruition therof beyng begonne. Paul to the Ephesians affirmeth, that we are now saved by sayth. And yet Paul to the Philippians exhorteth vs, With feare and with trembling to worke our owne saluation. Which places cannot be conciliated together, vnles we say that saluation begonne in vs thowow iustificatio, is daily to be made perfect in vs: For we are always more and more renued: and sayth is made more full, more expessed, and of more efficacy. These wordes of Augustine vnles we thus interprete them, it must needs be, that either they are none of hys wordes, or els that he is repugnaunt vnto himselfe. But that that booke is Augustines, we can not deny. But that he is repugnaunt vnto himselfe it is not very likely. But if thou say, that these thinges may well agree together, if we graunt that Cornelius

lius was not yet iustified, when as notwithstanding he had done some woorkes gratefull and acceptable vnto God: I answer, that this can by no meanes agree with Augustines sentence. For he in his 80. treatise vpon John, and in his 4. booke and 3. chap. against Julianus, and vpon the 31. psalme, by most firme reasons proueth, that all the woorkes which are done before we are iustified, are sinnes. But that sayth is more expessedly set forth and made more perfect in them that are iustified, may easily be vnderstand by y<sup>e</sup> which Christ sayd vnto his Apostles, Many kings and prophets desired to see the things that ye see, and say the not. And yet notwithstanding were those kinges and prophetes men godly and iustified: although they knew not all the mysteries of Christ so expessedly as dyd the Apostles. And Christ when he prayed, thus pronounced of his Apostles: The wordes which thou gauest me, haue I geuen vnto them: those haue they receaued, and haue knowen that I came forth from thee, and that thou hast sent me. These thinges declare that the Apostles beleued in Christ, and therefore were iustified. And yet the very history of the Gospell plainly declareth, that they were ignorant of many thinges. For oftentimes it is declared, that ether they had their eyes closed, that they should not see: or els that they vnderstood not the thinges which were spoken. Wherefore Augustine denieth saluation vnto Cornelius, before Peter was sent vnto him, not vniuersally, but onely denieth that he had a perfect and absolute saluation. But they object moreover the same Augustine in his questios to Simplicianus, in the 2. booke and 2. Question where he plainly teacheth, that faith goeth before good woorkes. After that he putteth a certaine meane betwene grace and the celebration of the Sacramentes. For he saith, that it is possible, that Catechumenus, that is, one newly conuerted vnto Christian Religion, and that he which is conuersant among the Catechumeni, may beleue and haue grace: and yet the same man is not yet washed by Baptisme. Moreover he saith, that after the Sacramentes, is poured into vs a more fuller grace: by which wordes he signifieth, y<sup>e</sup> it is one & the selfe same grace, but is after ward made more plentifull. And that thou mayst know, that he entreateth of that faith which iustifieth, he citeth a place out of the Epistle to the Ephesians: By grace ye are saved through faith, and that not of your selues: for it is the gift of God. But our aduersaries will say, that they also teach that y<sup>e</sup> grace of God goeth before good woorkes: and that of that grace is some faith geuen vnto men. But this at y<sup>e</sup> beginning is so weake, that it can not haue y<sup>e</sup> power to iustifie howbeit there may some woorkes be done, which may be acceptable vnto God. But let vs remember what Augustine writeth of Pelagius in his 105. Epistle to Innocentius the Bishop of Rome, he saith, that Pelagius in the Counsell of Palestine, to the end he would not bee accursed, accursed all those which he should say that they could lyue vprightly without grace. But he by grace vnderstoode nothyng els, but the giftes geuen vnto vs in our creation, as free choyse, reason, wyll, and the doctrine of the law. The Bishops of Palestine being beguyled by thys blynd shifte, absolved and released him. Augustine excuseth them, for that they did it plainly and simplye. For when they heard Pelagius cōfesse y<sup>e</sup> grace of God: they could vnderstand no other grace, but y<sup>e</sup> which the holy Scriptures set forth: namely that, whereby we are regenerate and grafted into Christ, wherfore it is plaine that they which saue vnto them selues any other grace, then that wherby we are iustified, and grafted into Christ, obtrude vnto vs an inuention of man, or rather Pelagius shifte or starting hole, which the holy Scriptures acknowledge not. Farther Augustine in that place, which we now spake of affirmeth, that the Catechumeni, and such as beleue, although they be not Baptised, are yet notwithstanding conceaued. But they which are now conceaued to be the sonnes of God, can not be straungers from him or enemies vnto him. Wherefore it followeth that they are now iustified, although not so perfectly. Which is hereby manifest, for that Augustine calleth the grace which succeedeth, a more full grace: as that which differeth not from the first, in kind and in nature, but only in degree and in quantity. And seing it is of the selfe same kinde that the other is, it must nedes also iustifie. Which is hereby made playne, for that Cornelius is said to haue done woorkes which pleased God, neither is that of any greater force, that Augustine addeth that that grace was not so great, that it could be sufficient

Note the interpretation of the wordes of Augustine.

Catechumenus is a man who is newly converted into the church so he is instructed before baptism whether a weake grace and faith haue the power to iustify. An answer of Pelagius.

Augustine calleth Catechumeni those who are before baptism conceived.

The grace which succeedeth is one & the same, but it differeth in degree and quantity.

sufficient vnto Cornelius or vnto the Catechumeni for the obteyning of the kingdome of heauen. For these wordes affirme not, that after this grace or sayth of the Catechumeni is to be looked for an other sayth which may iustifie, as though by that former sayth they were not iustified. This thing only he would declare, that the Catechumeni ought not to stay in this degree of faith & of grace, but ought to receaue baptisme, and to go forward, vntill the saluation and regeneration now begonne shoulde be made perfect. For if any man should contemne the sacrament of Baptisme, he shoulde be excluded from the kingdome of heauen. For they which haue beleued, ought chiefly to see vnto, that they be by the sacrament grafted into the Church. They which will not do this, or neglect it, sufficiently declare, that they haue not earnestly beleued. Wherefore it is not absurd, that Cornelius and the Catechumeni, had that grace which iustificieth, which yet if they had contemned baptisme, had not bene sufficient to the obtaynement of the kingdome of heauen. And that Augustine had hereunto a respect, hereby it is manifest, in that he addeth, that we ought not only to be conceaued, but also to be bozne: which is so to be vnderstand, so that there be no lawfull impediment to let. For if a man beleue, and desire baptisme, and can not attayne vnto it, Augustine denieth not vnto such a one, saluation. For he confesseth together with other of the fathers, that there is a baptisme of the spirite, and that the power of the holy ghost worketh in our hartis without outward signes. And this he teacheth vpon Leuiticus in his 84. question. For he saith, that Moses without the outward ordination of the priesthode, and without visible signes receaued the priestly grace: and that John Baptist was without outward sacramentes annoynted with the holy ghost in his mothers wombe: & that y<sup>e</sup> thiefe vpon y<sup>e</sup> crosse was without any sacramentes saued onely by the grace of God. Lastly, when as he saith, that we are by the first grace of God conceaued, and by the latter bozne, it is very plaine that he which is conceaued, & he which is bozne, is of one and the same kinde. For a liuing creature, when it is conceaued, is not of any other nature, then of that that it is when it is brought forth into the world. This is y<sup>e</sup> onely difference, y<sup>e</sup> the one is moze perfect, the other moze vnperfect. Wherefore he that is Catechumenus, when he is baptised, may by y<sup>e</sup> grace which he receaueth in baptism seme moze perfect th<sup>e</sup> he was before, when he only beleued: although th<sup>e</sup> also he was iustified through faith, wherby he embraced the promises of god touching Christ. Now resteth for vs to examine a place of Chrysostome in his homely De spiritu, Natura, & lege. Although if I should therein speake my iudgement, I thinke that that oration is not Chrysostomes. For it is both repugnant vnto it selfe, and also contayneth thinges not hanging together, which can by no meanes be conciliated: But whosoeners it be, this is certayne, that it maketh moze on our side, then on our aduersaries side. For first he saith, that men vsing mercy, haue by their almes no fruite at all before they haue faith: but so soone as a man is adozned with it, straight way follow good and fruitfull workes: but before they are not had. And he addeth, that we are by sayth only saued: when as workes without faith coulde neuer saue them which worke them. And he citeth the thiefe: whom he affirmeth was saued by faith only without workes. And that we should not doubt of what sayth he speaketh, he speaketh of that sayth, whereby we are made the citizens of heauen, and household seruantes of God. But these thinges can be ascribed only to that faith, which iustificieth. Further he expessedly auoucheth, that without sayth there is nothing that is good, and of his saying he bringeth this reason, for that that soule is dead which wanteth sayth. And moze plainly to declare himselfe, he saith that those which do excellent workes without faith, are like vnto dead carcases, and to the reliques of dead men: which although they be adozned with goodly and precious garmentes, yet haue they no feeling of th<sup>e</sup>, neither by them do they gather any heate, or be defended from corruption. So (saith he) Infidels, although they seme sometymes to liue vprightly, yet of their workes they receaue no commodity at all. He addeth mozeouer: euen as it is necessary that a man first be, before he can receaue meate to be nourished withall, so is it necessary that there be first sayth: & then, y<sup>e</sup> afterward it be nourished by good workes. Touching the workes of Cornelius, he saith that they were wonderfull, and pleased God, the chiefe rewarder of workes. All these thinges are spoken both truly and also agreeably vnto our doctrine. But afterward he addeth, that Cornelius whē he wrought those workes which ar prayfed, beleued not in Christ: which although it be hardly said, yet may it by an interpretatio be lenefied: to vnderstand him, as we did August. namely, y<sup>e</sup> Cornelius beleued not distinctly, & expessedly, whē yet he beleued in Christ after y<sup>e</sup> selfe same maner as y<sup>e</sup> elders did, of whō it is to be doubted, but y<sup>e</sup> they wer saued by y<sup>e</sup> sauioz, whō they loked shoulde come. And this kind of faith was sufficiēt vnto saluatiō, vntil y<sup>e</sup> gos-ple was published abroad. But afterward he addeth, y<sup>e</sup> Cornelius could not haue obtained saluatiō, vnles faith had bene offred vnto him: which yet may after a sort be admitted, so y<sup>e</sup> that saying be taken of y<sup>e</sup> perfect saluatiō, wher vnto Christians are called, and shall one day come. But that which he addeth, can by no meanes stand, so: he sayth, that these workes of Cornelius were dead. Here now Chrysostome beginneth, not to be Chrysostome. For howe was it possible, that the workes of Cornelius shoulde be wonderfull and please God the chiefe rewarder if they were dead: But if we will know the true opinion of Chrysostome hymself touching this matter, let vs se what he writeth vpo this histozy in the 9. cha-piter of the Actes. For there he playnly testifieth, that Cornelius beleued, and was a goodly man, and not being content with this, he addeth, that his life was honest, and that he had sound groundes of doctrine. Here he affirmeth, that he had both sayth and also the fruites of sayth. Finally he addeth, that he had both sayth and righteousnes, and all maner of vertue. And thus muche touching Chrysostome. But they object vnto this our sentence, the excellent workes and notable enterprises of the Romanes, which God recompensed with the reward of a most ample impery. And to that purpose they cite Augustine in his 51. booke de Ciuitate Dei the 15. chapter. For there he sayth, that God vnto them vnto whome he would not geue eternall life, gaue an earthly glozy of a most excellēt empire: which thing vnles he had done, there shoulde not haue bene redzed any reward to good arts, y<sup>e</sup> is to vertues, wherby they endenozed theselues to attaine to so greate glozy. But that we may the better vnderstand thys compensation whereof Augustine speaketh, we must remember, that God in the government of the world, will haue all thinges done by a certayne order, and without con-fusiō: that effects shoulde follow theyz causes, and properties shoulde be adfoyned vnto thinges whereunto they belonge. Fruitcs are by the heate of the Sonne made ripe: witty men by industrie and study, attayne vnto good artes. After winter, commeth the spring, agayne after the spring, commeth sommer: and after sommer, commeth the autum. Plants bring forth, first leaues, afterward flowers, and then fruites. After this maner doth God prouide for the nature of thinges, and for rites and famelies. And for that, vnles common welthes flozithinge in Lawes and vertues shoulde attayne vnto dominion, all humane thinges would sone come to nought, therefore by the commaundement of God and by a naturall institution, it followeth, that where flozitheth discipline of warre, obedience towardes the magistrate, obseruation of Lawes, seuerie inrisolation, modesty of princes, abstinēce, fortitude, and loue of the countrey, there also followeth a greate empire. Whiche yet proueth not, that these thinges are not sinnes, so far forth as they procede from men without sayth. For they are not directed vnto the glozy of God, which ought to be the end of al mēs doings: wherefore thys glozye and largenes of dominion, for that by the institution of God it followeth mozell and ciuill vertues, is both taken of ciuill men as the end and fruite of theyz laboys, and also is called a reward. And that these workes of the Romanes were sinnes, Augustine himselte affirmeth in y<sup>e</sup> selfe same booke de Ciuitate Dei the 12. chapter. For thus he writeth: Touching the Romanes, for that for honor, prayse, and glory sake, they studied to preserue theyr countrey, wherein they then can say, that God truly or properly rewardeth sinnes: wherefore it remaineth, that this rewarding be taken in that sence, that we before spake of: namely, that it followeth by the order of thinges appoynted of God: and that of them vpon whome it is bestowed it is counted as a reward and fruite of theyr labors. For this kinde of speech, the scripture also not selde vbleth of the scribes and hypocrites: the Lord sayd: Verily I say vnto you, they haue receaued theyr reward. And Paul touching them, which when they knewe God, worshipped him not as God: but being deliuered vp vnto filthy desires, polluted theyr bodies with ignominy and shame. They receaued in them selues (sayth he) theyr reward, as it was meete. And Ezechiel in his. 29. chapter sayth, That God would geue a reward vnto Nabucadnezzar, for that he had serued him in the ouertrowing of Tyre: and for a reward promised vnto him the spoyle and distruction of Egypt. And there is no doubt, but y the workes of hypocrites, which couloured theyr faces, that they mought seme vnto men to fast, and that the superstitious and detestable worshippings of idolaters, and those cruell factes, which Nabucadnezzar did, to satisfy his ambition, were sins, and that greuous sinnes. And yet we reade, that all these thinges had theyr reward. And, that God in appoyntinge of kingdomes had a respect vnto an other end, then to pay vnto those men a reward, euen Augustine playnly declareth in his. 5. booke de Ciuitate Dei, the. 12. chapter, which we before cited. For he sayth, that when as the empire was first in the East, God would that at the length the kingdom of the Romanes should be the chiefe to tame the wicked doinges of other nations. But many suspect, that by this doctrine is opened a window vnto many vices. For if the doings of ciuill men, whylest they seme to liue vertuously be sinnes, they maye easely be pulled away from those notable good workes. Hereunto I answer, that we teach not that ciuill discipline is to be neglected: for, it by the prouidence of God is as it were a certayne bond, wherby is preserved all ciuill fellowship. God can suffer cities, and commonweales, so long as in them flourisheth integrity of maners, and vertue and honestye: but when those thinges be utterly vitiated and corrupted, then is God so prouoked to wrath, that he will punish the those thinges, whiche he before had long tyme winched at. Men, so long as they are without Christ, sinne, yea when they do notable workes, but farre lesse, then if casting away all ciuill dueties, they utterly abandon themselves to all manner of sinnes. For we are not Stoikes, to thinke that all sinnes are lyke. Farther, if these men omitte to do those workes, which by the very light of nature they know to be honest, they strue against their own conscience. And if we will moze plainly see, whether sentence, namely, ours or our aduersaries, open a greater window vnto vices, let vs compare them together. Verily, they when they preache that wicked men may doe good workes able to please God, and by them to merite grace (as they speake) of congruetye, what thing els do they, then foster and nourish poore misers in their damnable estate: For they make those men to delight in themselves for such workes I know not what, and to hope, that at the last at the ende of their lyfe they shal for those workes sake, obtaine of God to be truly and earnestly converted. But in y meane tyme they liue securely, neither do they with a iust and true repentaunce turne away from their wicked factes. But we contrariwise when we daily admonish them to come vnto Christ, and by true repentaunce to be reconciled (for otherwise good workes will nothing profite them, when as though they be neuer so goodly to the shew, yet before God they are sins) do we not vse very sharpe spurs, that leuing impietye, and their corrupt kind of life, they should convert themselves vnto the righteousness of god. These thinges if thou diligently weigh thou shalt easily perceiue, whether of vs, moze make open the way vnto wicked lusses. This doubtles, may all they iudge, which are touched with any affect of truth truth and pietie. For besides that which we haue now said, they shall easily see, that all the good woꝝkes which are attributed vnto men not regenerate, are a derogacion and a robbery vnto the grace of God. For if without the grace of God, we maye perforce many thyngs which are acceptable and grateful vnto hym, it followeth that we are not wholly redeemed & renewed of him, which is so wicked, & so strange fro the catholike truth, & nothing can be deuised moze impudent, or moze wicked. For what piety is there remaining, wher Christ is robbed of his honour? What honoꝝ is left vnto Christ, if we teach y he hath not brought vnto vs all abilitie to liue vprightly? Some vaunt, that many thyngs happen and are done befoze regeneration, which are as certaine meanes to the obtaynement therof: and sayng oftentimes it cometh to passe, that by them we are iustified, they cannot be counted sinnes. We graunt in dede, that these are sometimes certayne meanes, wherby God bringeth vs to iustification: but therby is not proued that vnto them that do them they are not sinnes. And doubtles, as touchyng the nature of the woꝝkes themselves, vnto some they are occasiōs of greater destruction. For there are many, which by reason of such their woꝝkes, wonderfully passe by themselves, and haue a plesure in themselves, and pferre themselves befoze others, and beyng now full and satisfied with the opinion of themselves, although they be impelled and innited, yet they refuse to go any farther. In these men such woꝝkes are preparations to eternall death. But as touching the elect, God gouerneth and temperateth their woꝝkes, and maketh them to woꝝke together to saluation, although of their owne nature they are sinnes, and ought to be counted vicious, as long as the light of iustification shineth vpon the. Wherefoze we confesse y woꝝkes are certain preparations vnto a healthfull conuersiō, but yet to none, but vnto the predestinate, and vnto the elect, whom God sometyms by these woꝝkes leadeth to iustification, not that they of their owne nature haue this strength to prepare vnto iustification: for vnto the callawayes & reprobate, they serue vnto condemnation. But now let vs see, what those woꝝkes be, which our aduersaries so highly praise in men not regenerate. There is in them (say they) a certaine acknowledgement of sinne, therof springeth a terroꝝ, wherby they are debemently smitten: after that is stirred by a sorrow for the losse of the kingdome of heauen: and then they are moued with a lesse desire to wicked actes, and they take lesse pleasure in sinnes, and in the inticementes of the woꝝld. They seme also with some zeale to heare the woꝝd of God. How can these thinges (say they) be counted sinne? Although they are not (say they) of such efficacy, that a man can by them be conuerted, and forsake the olde state of his corruption. Here I would demaund of these men what maner knowledge of sinne that is, which is so bad, that in the meane tyme we pferre it befoze the righteousness of God. Merely, seing that it wanteth his true and proper ende, it cannot be but sinne. For to this ende is that knowledge appointed, that when we know sinne, we should forsake it, and embrace the righteousness of God. Which ende if it be away, the woꝝke is corrupted and made sinne. All moꝝall writers confesse this, that that action is sinne, which is depriued of his deu ende. Farther, what maner feare of hel fire is that, when as they daily throw themselves hedlong into it? And what sorrow is that for the losse of the kingdome of heauen, when they continually refuse it, beyng offred vnto the by the holy scriptures, and by the preachers? If they be moued with lesse desire to sinne, and if they take lesse pleasure in their sinnes, yet take they so much in them, that they cannot be plucked away from them. If with any zeale they heare the woꝝde of God, yet when they haue heard it, they haue it in derision, when as they hope that those things which are in it promised, shall happen vnto them leading their lyfe in such sort. Wherefoze we see that all these thinges stray from the marke and appoynted ende. And seing that al these motions are of small efficacy, and leaue men vnder the wrath of God, there can nothing that is sound be hoped for at their handes. But let vs heare what Esay in his 58. chapter pronounceth of this kinde of woꝝkes. They seek me (sayth he) daily, and wyll know my wayes, as a nation that wrought righteousnes

The aduersaries put away much of the grace of God.

Goodly woꝝkes are sometimes occasiōs of destruction.

The woꝝkes which are done befoze regeneration are sometimes preparation vnto it, but yet onely in the predestinate.

That knowledge of sinne which wanteth his proper ende is sinne.

The ende of the knowledge of sinne nes, and had not forsaken the statutes of theyr God. They aske me of the ordinaunces of iustice, and they wyll draw nere vnto God: Wherefore do we fast (say they) and thou seest it not, we haue afflicted our soules, and thou regardest it not? Behold in the day wherem ye fast, ye seeke that which ye desire, and ye all seeke and require your debtes. Beholde ye fast to stryfe & to debate, & to smyte wyth the fist. Is this the fast that I haue chose? These wordes of the Prophet most plainly declare, that it is sinne before God to enquire after his wayes, to fast, & for a man to afflict himself, when as such workes are done without the true worshipping of God, and without piety. It cannot be denied, but that these are in dede goodly workes and plausible: howbeit God the iust iudge reiecteth them. Augustine in his booke of confessions in himself setteth forth vnto vs a plaine example touching this matter. For he describeth the motions which he suffered in his minde before he was conuerted vnto Christ. For thus he writeth in his 8. booke and 11. chapter. I liued in my bond vntill the whole was broken in sinder, wherwyth although beyng very little I was holden, yet I was holden. Thou in my eyes (O Lord) dydst by thy seuere mercy double the scourges of feare & of shame. I sayd wyth my selfe inwardly, Behold, now let it be done. Now in a manner I knew it and dyd it not. And wythin a very little I euen nowe touched it, and held it, and touched it not, neyther helde it. And the worse, they beyng in custome, preyntled more in me, then the better thyng vnaccustomed. And that very moment of tyme, wherin I would become a new man, the nearer it approached, the greater horror it draue into me. I was holden back by trifies of trifies, & by vanities of vanities, & by myne old wanton louers, whiche priuely whispered, doost thou now forsake vs? And shall we neuer any more after this tyme be wyth thee? And from this tyme forward wyll thou neuer vse this or that? And I began now to harken vnto them a great deale lesse then halfe. These things mencioneth he, and accuseth them before God as sinnes: whiche yet are so highly commended of these men. These were in dede meanes wherby God brought Augustine vnto saluation: howbeit they were still in him sinnes. For he obeyed them not, but corrupted them with many abuses, so that he could not be with efficacy changed by them. But whatsoener wanteth his due perfection, is sinne. But these Sophisters are like serpents called Hydras: for one argument being as a hed cut of, there ariseth to them an other. They obiect vnto vs the Publicane, which thus prayed in the temple, God be mercifull vnto me a sinner. And he is said to haue returned to his house iustified. Wherfore say they, he was a sinner whē he prayed. For we read, y he was after ward iustified. But his prayer pleased God. Wherfore, we may (say they) do workes acceptable vnto God, euen before we be regenerate. But these mi should haue remembred that this Publicane prayed, which (as we haue declared of Cornelius) he could not haue done without faith. For how shall they call vpon hym in who they haue not beleued? Wherfore he was iustified, eue then when he prayed. Pether maist thou so vnderstand these wordes, as though he should be then first iustified whē he had finished his prayers. For although it be said, to be after ward done, yet doth it not therof follow, that it was by no meanes done before. He obteyned a more perfecter iustification, a more ampler spirit, a more nerer feelyng of the mercy of God. He calleth himselfe a sinner, and that not vnworthely: partly for that he still felt in himselfe that which he mistaked. For alwayes how iust so euer we be yet are we commaunded to pray, Forgiue vs our trespasses. And partly for that in minde he called to minde how greuous sinnes he had committed before he was iustified. And holy men ought in their prayers chiefly to weigh and to consider how great the burthen of their sinne is. For when with their prayers they come vnto God, they are moued with a true repentaunce to say with David: My bones are consumed away in my crying out: continually day and night is thy hand made heavy vpon me: my nyce is dried vp, as the moystnes of the earth is dried vp in the summer. Euils without number haue compassed me about. Myne iniquities haue closed me in on euery side, that I could not see: they are encreased more then the heares of my hed. My hart hath forsake me, I acknowledge my wicked actes, & my sinne is alwayes before me. Against thee, against thee haue I sinned, & don euil before thee. And to y end holy men should should afterward þ better beware of sinnes, God striceth by in the a most sharp feling of his wrath, þ they may acknowlege, what they had deserued, vnles God had holpe them by his sonne. He openeth also they eyes, that they may se, what his fatherly chastisement is to wardes them, and that the same maye be the better felt, he oftentimes differeth from them the tast and feeling of his mercy.

 Therefore they crye, Make me to beare thy ioye, and gladnes, that my bones being humbled may reioyce: hide thy face from my sinnes, and blot out all mine iniquities: A cleane barte create in me o God: and reneue a right spirit in my bowels: cast me not away from thy face: and take not away thine holy spirit from me. Wherefore they also that are iustified doo pray, that that infirmity which is still remayning be not imputed vnto them: They call to minde the thinges wherin they haue befoze greuously sinned: and they imploze some tast of the mercy of God, and of the righteousnes which is bestowed vpon them: And this is the very naturall meaninge of such godly prayers. Nether must we thinke, that þ publicane prayed any other wise: for he was not so minded, that he would still retaine his old purpose to sinne: but he was truly and from the hart couerted vnto God. But our aduersaries saie that they whiche still perseuer in they sinnes, nether haue in minde to change they life, do yet notwithstanding some good which pleaseth God. But we are taught by the holy scriptures, that he which beleueth in God hath eternal life, and therefore is iustified: but other thinges are nether good, nor yet please God.
 Wherefore seinge that the publicane prayed, and with sayth prayed, it is mosse certayne that he had eternall life, nether wanted he iustification. But to make al these thinges the moze plainly to be vnderstand, it shal not be fro þ purpose to declare what thinges are required vnto a good worke, to make it acceptable vnto God. First he which doth a good dede, must nedes be moued by þ spirit of God. for otherwise in vs, that is, in our flesh, dwelleth nothing that is good, and they which are led by the spirit of God, are doubtles the sonnes of God. Secondlye it behoueth, that sayth be present, whereby we may certaynly vnderstand, that that worke which we take in hand is of those kindes of thinges which God willeth, and by his law commaundeth to be done. For whatsoeuer is not of sayth is sin.
 Nether ought we so to handle the matter, that our hart should accuse vs in that thing which we doo. Thirdly, whatsoeuer we doo, must wholly be directed vnto the glory of God: that hereunto we chiefly and aboue all thinges haue a regard, that the prayse and glory of God be illustrated by our workes. Whither ye eate, or whither ye drinke, or what soeuer other thing ells ye do, doo all things to the glory of God, saith Paul. Fourthly forasmuch as by reason of the infirmity which is grafted in vs, there alwayes wanteth somewhat in our workes, yea even in those which seme to be most vprightly done, it is necessary that þ grace and mercy of God thorough Christe be wyth vs, whereby that defect or want maye be compensated.
 Wherefore Dauid sayth, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven. Blessed is the man vnto who the Lord imputeth not his sin. And Paul sayth, There is now cōdemnatiō to those which are in Christ Iesus. Again, That which was impossible vnto the Law, in as much as it was made weake thorough the flesh, God sending his sonne &c. These testimonies plainly declare, that both our workes want of perfection, and of they deuoend, and that also it cometh thorough Christ and the mercy of God, that that blame mingled with our workes is not imputed vnto vs. Lastly thys also is required, that no man glory of that which he vprightly doth, but in God only, and that he acknowlege that that which he doth, he hath of his goodnes, and not of hys owne strengths. For who hath seperated thee? sayth Paule to the Cor.
What hast thou, that thou hast not receaued? But if thou haste receaued it, why boastest thou as though thou haddest not receaued it? When all these thinges, whiche I haue reckoned, are obteyned, then the workes without all doubt shal be good and acceptable vnto God. The diligent reader may here out of these conditions of a good worke, gather the definition thereof. Contrariwise if we consider the nature of a man not yet regenerate, we shal easely perceauie that those conditions which

We haue sayd to be necessary vnto a good worke, can not be found in the. For he is utterly voyde of the spirite of God and of sayth: and is so infected with selfe loue, so y whatsoener he doth, he referreth it not vnto God, but vnto hys owne commodity. farther forasmuch as he is a stranger from Christ, it must nedes be that he is left vnder the Law. Wherefore whatsoener defect or fault is in his workes, which must nedes be much, the same can not by any meanes be compensated. Finally if he haue done peradventure any notable or goodly worke, he glorieth not in God, but in himselfe, for he is ignorant both of Christ and of the grace of God. By these two descriptions of a good worke, and acceptable vnto God, and of a man that liueth without Christ, I thinke it is now manifest, that those workes can not be good and acceptable vnto God, which procede from an infidel. But our aduersaries contend to wrest from vs two most strong places, which we vse for the confirmation of this matter. The first is, that we say that an euill tree can not bring forth good fruite. The second is, That whatsoener is not of sayth is sinne. Of whiche sentences we will in this place somewhat speake. That metaphore of the euill tree which can not bring forth good fruite, Christ vsed not only in the .7. chapter of Mathew, but also in the selfe same Mathew the 12. chapter. And thereof he inferred, Ye generation of vipers, howe can ye speake good things, when as ye are euill? But before I make open this cauillation, I thinke it good to declare how Augustine agaynst Julianus the Pelagian in his 4. booke and 3. chapter contendeth for this selfe same place. He setteth forth a goodly worke of a man being an infidel, namely, to clothe a naked man: and demaundeth whether this worke may be called sinne. Merely vnles this worke be of that kinde that pleaseth God, I se not what other workes infidells can doo, which can be acceptable vnto him. And Augustine contendeth and playnly proueth that it is sinne. And that lest he should seeme to speake this without reason, he sayth, that it is therefore sinne, for that he which doth that so godly a worke, glorieth of hys worke, for he doth not by sayth acknowledge ether God or Christ, nor thinketh that he hath receaued the same at his bandes. farther he sayth, that to auoyd the nature of sinne, it is not enough, that a good thinge be done, but also that it be well and vprightlye done. Shall we then say, that an infidell hath done a good worke, and wrought vprightlye? If we graunt not this, then must we confesse that he sinned: but if we graunt it, then must we confesse the fruite to be good, notwithstanding an infidell without Christ is an euill tree. So shall we graunt, that an euill tree can bring forth good fruite: which thing yet Christ expressly denieth. Now then our aduersaries are brought to y issue, y they now openly fight, not only agaynst vs, but also agaynst Christ: vnles peradventure they will say that an infidel, and an aleant from God, is a good tree. But if they confesse this, how do they deny that he pleaseth God? whē as vnto the good God, that which is good, can not be but acceptable. But he which pleaseth God, must nedes without all doubt haue sayth. For vnto the Hebrues it is written, without sayth it is impossible to please God. But these men by this they herely, wil obtrude vnto vs that whiche in that epistle is pronounced to be impossible. But a man say they, in that he is a man, is not an euill tree. But Augustine sayth, If thou consider only nature, then shall there be no where any euill tree. For both angel and man were created of God and receaued good natures. But these natures are not to be considered of vs, as they were made of God, but according to that condition which came afterward vnto the. A man hauing a good will, is called a good tree: and a man hauing an euill wil, is called an il tree. But after the fall of Adam, and the first ruine of our kind, we say that men are such that they are not moued by a good will, but by an euill. But to returne to the almes of an infidell whereof we began to speake, we may demaund, whether thys mercy, which is shewed, be done with sayth or saythles. And forasmuch as it is done without faith, it must nedes be faithles. Wherefore it can not be without vice and sinne. It is not enough for a man to be mercifull vnto his neighbour, vnles the same be also done saythfully and rightly. For mercy is not of it selfe good. For God hath disallowed many benefices bestowed vpon on our neighbours: as when the kinge of Israell spared the kinge of Siria, and Saul, Agag king of Amaleck. But sayth whiche woꝛkeþ thoꝛoughe loue is alwayes good, nether can at anye tyme be euill. But sozasmuch as mercie is not of y nature, therefore is it necessary y there be added an byꝛightnes wherby it may be done faithfully, that it may receaue commendation. They crye out that this naturall affection, to be mercifull, is good. Which thing peradventure we will not deny. But they ought to haue considered, that men not regenerate abuse this good thing, when as they direct it not vnto God, which is the only ende of all our actions. Neither doubtles doth he commit a light sinne, which peruerly abuseth so great a gift of God. Farther the same Augustine affirmeth, that whatsoeuer good thing can be noted in the woꝛke of an infidell, the same is wholly of God. Wherefoze, that our neighbour is holpen, and some order of nature kept, and ciuill honesty retained, it is not had by any other meanes, but at Gods hand only. But so farre soꝛth as it cometh from an infidell and a man corrupt, it is sinne, and displeaseth God. By these and such like reasons was Pelagius brought to that point, that he confessed, that these men thus by nature liuing honestly, are in deede good men, but yet barrenly oꝛ unfruitfully. Augustine here againe replieth against them, saying: Such is the nature of barren trees, that eether they bring forth no fruit at all, or els all fruit. But Pelagius still laboureth to wind himsele out, and sayth, that therfoze these men are to be called barren: soꝛ that although those thinges which they do, be good, yet helpe they nothing to the attainment of the kingdome of heaue. But in so saying he saith nothing, yea, he rather hindreth himsele. Doubtles the Scholemen of our time haue euen the like sentence: against which yet Augustine all that he may resisteth. Foꝛ he saith: By this meanes the Lord shall cut downe and cast into the fire a good tree bringing forth (as ye say) good fruit. What maner of iustice of God is this, which ye euerie where soeuer defend? Of this your sentence do follow many thinges fond and absurd. Thus much hether to out of Augustine. But our men boast, that they much differ from Pelagius. Foꝛ we put (say they) a certaine grace pꝛeuenting and knocking, whereby may in the hartes of men be included some good treasure, whereout they are able to woꝛke some good thing. Wherefoze they are not trees utterly dead: foꝛ after a soꝛt they bring foꝛth fruite. And although that which they bring foꝛth, can not budde foꝛth into flowers, and into good fruite, yet are they bowes and leaues whiche may come, and do come out of some sappe of y grace of God, whereof no not euen the aleantes from Chꝛiste are utterly destitute. But this selfe thing Pelagius also confessed. Foꝛ he abhorred not from the name of grace, when yet notwithstanding by that name (as Augustine notably discovereth him) he understood what he listed, rather then, what he ought, and a farre other thing, then that woꝛde signifyeth with the catholike wꝛiters in the Church of Chꝛist, oꝛ in the holy scriptures. But these men in their similitude haue very small consideration. Foꝛ they remember not that the Lord in the Gospell cursed the tree, which had only leaues without fruite, and commanded it to be cut downe and to be cast into the fire. But vnto the curse and vnto eternall fire nothing is obnoxious, but only sinne. But they haue yet another colour, whereby to auoyde this place. Foꝛ they say, that these trees in deede are euill: but not utterly dead: foꝛ in them is found some sappe of grace. Foꝛ they put in man a certaine grace, knocking and pꝛeuenting: whereby in the hartes of men not regenerate may be included some good treasure, whereout may spring some blossomes fro a ma not repenta. Foꝛ although they can not bring to perfection that which they bring foꝛth, oꝛ produce ripe fruite, oꝛ also flowers, yet at the least, they bring foꝛth bowes and leaues: which verily are a signe of some hidden grace and life. It is wonderfull to see, how these men delight themselves in this knocking and pꝛeuenting grace. Of which grace what is to be thought, we haue befoze declared. But they which speak and hold these thinges, are to so much without consideration. Foꝛ they consider not, that this their grace is nothing els, but a certayne trusting vnto Christ, but yet not of efficacy for men are left together with it vnder the wrath of God, neither are their hartes changed. What good treasure then can there be in them, whereout may budde forth workes acceptable vnto God? But, because we will not go from their similitude, for as much as they say, that they are plants which bring forth bowes and leaues, although they haue no fruite, they should haue remembred, that Christ (as we before said) accursed such trees: and when in the figge tree he had sought fruit, & found only leaues, he smote it with so a vehement curse, that it withered away. We doo not denie, but that of men may be done some moral and ciuil good thing, which is brought forth by that power of God, whereby all thinges are preserved. For, as the Ethnikes also confesse, In hym we lyue, are moued, and haue our being: But that power, whereby God governeth and moueth al thinges, nothing helpeth vnto eternall life men not regenerate. But the issue of our cause is, whether they which be aleants from Christ, can do any thing which is allowed and accepted of God. Which thing we deny, and they affirme. And how much the place which we haue brought of the euill tree which can bring forth no good fruite, maketh on our side, we haue sufficiently declared. Now let vs examine the other place, which our aduersaries go about to wrest from vs: namely, whatsoever is not of faith is sinne. This place Augustine alwayes in a manner objected vnto Pelagius. Pelagius made aunswere, that that is only a perticular reason, which was spoken only of meates: & so that cause ought not to be extended vnto other workes, and especially vnto the workes of infidels. We confesse in dede, that that question sprang first by reason of meates. But after what maner that reason is alleadged, let vs consider by the wordes of Paul. He whiche iudgeth (saith he) that is, whiche putteth doubt in ech part, and eateth, is condemned. This was to be proued. The reason which he gaue, was, for that it is not of faith. But because this saying is but particular, neither could that which he had spoken haue bene reduced to a Syllogismus, vnles there shoulde be added an vniuersall proposition, therefore he added, whatsoever is not of faith is sinne. By which sentence Pauls meaning is, that so often as we attempt any thing, we shoulde be thoroughly assured, that the same is pleasing vnto God, and is of him required by some commaundement of the law. Which certainty if it want, whatsoever we do (saith he) is sinne. And Pauls firms argument may thus be knit together. Whatsoever is not of faith is sinne: to cate meates prohibited in the lawe, with a doubtinge, whether the same be lawefull or no, is not of faith: wherefore it is sinne. The Apostle although he proueth a perticular proposition, yet he sleth an vniuersall reason. Which as it is applied vnto meates, so maye it also be applied vnto all other actions: so that all those actions what so euer they be, which want this faith, are sinnes. Wherefore nether we nor Augustine abuse that sentence, when we applie it vnto the workes of infidels. But now a dayes many cry out, that faith in this place signifieth a perswasion of the conscience: and that Paul had not a respect vnto that faith, which we say iustifieth vs. But these men take too large a scope, which bring in a new signification of faith without any testimony of the holy scriptures. Wherefore we moughte wel denie vnto them this. But for that although we graunt vnto them that which they would haue, yet are they still compelled to returne to our sentence, therefore therein we will not much contende with them. Be it so, as they would haue it. Suppose that faith be the conscience. But how ought the conscience to be perswaded of workes, to vnderstande whiche are good, and whiche are euill, Merelye if we seee godlye, we can haue no other rule, but the lawe of God. For, it is the rule, wherebye good and euill oughte to be iudged. Wherebence oughte to come the perswasion of our conscience, that by faith it vnderstand, that that worke which it taketh in hand is good, and contrariwise, that it is euill, if it be agaynst the lawe of God. And this is nothing els but that which we before spake of faith. Wherefore let vs leue these men, which when as they will be sene to speake thinges differing from vs, do butwares fall into one and the same sentence with

with vs. But we are here taught, that whatsoeuer we take in hand, we ought chiefly to see vnto, that we be assured of the will of God. And y<sup>e</sup> same thing taught Paul when he saide, Let vs trye, what is the good will of God. And as the same Paul writeth vnto y<sup>e</sup> Ephesiā, let vs not walke as vnt<sup>r</sup> kilsn<sup>r</sup>, which vnderstā not what is y<sup>e</sup> will of God. And y<sup>e</sup> thou shouldest not thinke (gētle reader) y<sup>e</sup> this interpretaciō is of our owne deuising, loke vpo<sup>n</sup> Origen, Primasius y<sup>e</sup> disciple of Augustine, & those commentaries which are ascribed vnto Jerome. And thou shalt finde that they are of the same iudgement when they interprete that place which we haue now alleaged. For they acknowledge no other faith, then that faith which all men acknowledge. But when we shall come to that place, we will declare what the rest of the fathers haue taught and held touching it. But now to come to the principal point of this controuersie, we thinke that we haue abundantly out of y<sup>e</sup> holy scriptures confirmed, That all the workes of infidels are sinnes. Of whiche sentence is not only Augustine against Julianus, but also Ambrose in his booke de uocatione gentium, the 3. chap. For he saith: That wythout the worshyping of the true God, the thynges that seeme to be vertues are sinnes. Basilus in his 2. booke de baptismo, the 7. chap. of purpose moueth this question, and maketh on our side. And he citeth places out of the scriptures. As out of Esay, A sinner when he sacrificeth, it is all one, as if he should offer vp a dogge: and when he offreth swete cakes, it is all one, as if he should offer vp swines flesh. And moreover, He which doth commit sinne, is the seruant of sinne, and serueth it onely. Againe, No man can serue two lordes, God and Mammon. And againe, What fellowship hath lyght wyth darkenes? God wyth Belial? Finally he citeth also that testimonye, whereof we before largely entreated, An euill tree can not bryng forth good frutes. Of all these testimonies he concludeth y<sup>e</sup> same thing which we teach. By these things I thinke it is now plaine, what is to be thought of the state of men not yet regenerate. First, they are free frō the seruitude of cōpulsion. Farther in morall and ciuill workes they are able to do many thinge by their free will: Finally, euen amongst sinnes they haue some choyce, and somtymes imbrace this sinne, and somtymes that sinne, as their will serueth them. But yet are they not so free, that they do those things which please God. They are also will they or nill they obnoxious vnto the miseries and calamities of this life. Now resteth to speake of the libertie of men regenerate. Which besides that it is not lesse, then that which we haue sayd is in wicked men, yet in this point it goeth beyond it, that it can attaine to good workes which are acceptable vnto God. For who knoweth not, but that that worke of Abraham wherin he was redy to sacrifice his sonne was most acceptable vnto God: For therfore was he highly commended euen by God himselfe. Paul to the Phil. calleth their almes sacrifices haupng a good sauoz. And vnto the Hebzees we are taught that God wonderfully delighteth in such sacrifices. And hereof it commeth that Paul admonisheth the Phil. with feare and with tremblyng to worke their owne saluation. But what nede we any other testimonies, when as the iudge himself in the last day shall recke by the good workes which godly men haue bestowed vpon the members of Christ. Wherfore seeing men regenerate are good trees, it is agreable, that they both can and do bryng forth good frutes. Although they which are so regenerate, ought neuer to forget, y<sup>e</sup> they haue not obtained this libertie by their owne merites, but by the benefite of God. For he hath made them a new, and in steede of a stony hart, hath geuen vnto them a fleshy hart. Finally, it came not of themselves, but of the heavenly father, that they should be drawen vnto Christ. For vnles they had bene by God the heavenly father with great efficacy perswaded inwardly in the minde, they would no lesse haue fled from Christ, then other men. Wherfore, in that first change or impressiō of the holy ghost our minde only suffreth, as they be to speake. But after y<sup>e</sup> we are once perswaded & changed, we are so restored, y<sup>e</sup> we are able to worke together wth the holy ghost & grace. And in what sorte this restoring of free will is, is to be considered by two principall pointes out of which we at the beginning, when we described the nature of will, declared commeth whatsoeuer error, and whatsoeuer

The commentaries ascribed vnto Jerome.

Of the libertie of men regenerate.

The godly may reach vnto those workes which please God.

The regenerate haue libertie by the benefite of God and not by their owne merites. We are in the first impressiō of the holy Ghost onely suffred. After regeneration we worke together with the holy ghost. Definition of sinne.

ner sinne is in election or choice: namely, for that when we deliberate touching any matter, either we are utterly ignoraunt what is iust and what is vniust: or els for that, though we see what is iust or vniust, yet lust and perturbation enter, mingleth it selfe: which by their great force cause vs to preferre the weaker reasons before sure and firme reasons. Wherefore, the knowledge of that which is by right cannot take place. For the violence of the affections, and the whole bent of the minde is fixed vpon those reasons which serue for pleasures and lust. And the stronger and honest arguments are not considered: and therefore they burst not forth into effect. But by the benefite of regeneration both these discommodities are holpen. For, as touching the first, the light of sayth is present, which by adding the rule of the law of God, manifestly in the practising of things vnderstandeth, what things are iust and vniust. Farther although all prauity or corruption of the affections be not utterly taken away, yet by the power of the holy ghost is it so broken & weakened, that it is not able to hinder the byright election or choise as it was before able. Nowbeit for that this lust, so long as we liue here, can not utterly be consumed, therof it cometh by this libertie to do such things which please God, which is geue vnto the godly, is not perfect or absolute, but weake & mayned, & is in that sort set forth in the holy scriptures. For holy men are by many wayes exceedingly letted, & they can not as they would, and as the law requireth, exercise these works, which are acceptable vnto God. For alwayes they fele a law in their members, which resisteth the law of the minde, and will they, or nill they, they are led away captiues into the law of sin. For as vnto the Galathians it is written: The flesh so lusteth against the spirite, that they do not the things which they would. And we haue heard

By the benefite of regeneration both the vnderstanding and also the appetite is holpen.

The libertie also of the godly is vnperfecte.

We are not by the imperfection of our libertie letted but that we worke together with God. The regenerate are called the me of God, and not simple or bare men,

Of the libertie which we shall haue in our country.

Lust and corrupt motions which remaine in the regenerate whether they be sins

Paul complain, that he did not that good which he earnestly desired, but rather that euill which he hated. Godly men in mind in dede serue the law of God, but in flesh the law of sinne. In whom yet this is a notable gift of God, that they exceedingly be waile and lament these impediments: so that although they doubt not but that they haue the first frutes of the spirit, yet they grone, and feruently desire a perfect restoring. Where happen moreover vnto them daily falles, which admonish vs how weake this our libertie is. Wherefore John saith: If we say we haue no sinne, we deceiue our selues, and the truth is not in vs. James also saith: We all offende in manye things. And the Lord hath taught vs in our daily prayer to cry vnto the Father, Forgiue vnto vs our trespasses. Nowbeit we are not by this imperfection of libertie letted, but that we worke together with God, and frame our selues as apte instruments vnto the holy ghost. Wherefore Paul admonished Timothie, to stirre vp the grace which he had in hym. And in the first epistle to the Corinthyans, he admonisheth them to apply the selues to the free gifts of God, and that to the more excellent: as though their diligence were required, to be able to vse rather this gyft of the spirite, then that. But those which are sayd to haue these things, are not simple and bare men: but forasmuch as they haue the grace and spirite of God, they are now called the men of God. And because they are the men of God, they are also called perfect, and instructed vnto every good worke. Wherefore we confesse that men regenerate in Christ, haue all that libertie which we graunt vnto the vngodly, and moreover they are also able to do works which are acceptable vnto God: although they be not free neither from sinne, nor from the calamities and miseries of this lyfe. Now should I also speake of the fourth state of man. But touching it we may in one word answer: That forasmuch as in heauen we shall haue most chiefe felicity, no kinde of libertie can there be wantyng: vnles a man will call that a libertie, to be able to sinne and to fall away from God, that is from the chief good thyng: but because that that libertie which there we shall haue, is a most singular libertie, therefore our hope is that in our countrey we shall be most free. But now resteth an other question to be entreated of: namely, whether this lust & those corrupt motions which remaine in the regenerate, are sins, & ought so to be called? These things are called of Paul, the law of sinne, & the law of the members. And that these remaine in holy men after regeneration, he teacheth vs by the exaple of him himself. But whether they be sinnes or no, cannot rightly be defined, vnles we first vnderstand what sinne is. Augustine saith: that sinne is, whatsoever is spoken, done, or lusted against the Law of God. But whether this definitiō belong vnto al sinns, or vnto those only, which are comonly called actual, it is vncerten, by reaso of y<sup>e</sup> ambiguity of this word, lusted. For if it be referred vnto y<sup>e</sup> full assent of the will, whereby we assent vnto corrupt desires, thē is y<sup>e</sup> definitiō contracted to actual sinns. But if this word Lusted, be so largely & amply take, as is that last p<sup>r</sup>cept, Thou shalt not lust, then may the definition be vniuersall, and comprehend all maner of sinnes. The master of the Sentences in his .2. booke and 35. distinction cited that definition, when he had now largely entreated of originall sinne, and had begonne to serch out the nature of other sinnes. Wherefore it seemeth, that he thought, that that definition pertaineth only to actual sinnes. But howsoever it be touching thys matter we will not muche contend. Ambrose in his booke de Paradiso in the .8. chapter, setteth forth doubtles a most large definition of sinne. Sinne (saith he) is nothing ells, but the transgression of the Law of God, and disobedience of the beauenly commaundementes. But leauing the sentences of the fathers, the matter is to be called to the trial of the scripture, that out of them we maye certaynly knowe what sinne is. Iohn in his first epistle and 3. chapter. Sinne (saith he) is avopia, that is iniquity. That Greke word is coposed of the particle priuatiue & that is, with out, and of this worde νόμος, that is a Law. Here the nature of sinne is excellently well declared. For it is sayd to be a priuation, whereby is taken away from it the good thing which it ought to haue. If thou enquire, what that good thinge is, which by sinne is taken away, this Greke word νόμος expresth it. For, that good thing is taken away, which is prescribed in the Law of God. Wherefore we may say that sinne is, whatsoever is repugnant vnto the Law of God. Now let vs se, whether this definition taken out of the holy scriptures be agreeable vnto that p<sup>r</sup>auity which remaineth in the saintes after regeneratiō. Which thinge we affirm, but our aduersaries deny: but the holy scripture is without al doubt one our side. For Paul expresthly sayth, that the Law of the members warreth agaynst the law of God, and of the minde: and that the wisdōe of the flesh is enmity against God, so that it is not subiect vnto the law of God, yea nether can be subiect. And it better ly str<sup>r</sup>ueth agaynst the first and the grettest commaundement, Thou shalt loue the Lord thy God with all thy soule, with all thine hart, & with all thy strength. For if all our strenghts and powers, should as it is mete, geue place vnto God: this lust thē should neuer haue any abiding in vs. Farther the selfe same lust partly also str<sup>r</sup>ueth agaynst the last p<sup>r</sup>cept, Thou shalt not lust. And Augustine as we haue before in mo places then one cited him, affirmeth, that these two commaundements can not so long as we liue here, be fully obserued of vs. But why they were geuen, when as they can not be kept, he bringeth very firme reasons which here to repete is not needefull. We haue declared by the definition of sinne, that this lust whereof we speake, is sinne. Nowe let vs consider other argumentes. One is taken of the institucion of man. For man was made vnto the image and similitude of God: And we are predestinate to be made like vnto the image of the sonne of God. And we are commaunded to put on a new man. Which as Paul sayth to the Colossians in the 3. chapter, is renewed to the knowledge and image of hym, which created him, & which new mā (as it is w<sup>r</sup>itten in the epistle vnto the Ephe sians) consisteth in righteousnes and in holines of truth. And the image of God which we are commaunded to put on, hereth consisteth (as Tertullian sayth) that we haue one and the selfe same motions, and feelings with God. And Paul to the Phillippians exhorteth vs, to be of one and the same minde with Christ. But these motions and lusts doo moeste filthilye corrupt and blot the image of God in vs. Farther, that which we ought to crucifye, to mortifye, and to put of, must of necessity be sin. For if they were good, the holygost would rather haue admonished vs, to nourishe and to maintayne them. And Paul to the Colossians sayth, Mortifye your members which are vpon the earth. And to the Galathians,

A Commentarie vpon the

*They which are of Christ, haue crucified theyr flesh with the lusts thereof. And in another place, Put of (sayth he) the old man. And if these motions do so displease God, it cā not be for any other cause, but for that they are sinnes. For God is so good, that nothing displeaseth him but only sinne. Last of al, vnto sinne is death deuyd, as a reward. Wherefore death can haue no place, where no sinne is. For this preeminence had the Sonne of God only, to dye an innocent. For he died for our sinnes. But we therefore dye, because we are not without sinne. And if it be so, then let vs see what our aduersaries can alledge, why infantes now regenerate in Christ doo dye. For they haue no actual sinnes: and the guiltines of original sinne is taken away. Only there remaineth lust, and corruption of nature, not wholly amended, and corrupt motions, which Augustine in his 11. booke of Confessions sayth, are found in infantes: and he both confesseth and accuseth them as sinnes. And therefore for them, for that they are sinnes, they are not vniuersally subiect vnto death. Wherefore seeing it is by most firme reasons proued, that the wicked lusts which remaine in vs after baptisme are sinnes, now remaineth to see, to what kind or part of sinnes they belong. Sinne may thus be deuided, that there is some kind of sinne which may be forgiven, and other some, whiche can not. That transgression agaynst the Lawe of God which is neuer forgiven, is sinne agaynst the holy ghost. But if the sinne may be forgiven, that may be two manner of wayes. For, eyther it is so forgiven, that we muste of necessity utterly depart from it, which we see to come to passe in fore and greuous sinnes, which (Paul sayth) seperate vs from the kingdome of God, and are commonly called deadly sinnes. Or els they are so forgiven, that we depart not from them, partly by reason of the ignorance that is grafted in vs, and partly by reason of the infirmity wherewith we are infected. And these are called smal, and eniall sinnes: without whiche no man can here lede his life. Paul as we haue before declared hath betwene these sinnes put a notable difference: when he exhorted vs, not to suffer sinne to raigne in vs. And of this third kinde of sins the same Apostle complayned, when he sayd, Unhappy man that I am, who shall deliuer me from the body of this death? And of these sinnes doo we meane when we teach, that the workes of men though they be neuer so holpe are not without deadly sinne: for that we doo nothing without this kinde of defects. And those defects are called deadly, for that of theyr owne nature they deserue death: For the stipend of sinne is death. Farther also, for that so long as we cary aboute with vs these spottes of corruption, we can not haue the fruition of eternall life. For so longe are we excludet from it, untill by death wee haue putte of all corruption. Moreover it is written, Cursed be euery one whiche abideth not in all the thinges which are written in the wordes of this Law. And he whiche complayneth with Paul, that he doth not the good whiche he would, perforce not all the thinges which the Law requireth, neither is utterly free from the curse, although the same though the mercy of God be not imputed vnto him, vnto eternal destruction. And we doo so speake of the good workes of the sayntes, not that we either deny good workes, or that we thinke not that the good workes which are done of the regenerate are pleasing vnto God, but to make vs to acknowledge our uncleannes, and impurenes, to the vnderstanding whereof we are blockish, and more then blinde. Wherefore putting apart sinne agaynst the holy ghost, other sins are deuided into three degrees: first, is y lust which is grafted in vs: secondly, out of it spring continually the first motions and impulsions vnto sundry kinde of wicked actes: Thirdly, cometh the consēt of the will, and brinseth forth into act. Paul did before set forth these three degrees whē he sayd, Let not sin raigne in your mortall body, that we should obey the lusts thereof. The sinne whereunto we ought not to permitte the rule or dominion, is lust grafted in vs, and perversity of nature. The first motions are the lusts which it bringeth forth, and we are admonished not to obey them. Then addeth he thereunto obedience which* consummateth and maketh the sinne perfect: which is commonly called actuall sinne. It is not to be doubted but that the p[er]uerty of nature p[er]tayne to origi[n]all sinne. Agayne that sinne whereunto cometh the consent of the will they call actuall. But there is a doubt touchinge these first motions (by meanes of which yet thorough Christ we are not obnoxious vnto a new guiltines and bond of the iudgement of God) whether they be to be referred vnto originall sinne, or to actuall sinne. Undoubtedlye they are betwene both, and of eche part take somewhat. For so farre forth as we by them worke, couet or desire anye thyng, they haue some consideration of actuall sinne. And Paul vseth these wordes ποίειν, and πράσσειν, which without al doubt signify some action. On the other side for that we against our will suffer this kinde of motion, therefore therein they communicate with originall sinne. For, that sinne is not taken by election and of our owne accord. Ierome vpon the 7. chapter of Mathew maketh a distinction betwene παρά, and προπαρὰ: παρά, he saith signifieth the first motions, after that the consent of the will is now come vnto them. προπαρὰ, is, when they first moue and stirre vp at the beginning. And he addeth, that although they be in faults, yet are they not counted for great faultes, and yet is the passion to be counted for a sinne. Here is to be noted, that Ierome confesseth that the first motions haue the blame of sinne, although they be not counted for crimes, that is, although by the benefite of Christ they are not imputed vnto the death: or els, although in mans iudgement they be not counted for a crime. And sinne is againe deuised into that which is only sinne, and also into that which is both sinne, and also the paine of sinne. Of which distinction Augustine maketh mencion vpon the 5. Psalme. For he sayth, that the first falling away from God is sinne only: but those sinnes which follow are both sinnes and also punishmentes of sinnes, vntill they draw vs vnto hell fire. Wherefore whatsoener euils are committed betwene the first falling away, & hell fire, the same are both sinnes, and also punishmentes taken for other sinnes. Which thing Paul to the Romanes hath very well declared. For first he saith, that the Ethnikes in dede knew God, but they glorified him not as God. And therefore he addeth, that they were deliuered vp into wicked desires, being full of all malice, couetousnes, &c. And at the last he maketh mencion of the condemnation to hell fire, saying, but thou accordyng to thyne hardnes and vnrepentant harte heapest up vnto thy selfe wrath in the day of wrath, and of the reuelatiō of the iust iudgement of God, wherein he shall render vnto euery man accordyng to hys workes. But there are many which thinke not that these sinnes are punishmentes, of sinnes: for that men do of them take no small pleasure. But they, vnles they were blind, mought easely vnderstand by the Apostle, that they are punishmentes and such in dede which are most grēuous. For he saith that their hart was blinded, and that they were made folles, although they boasted that they were wise men: and y they were deliuered vp of God into a reprobate s[er]ce, to defile their bodyes with ignominy. What are all these but most grēuous punishmentes? If when a man hath committed theft, straightway ether his handes should fall away, or els hys eyes should be plucked out, we would say that he is grēuously punished of God. Paul sayth that these mē were depriued of their minde, that their hart was made foolish, and that they most ignominiously contaminated their owne bodies: and shall not these seeme to be punishmentes? How can we thinke that our minde can be safe, whole, and vncorrupt, if sinne raigne in it? Salomon saith, Can a man nourishe fire in hys bosome, and not burne hys garmentes? Or can a man go vpon hot burning coales, and not burne hys feete? And therefore sinne is called a punishment, for that it hurteth and corrupteth nature. For, the p[er]uerty of originall sinne hath so corrupted nature, that now it can scarcely seeme to be halfe on liue. And the corrupt motions, and violent rages, which spring out of that p[er]uerty. do, vnlesse they be kept vnder, and mortified, make it more fierce. Finally if thou consent vnto them, they are continually made of more & more force: so that nature alwayes becommeth worse and worse. All these thynges hereto tend to geue vs to vnder-

stand, that lust grafted in vs, and corrupt motions, which are still remaining in our mindes, belong to this kinde of sinnes: but yet in such sort, that they are punishments of an other sin going before: namely, of originall sin, if it be not also a punishment of an other more greivous sinne. Howbeit this yet is to be noted, that the first fall also is in such sort, that it is also a punishment. For as we have said, there is no sinne, which doth not most greivously hurt the nature of man: and so at the least it hath ioyned with it a punishment of it selfe. But not every sinne is a punishment of an other sinne going before. But those wherof we now entreat, we affirme to be punishments of sinnes going before: and we say also, that they are sinnes. But unto some it seemeth wonderfull, that these things are of necessity, how they can be sinnes. But touching this matter, let vs heare what Augustine saith in his 3. booke de libero Arbitrio, the 18. chapter. Some things also (saith he) done of necessity, are not to be allowed: as when a man would do well and can not: For otherwyse what should moue these wordes: The good that I would, I do not, but the euill that I would not, that I do. And this, to will is present wyth me, but to performe the good, I find no ability. And thys: The fleshe lusteth against the spirite, and the spirite against the fleshe. For these thynges are repugnant the one to the other, so that ye do not the thyngs which ye would. But all these thynges are pertayning to men and come of that damnation of death. For if they be not a punishment of man, but nature in man, then are they no sins. For if men depart not from that state wherein man was naturally made, so that he could not be better, then when he doth these thynges he doth the thinges which he ought. But if man were good, it should be otherwise, but now for that it is so, he is not good, neither lieth it in hys own power to be good: ether for that he seeth not what maner one he ought to be: or els for that, although he see, yet is he not able to be such a one, as he seeth he ought to be. And that thys is a punishment, who can doubt? This much Augustine. In which wordes many things are worthy to be noted. First, he confesseth that many things which happen of necessity, are not to be allowed. Secondly, he geneth a reason why they are called sinnes: for that we depart from that state wherein we were naturally made. Thirdly, he sayth, that man is not good, neither hath in his owne power to be good. Fourthly, why he can not be good, he bringeth two reasons: ether for y<sup>e</sup> he saith not, what is to be done: or for y<sup>e</sup> though he see it, yet by reason of his infirmity he is not able to performe it. Lastly, this is to be noted, that he vnderstandeth these things of men regenerate. For he citeth the wordes of Paul to the Galathians, and those places, which we now haue alleaged, which we haue proued can not be vnderstand but of the regenerate. But unto this sentence of Augustine, that seemeth to be repugnant, which Ierome writeth in his interpretation of saith: We say (saith he) that they er, which together wyth the Maniches say, that a man can not eschew euill. But these things may without any difficulty be conciliated. For Ierome speaketh of nature as it was instituted of God: for he writeth against the Maniches, which taught, that therefore we can not resist sin, for that we were by nature created euill of an euill, God. But there is none of vs which doubteth, but that man, when he was at the beginning created, was most free. But, that Augustine speaketh of nature after the fall, hereby it is manifest, in that he saith: All these thynges pertayne to men, and come from that damnation of death: moreover he confesseth, that this is a punishment of man now fallen away. Farther if these things be referred vnto the regenerate, we may say, that the sentence of Ierome hath a respect only to the grosse kindes of sinnes, which separate vs from the kingdome of God, from which we doubt not but that men regenerate in Christ may abstaine. But Augustine speaketh most largely: and by sins vnderstandeth these things also, wherof we presently speake, & without which we can not here leade our life. And this latter solution is noted of y<sup>e</sup> master of y<sup>e</sup> sc<sup>ti</sup>ces in his 2. booke & 36. distinctio. But they object vnto vs, that we do iniury vnto baptisme, if we say that in it is not take away sinne. But we can not iustly be accused of this crime. For we affirme that by regeneration is take away the guiltines of sinnes. For although these vices remayne, both as the scripture testifieth, eth, and also as experience teacheth, yet their bond and guiltines is taken away. Wherfoze Augustine oftentimes saith, that lust in dede remayneth, but the guiltines therof is by Christ take away. And he addeth, that sometimes it cometh to pas, that the act and worke of sinne passeth away, as we see it is in theft, and in adultery, but the guiltines not withstanding abideth: and sometymes it cometh to passe, that the guiltines is take away, but the fault remayneth. Which is plaine to be sene touching this lust wherof we speake. It remayneth in dede, but yet we cannot by it be as guilty condemned to eternall death. If thou demaund why it is called sinne, when as the guiltines is taken away? I aunswer, bicause in that it is not imputed vnto vs, it hath not that of his owne nature: for, as touching his owne nature, as we haue before taught, it deserueth death and damnation: but this cometh by an other meanes: namely, of the mercy of God through Christ. But euery thing ought to be considered by it selfe, and of his owne nature. Wherfoze, seying the proper nature of sinne is, to strue against the law of God, and this thing we see to come to passe in this lust, and in these first motions, therfoze they ought to be called sinnes. Neither by this our sentence do we fall into that foolishnes, which the Pelagians vphayned vnto Augustine and to other of the catholikes, as though they should say, that by regeneration is not blotted out sinne, but only raised. For when heares are shauen, there remaine still vnder the skinne the rootes of the heares, by which they grow vp againe. For although we affirme, that in men regenerate remaine still lust & corrupt motions, yet do we not deny, but that God is perfectly reconciled vnto vs. Wherfoze, although of their owne nature they are sinnes, yet by the mercy of God they are so blotted out, that they now utterly cease to be imputed: wherfoze, if we haue a respect vnto imputation, there remayneth nothing of them. Last of al they object vnto vs, that we do iniury vnto Augustine when we say that he affirmeth these to be sinnes, when as he interpreteth himself, that they are called sinnes improperly. For as a scripture or writing is called a hand, for that it is done with the hand, so that these called sinnes, for that they come from original sinne: and as cold is called slouthfull, for that it maketh vs slouthfull, so are these called sinnes, for that they stirre vs vp to sinnes: but yet properly they are not sinnes. So (say they) Augustine by this meanes doth not only interpretate himselfe, why he calleth these, sinnes, but also hath geuen vnto vs a way how we ought to vnderstand Paul, when he calleth these, sinnes. Hereunto we aunswer: first, that if either Augustine or any other of the fathers do deny that these are sinnes, that is to be vnderstand by way of comparison, if they be compared with actual sinnes: but not that the nature of sinne can wholly be taken away from them. Which thing Augustine in another place most plainly declareth. For against Julianus in his 6. booke & 8. chap. For it is not (sayth he) no iniquity when in one man, eyther the superiour partes are after a vile maner seruantes vnto the inferiour partes, or the inferiour partes after a vile maner resist the superiour partes, although they be not suffered to get the mastery. Seying that he calleth this sinne iniquitie, he plainly declareth, that vnto it is agreable the nature of sinne, which we before described. And in his 5. booke agaynst the same Julianus the third chapter, he thus writeth: The luste of the fleshe, agaynst which the good spirite lusteth, is sinne: for that in it is a disobedience agaynst the gouernment of the mind: and it is a punishment of sinne, for that it is rendred vnto the merites of the disobedient person, and it is a cause of sinne thorough the falling away of hym that sinneth. Here we see that lust is of Augustine thre maner of wayes called sinne. Neither can it be sayd, that he writeth these thinges of a man not regenerate: For he expessedly saith: Agaynst which the good spirite lusteth. For in the wicked is not the spirite of God, which strueth agaynst lustes. Wherfoze we haue out of Augustine thre places (one which we before cited out of his 5. booke de libero Arbitrio, and two agaynst Julianus) wherein he expessedly confesseth that lust is sinne, and byingeth a reason why he so thinketh. Neither oughte our aduersaries as touchynge the interpretation of Paul, to runne vnto a figure, to say that this is not properly to be called sinne. For, both out of Paul and out of other places of the scripture, is brought good reason, why lust is truly and properly called sinne. And it is to be considered at, that these men otherwise are euery where so prone to figures, when as in this one proposition, This is my body, they so much abhorre from al kind of figures, when as yet notwithstanding a figure is there most conuenient. And if thou desire other testimonies of the fathers, wherby to proue that lust is sinne, we haue before cited Jerome vpon Mathew. And there are in Augustine against Julianus found cited a great many other sentences of the auncient fathers. All which make wholly on our side. But now let vs come to the exposition of the 8. chapter.

The eight Chapter.

Inasmuch as now we there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, which walke not after y<sup>e</sup> flesh, but after the spirite. For the lawe of the spirite of lyfe which is in Christ Jesus, hath made me fre fro the law of sinne and of death.

The Method of this chapt.

For as much as in this chapter, are entreated many notable things, it shall not be amisse to deuide the samme of them into the partes thereof. Firste Paul remoueth away condemnation, which he sayth is taken away by the Lawe of the spirite of life: which spirite we haue obteyned by the benefite of the death of Christ. And this liberty promisseth he not indifferentlye vnto all men, but only vnto those whiche are in Christe, and walke not accordinge vnto the flesh, but according to the spirite. For they which seporate them selues from Christ, can not be partakers of his benefite. The he addeth, that we by this spirit are partakers, not only of the death of the Lord, but of his resurrexion also: for soasmuch as Christ was by it rayled vp from the dead, as many as are endewed with the same spirite, shall likewise be rayled vp from the dead. For that cause he exhorteth vs, by the spirite to mortefye the deades of the flesh, that we may be made partakers of enerlaſting life. Thirdly, he amplifieth and adorneth this state and condition, which by the spirite of Christ we haue obteyned: namely, that now we are by adoption made the children of God, that we are moued by this spirit, and made strong against aduersities, & to suffer all afflictions. Which prayles serue not a little to quicken our desire, that we should desire to be dayly more abundantly enriched with this spirite. Fourthly he confuteth those, which objected that state to some miserable and unhappy, in which the saythfull of Christ liue. For they are continually exercised with aduersities, so that euen they also which haue the first frutes of the spirite are compelled to mourne. And he willeth that by this meanes these thinges come to passe, for that as yet we haue not obteyned an absolute regeneration nor perfect saluatio: for we haue it now but only in hope, which when time shall serue, that is, in the end of the worlde, shall be made perfect. Fifthly, he teacheth, that notwithstanding those euills, which doo enclose vs in on euerye side, yet our saluation is neuertheless sure: for the prouidence of God, whereby we are predestinate to eternall felicity can nether be chaunged, nor yet in any poynte fayle. And by this prouidence, sayth he, it cometh to passe, that vnto vs which loue God all thinges turne to good, and nothing can hurt vs, soasmuch as God hath geuen vnto vs his sonne and together with hym all thinges: wherefore seing the father iustifieth vs, and the sonne maketh intercession for vs, there is nothing, which can make vs afraid. Lastly, he sayth, that y<sup>e</sup> loue of God towards vs is so greate, that by no creature it can be plucked from vs. Hereby it is manifest, of how greate force the spirite of adoption is, wherewith we are sealed, so long as we wayte for the perfection of our felicity. And these thinges serue wonderfully to proue, that our iustification consisteth not of workes, but of fayth, and of the meare and free mercy of God. This is the summe of al that which is contained in the doctrine of this chap.

As touching the first part, the Apostle alledgeth that condemnation is now take away: which he proueth, because we are enswelmed with the spirite of Christe. But this deliuey he promisseth vnto those only, which are in Christ. Wherefore seeing it is manifest what his proposition or entent is, now let vs see, howe these thinges hange together with those, which are already spoken. Toward the end of the former chap: Paul cried out twise: first, when he sayd: Unhappy man that I am, who shall deliuer me from the body of this death? And by the figure Apoliopelis he exprested not the deliuerer: but here he sayth, that that deliuerer is, the Lawe of the spirite and of life. Farther in that place with greate affection he sayd: I geue thanks vnto God through Iesus Christe our lordes: nether declared he, wherefore he gane thanks. But now he playnly expresteth the cause. For he sayth, that now there remaineth no condemnation, and that we are deliuered from the Lawe of sinne and of death. This is it for which he gane thanks. Lastly he added, how that in minde he serued the law of God, but in flesh the law of sinne. Now he moze playnly expresteth what that is: namely, to be in Christ, and not to walke according to the flesh, but according to the spirite. Hereby it manifestly appeareth, how aptly these thinges are knit together with those which are already spoken.

The law of the spirite and the deliuerer

Thanks

The Apostle seemeth thus to speake: Although the sinne and the corruption of nature, where with the godlye are vexed, be (as it is already sayde) still remaininge in them, yet is there no danger, that it shoulde bringe condemnation vnto men regenerate: for they are holpen by the spirite of Christe, wherewith they are now enswelmed. And euen as befoze he abundantly entreated of the violence and tyranny of sinne, which it useth against vs being vnwittinge and vnwilling thereunto: so now on the other side he teacheth, what the spirite of Christ worketh in the Saintes. Wherefore seeing not only the holy scriptures, but also the Ethnike writers do exprestly commaund, that euery man shoulde knowe himselfe, peraduenture there is scarce any other place, out of whiche the same may better be gathered, then out of these two chapters. For a godly man consisteth of his owne corrupt and vitiate nature, and also of the spirite of Christ: & because we haue befoze learned, what the corruptiō of nature, that is, sinne, worketh in vs, and now is declared, what benefites of Christ we obtayne by his spirite: by this may euery man as touching ether part knowe himselfe. Vndoubtedly wonderfull great is the wisdom of the Apostle: who when he wrote of the force of sin: exprested it chiefly in his owne person: to geue vs to vnderstand, that there is no man so holy, which so long eas he liueth here, is cleane ridde from sinne. But afterward when he entreateth of the helpe of the spirite of Christ, he bringeth in the person of other men, least any man shoulde thinke with himselfe, that not of all manner of Christians enioye this excellent helpe of God, but onely certaine principall and excellent men, such as were the Apostles. After these thinges which we haue befoze heard out of the seventh chapter: a man mought haue sayd, forasmuch as we are so led away captiue of sinne, and that by force and against our willes, what hope can there be of our saluation? Much, saith Paul.

What
thinges as capable to know our selues.

A godly man consisteth
of two princi ples.

Why Paul
chaungeth
the persons in these two descriptions.

Forasmuch as now there is no condēnation to the which are in Christ. For by the spirite of Christ we are deliuered from the lawe of sinne and of death. This reason is taken of the cause efficient, whereby is not only proued that which was proposed, but also euen the very carnell and inward pithe of our iustification is touched. For although men being now iustified are so restored vnto the giftes of God, that they begin to liue holily, and do accomplishe some certayne obedience begonne of the lawe, yet, because in the iudgement of God they can not stay vpon them, forasmuch as they are vnperfect, and are not without fault, of necessity it followeth, that our iustification shoulde herein consist, namely, to haue our sinnes forgiven vs, that is, to be deliuered from the guiltines of them. And this is it which Paul here writeth:

Wherein
iustification.

He hath deliuered me from the right of sinne and of death:] That is, from the guiltines, or bond, whereby we were bound vnto sinne, and vnto eternall death. And when this bond is taken away, there then remaineth nothing, why
we

we should feare condemnation. But forasmuch as that is said to happen through the spirit of Christ, it manifestly appeareth, that men are not iustified by woꝝkes. For woꝝkes follow the spirit, and are saide to be the frutes thereof. And this deliueꝝ pertaineth only vnto them which are in Christ: that we may vnderstand that all they are excluded, which boast of faith and of the Gospell, & yet in the meane tyme do walowe in most grosse sinnes, and are straungers from Christ: and whereas they committe many thinges against their conscience, yet are they not touched with any repentaunce. This which is added, which walke not according to the flesh, but according to the spirit, expoundeth y<sup>e</sup> which was before saide, To be in Christ. And that we may the better vnderstand that it is all one, we must repeate that whiche the Apostle a litle before wrote, Let not sinne raigne in your mortall body: that this, although ye be stirred by these lustes, yet ye ought not to permitte vnto the dominion of your minde. And that which the Apostle in this place declareth, bringeth with it a great consolation. They which are shut vp fast in prison, and do know themselves to be guilty, do looke for nothing els but sentence of death, now if to them pardon and forgiveness should be offered they not looking for it, they can not but exceedingly be glade and reioyce. So we, when we see that damnation is due vnto vs for our sinnes, can not but exceedingly reioyce at these tidings, when we heare out of the holy scriptures, that all thinges are freely forgiven vs for Christes sake. Wherefore if we desire to haue the fruition of this so great a benefite, it is necessary, that we belue the pardon which is offered vnto vs. For this liberalitie of God wyl not hyngge profite vs without faythe. Although by that whiche we haue nowe spoken, I doubt not, but that men may vnderstande, what the meaninge of Paul is, yet are there slower thynges, whiche shall not be vnprofitable more diligently to examyne. First: what that is wherby we are deliuered. Secondly from what kind of euill we are deliuered. Thirdly, what maner of thing this deliueꝝ is. Lastly, vnto whome it pertaineth. As touching the first, the Apostle saith, that condemnation is taken away by the law of the spirit of lyfe: wherby we vnderstand the holy ghost, which gouerneth our mindes, and ruleth them by his inward motions. With which exposition agreeth Chrysostome. For euen as (saith he) the law of sinne is sinne: so the lawe of the spirit, is the spirit. But in that this worde, of lyfe, is added, some do thus vnderstand it, as though that worde should be ioyned with the worde law: so that the law should be called the law of the spirit, and the law of life. But the nature of y<sup>e</sup> Greke tong semeth to vrge, that that worde should be an epitheton or proprietye of the spirit. For thus it is written, τοῦ πνεύματος τῆς ζωῆς: That is, of the spirit of lyfe. Here the article τῆς completh this word ζωῆς, that is, of lyfe, with the spirit, and not with the law. Wherefore the sence is, that we are deliuered by the spirit, the author of lyfe, and not by enery spirit which is cold, and wanteth lyfe. Ambrose by the law of y<sup>e</sup> spirit vnderstande saith: which law he putteth as a meane betwene y<sup>e</sup> two other lawes, betwene the law of Moyses I say, and the law of the flesh. Faith driueth not, nor forceth vnto vices, as before Paul taught that the law of the members and of the flesh doth. Neither is faith as the law of Moyses, which only admonisheth what ought to be done, but geueth not strengths to do it, neither forgiveth, whē any thing is committed against it. For faith both teacheth what is to be don, and also bringeth strengths to do the same, and when any fault is committed, it obteyneth pardon for the same. Whereby we see what is to be vnderstand by the law of the spirit of life, namely y<sup>e</sup> holy ghost, or els sayth. For either is true: for in very dedde y<sup>e</sup> author of our deliueꝝ is y<sup>e</sup> spirit of Christ. And y<sup>e</sup> instrument which he useth to saue vs by, is faith. For it is the first gift, wherewith God adorneth and decketh men that are to be iustified, by it to embrace the promises set forth vnto the. Now to vnderstand the second part: namely, fro what we are deliuered, We are deliuered from the law of sinne and death. By these wordes is not signified the law of Moyses, although by faith in Christ we are deliuered from it also. But the Apostle

3 similitude.

Four things put forth to be examined.

The efficient cause and instrument of our salvation.

posse entreateth not therof at this present, neither is the law of Moses called in y<sup>e</sup> holy scriptures the law of sinne. For although thorough it sinne be encreased, yet both it not commaund sinne, neither was sinne the autho<sup>r</sup> of it, yea rather the law of Moses is called spiritual, partly because the holy ghost was the autho<sup>r</sup> of it, who gaue it in Mount Sina, and partly because all those things which it commaundeth are spirituall, neither are they agreable vnto lust, no<sup>r</sup> vnto our flesh. It may in dede after a sort be called the law of death, for in the latter epistle to the Corinthians, it is called the ministry of death, but these thinges are not to be applyed vnto it, but thorough our default. For otherwise of it selfe it setteth forth those things which should be profitable vnto lyfe. But it lighteth vpon the peruersenes of our nature, and therof it commeth that death followeth it. Which reason if we should follow, the Gospell also might be called the instrument of death. For Paul in his latter epistle to the Co<sup>r</sup>. thus writeth: Vnto some we are the sauour of lyfe vnto lyfe, but vnto other some the sauour of death vnto death. Wherefore there is great co-sideration to be had, with what maner of sauoz, we sauoz the Gospell. For it is not to be meruailed at, that of one and the selfe same thing do follow contrary effectes. For we see daily, that one and the selfe same sonne, both drieth by clay, and also mel-teth ware. But seing it is so, a man may meruaile, why the Gospell is not in the holy scriptures called the ministry of death, as the law of Moses is? Ambrose an-swereth, Because the Gospell of hys owne nature condemneth not, but those which beleue not, it leaueth vnder the law. And that is it which condemneth and killeth. For it vnder the payne of damnation commaundeth that we should beleue in Christ. Wherefore, they which beleue not, by the condemnation of the law do perishe. But the propriety of the Gospell is only to make safe. It mought also be some what moze plainly answered: that the Gospell, so long as it doth but outwardly only make a sound, neither is the holy ghost inwardly in the hartes of the hearers, to moue and bolue them to beleue, so long (I say) the Gospell hath the nature of the killyng letter, neyther differeth it any thyng from the Lawe, as touchyng efficacye vnto saluation. For although it conteyne other thynges then the Lawe dothe, yet it canne neyther geue Grace, no<sup>r</sup> remission of synnes vnto the hearers. But after that the holy ghost hath once moued y<sup>e</sup> hartes of the hearers to beleue, then at the length the Gospell obtayneth his power to make safe. Wherefore the lawe of sinne, and of death, from which we are deliuered, is it, whereof befoze it was sayd, that it leadeth vs captiues, and rebelleth against the lawe of the minde. In this fight (saith Chrysostome) the holy ghost is present with vs, and helpeth and deliuereth vs, that we runne not into damnation. He crowneth vs (saith he) and furnishing vs on euery side with sayes and helmes bringeth vs into the battayle. Which I thus vnderstand, that we are counted crowned through the forgiue-nes of our sinnes: and holpen with succors, when we are so holpen with free and gracious giftes, and with the strength of the spirite, and instrumente of heauenly giftes that we suffer not this lawe of naturall corruption to raigne in vs. And let this suffice as touching that euill, from which we are by the spi-rite of Christ deliuered. Now let vs declare, what is the nature of this deliuery. This deliuey may indeede be compared with that deliuey, whereby the children of Israell were deliuered out of Egypt. But they were not so set at liberty but y<sup>e</sup> they were with greuous perils & greate temptacions exercised in the desert: and when they were come to the land of Canaan, they had alwayes renants of the Amorites, Chittites, Henites, and Cetites, with whome they had continuall strife. We also are so deliuered from death and sinne, that yet there still remaineth no small portion of these euils. But yet as Paul saith, they can not hurt vs. For although it be sinne, yet is it not imputed. But by death our body shall be losed, and the soule shall be seperated from it, that by meanes of the holy resurrection it shall neuertheles returne againe vnto life. And for that cause Paul said not simply, that we are deliuered from sinne and from death, but from the lawe and power of them. Augustine also in his first booke and 32. chapter: De Nuptijs

The lawe of Moses is not called the lawe of sinne.

It is called the lawe of death, but yet per accidens, that is, by chaunce.

The Gospell is per accidens the instrument of death.

The Gospell as it onely outwardly maketh a sound, differeth little from the lawe.

Our deliuey is compared with that deliuey whereby the Israellites escaped out of Egypt.

Nuptijs & concupiscētia, saith, that this deliuey consisteth of the forgiveness of sinnes: which thing also we see happeneth in ciuill affaires. For if a man, being cast into prison, & knowing himselfe to be guilty, doth waite for nothing but for sentence of death, and yet through the liberallity and mercy of the king he is not only deliuered from punishment, but also the king geueth vnto him greates landes and aboundance of riches and honours: if we should consider in him the principall ground and cause of his deliuey, we shall finde that it consisteth in the forgiveness of his crime and offence. For what had it profited him so to be enriched, if he should straight way haue bene put to death? So although by the benefite of the spirite we haue our strengthes renewed, and the power or faculty to beginne an obedience, soasmuch as by all these thinges the lawe of God can not be satisfied, we could neuer be iustified, vnles we had first remission of our sinnes. For we should still be vnder condemnation, and should be vnder the power of sinne and of death. And when Paul vseth this word lawe, he speaketh metaphoricallly. For by the lawe he vnderstandeth force, and efficacy. And he attributeth it vnto sundry thinges, vnto sinne, vnto death, and vnto the spirite: and if there be any other thing which hath the authoritie of ruling and gouerning, the same may be called the lawe of him, whome it gouerneth and ruleth. But (as we haue already sufficiently taught) when we heare of this word lawe, no man ought to thinke, that here is spoken of the lawe of Moses. And thus much as touching the maner of this deliuey. But in this place therewith to my remembrance a sentence of Chrysostome in his homely de sancto & adorando spiritu: wherein he admonisheth, that this is an apt place to proue the diuinity of the holy ghost. For if the holy ghost be the author of our liberty, then it becometh him to be most free. And that he is the author of our liberty, not only this place declareth, but also that place wherein it is written, Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty. But Arrius, Ennomius, and other such like pestiferous men, would haue the holy ghost to be a seruant. For they in the holy Trinity put a greates difference of persones: for the sonne they sayde was a creature, and for that cause farre inferior vnto the father: but the holie Ghoste they affirmed to be the minister and seruante of the sonne. But if he be a seruante, howe then can he be vnto others, the author of libertie? He hath indeede other argumentes out of the holy scriptures, whereby he confuteth the Arrians: but it sufficeth me to haue rehearsed this one argumente onely: because it serueth somewhat for this place: Now let vs see who they be that are partakers of this deliuey. For Paul doth not superfluously entreate thereof. For when he had taught, that this libertie cometh of the spirite of Christ, although he it be the true and principall cause, yet because it is oftentimes hid, nether can it be seene of other men, therefore Paul turneth himselfe vnto the effects, as vnto thinges more euident. For there are many oftentimes which boast of the spirite and of faith, which yet are most farre from them, and remayne vnder damnation. This selfe same maner shall Christ obserue in the last iudgement. He shall first say, Come ye blessed of my Father, receaue ye the kingdome prepared for you from the beginning of the world. By these wordes is exprest the chiefe and principall cause of our saluation, namely, that we are elected of God & predestinate. But because this cause is hidde from the eyes of men, to the end they might see true heyyes of the kingdome of heauen, he straight way declareth that thing by the effects: I was hungry (sayth he) and ye fed me: I was thursty, and ye gaue me drinke: I was in prison, and ye visited me. So Paul in this place expresth the true cause of our deliuey, namely, the spirite of Christ. Now to know who they are, that be partakers therof, he setteth forth the effects of this deliuey: sayinge.

Vnto those which are in Christ Iesus, which walke not according to the flesh but according to the spirite. That which is added, namely, to walke according to the spirite, and not according to the flesh, because it is afterward repeated, shall in that place be expounded. Let vs see therefore, what it is to be in Christ first

First commeth that which is common vnto all men. For the sonne of God, by cause he toke vpon him the nature of man, is ioyned and made one with al mē. For when they haue fellowship with flesh and blood (as witnesseth the epistle vnto the Hebrewes) he also was made partaker of flesh and blood. But this conjunction is generall, and weake, and onely (if I may so call it) according to the matter. For the nature of men is farre diuers from that nature which Christe toke vpon him. For the nature of man in Christ, is both immortall, and also exempted from sinne, and adorned with all perfections: but our nature is corruptible, and miserablye contaminated with sinne. But if it be endewed with the spirite of Christ, it is so repayed, that it differeth not much from the nature of Christ. Yea so greates is that affinity, that Paul in his epistle to the Ephesians sayth, That we are flesh of his flesh, and bones of his bones. Which forme of speaking seemeth to be taken out of the writings of y<sup>e</sup> old Testamēt. For there byetherne and kinsefolkes do thus speake of themselves one to an other: He is my bone and my flesh. For they seme to acknowledge vnto them, one common matter by reason of one and the selfe same seede of the father, and one & the selfe same wombe of the mother. Whereunto this also is a helpe, so that children do draw of theyr parentes not only a carnall and corpulent substance, but also witte, affections and disposition. This selfe same thing commeth to passe in vs, when we are endewed with the spirite of Christ. For besides our nature which we haue common with him, we haue also his mind (as Paul admonisheth in the first to the Cor.) and the selfe same sence, as he requirith vnto the Phillipians: saying: Let the selfe same sence be in you, which was also in Christ Iesus. Thus our coniunction with Christ, Paul expressed in this selfe same epistle by graftinge: wherein are verie well perceaued of sene those two things which we haue now made mention of. For the graste, whiche is grafted, and the stocke whereinto it is grafted, are made one thing: nether only are y<sup>e</sup> matters which were diuerse, ioyned together, but also they are nourished together with one and the selfe same iuyce, spirite, and life. This selfe same thing the Apostle testifieth is done in vs, when he sayth that we are grafted into Christ. The same thing also Christ teacheth in the Gospel of Iohn, when he calleth himself y<sup>e</sup> vine, & vs y<sup>e</sup> branches, so y<sup>e</sup> branches haue y<sup>e</sup> selfe same life common with the vine tree: they borgen forth by y<sup>e</sup> same spirite and bring forth one and the selfe same fruite. Paul also in his epistle to the Ephesians compareth our coniunction with Christ, with matrimony. For he sayth that it is a greates sacrament betwene Christ and the Church. For euen as in matrimony not only bodies are made common, but also affections and wills are ioyned together, so commeth it to passe by a sure and firme ground betwene Christe and the Church. Wherefore the Apostle pronounceth them free from sinne, which abyde in Christ, and be in hym after that maner which we haue now expressed, to the end they should liue his life, and haue one and the selfe same sence with him, and bring forth frutes of woorkes not disagreeing fro his frutes, and they whiche are suche, can not feare condemnation or iudgement. For the Lorde Iesus is saluation it selfe, as his name signifyfiently declareth. Wherefore they which are in him, are in no daunger to be condemned. Whereunto we adde, that they also are in Christ, which in all their things depend of hym, and which whatsoeuer they take in hand, or do, are moued by his spirite. For to depend of him, is nothing els, then in all thinges that we go about, to haue a regard vnto him, and to seeke onely his glory: but they which are moued by his spirit, do not follow the affections and instigations of lustes. Whereby it is manifest, how faithfull and godly men are in Christ, and that by all kindes of causes: for we haue one & the selfe same matter, also the selfe same first groundes of forme: for we are endued with the selfe same nokes, proprietes, and conditions which he had. The efficient cause wherby we are moued to worke, is the same spirit wherewith he was moued. Lastly, the ende is all one, namely, y<sup>e</sup> the glory of God should be aduanced.

Ans.

But

What is the conjunction which we haue with Christ

In Ephesians phrase, our bone, and our flesh.

A similitude.

Our conjunction with Christ is compared with matrimony.

Who are in Christ.

It is proved that we are in Christ by all kindes of causes.

But that which was impossible vnto the law, in as much as it was weake because of the flesh, God sendyng his own sonne in the similitude of the flesh of sinne, and by sinne condemned sinne in the flesh. That the righteousness of the Lawe might be fulfilled in vs, which walke not after the flesh, but after the spirit. For they which are accordyng to the fleshe, sauour the thinges that are of the flesh, but they that are accordyng to the spirite, sauour the thinges that are of the spirite. For the wisdom of the fleshe is death: but the wisdom of the spirite is lyfe and peace. Because the wisdom of the flesh is enmity against God: for it is not subiect vnto the lawe of God, neyther in deede can be. So then they that are in the fleshe cannot please God.

One and the selfe same worke is both sin, and vertue as it cometh either from vs, or from God.

God if we speake properly ought not to be counted the cause of sin.

In argument of iustification, that it is not had by workes.

The Pelagians are in this place overthrowen

But that which was impossible vnto the law, in as much as it was weakened by the flesh, God sending his sonne.] Here is brought a reason, whereby is shewed that this spirite of God is geuen vnto vs for a deliuerer, to the ende we might be made the more certaine therof. For when we heare, that of necessity we must haue the spirite of Christ, straight way we thinke with our selues, that by reason of our vncleane affections, and corrupt maners, we are vnworthie of the receiving of it. This doubt Paul taketh away, & saith: that y<sup>e</sup> benefite cometh vnto vs by the death of Christ. For this was the ende, for which Christ would dye: namely, that by his spirite the iustification of the law might be fulfilled in the elect. Neither did he for any other cause take flesh vpon him, but to helpe and succour the infirmity of our flesh. Of this purpose and counsell of God the Apostle here entreateth. By this place it manifestly appeareth, how one and the selfe same worke as it cometh from men is sinne, and as it cometh from God is good. The Iewes sought nothing els in the death of Christ, but to exaspiate and fulfill their hatred, & to reiect the worde of God, and to repell and put away the chastisements and corrections of the Lord, and also to kepe still their dignities and honours. These endes forasmuch as they are very wicked, the action also could not but be very wycked. But God forasmuch as he had a regard to the setting forth of his godnes, and procured the health of mankind, in that he deliuered his sonne vnto the death, accomplished a worke of most singuler charity. Wherefore, if we will speake properly, God can not be called the cause of sinne: although it cannot be denied, but that he is the cause of that thing which in vs is sinne: for that which in him is praise worthy, and procedeth of vertue, is oftentimes by vs defiled, for that we our selues are vncleane. In that he saith: That which was impossible vnto the law, he teacheth both that the law is weake, and by the contrary that the spirite and faith are strong. But that infirmity of the law appeareth not, vnles the weakenes of our free will be thoroughly known. For therof cometh it that the law is weak, because it lieth vpon a corrupt nature. For otherwise the law it selfe, so far forth as it is writ ten, is nether weake nor strong. But man is iudged weak, so long as he is left vnder the Law, and is not holpen by the spirite of grace. This place most strongly proueth, that iustification is not of workes, and that there are no workes preparatory: for workes which go before iustification, either do agree with the law of God, or els they defect or want of it. If they agree with the law, the of necessity we must graunt, that the law is not weak, as that which without the spirit and grace may be performed. Paul in this place affirmeth that thing to be impossible. But if such workes faile of the rule of the law (which can not be denied) then must we nedes graunt, that they are sinnes. But by sinnes no man can be iustified. Here also are reproued the Pelagians, which toke vpon them to say and teach, that a man by the strengthes of nature is able to fulfill the commaundements of the Law. For Paul teacheth contrariwise, that y<sup>e</sup> law was so weakened by the flesh, that it behoued vs to be deliuered by an other helpe. But where as he saith, y<sup>e</sup> law was weakened weakened by the flesh, no man ought therefore falsely to suppose there is condemned the substance of the flesh, or nature of the body: for these things God created good. But by flesh he understandeth the naughtiness & corruption, which by reason of the fall of Adam passed through all mankind. Which corruption so much as it is still remaining even in men regenerate, they can not undoubtedly perfectly and fully accomplish the law of God, until they have utterly put off this flesh. And as Chrysostom noteth, the law of God is not by these wordes condemned, but rather commended; because it commandeth right and iust things, but it can not bring them to the ende. Wherefore the coming (saith he) of Christ was necessary, which might minister helpe and succour unto the law: for the law in dede taught by right what ought to be done, and what ought to be avoided. But besides this there were two other things necessary which the law could not geue: first that those things might be forgiven, which are committed against the commandements thereof; an other is, that the strengthes of man might be corroborated, whereby to performe the commandementes of the law. Without these two things, whatsoever the law teacheth touching the doing or eschewing of things, it can not profite, but rather serueth to condemnation. For he which knoweth the will of his Lord and doth it not, is grievously punished, then he which knoweth not the will of his Lord. Those commentaries which are ascribed unto Ierome, do byen this place expressly affirme, that the Apostle here speaketh not of the law of ceremonies: for he speaketh here of that law, whereof is written in the 7. chapter of Mathew: The things which ye wyl that men should do unto you, the same do ye unto them: of which lawe it is straight way sayde, This is the lawe and the prophetes. Wherefore there is no cause why any man shoulde cauell that that whiche Paul saith, It was possible unto the lawe, is not to be referred unto the mozell lawe, but unto ceremonies. But there are in this place three things to be observed: first, what moued God to geue his sonne: secondly, what Christ being geuen unto vs did for vs. Lastly, what fruite we obtayne by his worke. As touching the first, the Apostle saith, that this was the purpose of God, when he gaue his sonne, that the infirmity of the lawe should not be a let to our saluation. For he saith that it was so weake, by reason of the infirmity of our flesh, that by the ministry thereof we could not attaine unto saluation which he had appointed for vs. Which sentence if our aduersaries would consider, they shoulde see, that they can neither mayne-aine workes of preparation, nor yet iustification by workes, vntles paradenture they thinke that this counsell or purpose of God was not necessary. And these men undoubtedly do as much as lieth in the, to diminish the benefite of Christ, neither acknowledge they the perfect and full loue of the father towards vs. Paul saith, that the lawe without Christ is weake: these men say, that before we are made partakers of Christ, we be able to worke good workes, and to obey the lawe of God. And although Paul here teacheth the impossibility of the lawe, yet the fathers haue sometimes accursed such as dare say, that God hath commanded things impossible. Although if a man rightly understand our doctrine, he shall easily see, that we teach not, that the commandementes of God are utterly impossible, but only as touching those which are strangers from Christ. For men now regenerate, haue a beginning and an endeavour of obedience, and forgiveness of defectes which they committe: the righteousness also of Christ whereby the law is fulfilled, is now made their righteousness, and is of God imputed unto them. For the strengthes of the head do passe into the members. Lastly by hope we are made safe, and the accomplishment of the lawe, which wanteth in their workes, so long as they liue here, they shal attaine perfectly & by all meanes full, when they shalbe ioyned together with Christ in an other life. And therefore woulde God prouide a remedy for the weaknes of the lawe which springeth of our weaknes. Let vs see therefore what God hath done.

He hath sent his sonne in the similitude of the flesh of sinne, and by sin hath condemned sinne in the flesh. By these wordes is manifeste the number and distinction of the diuine persons in the holy Trinity. For if the sonne be sent of the father, then must one of necessity be distinct from the other; which is contrary to the heresie of Photinus, Sabellius the Patripassianites, and other such pellicerous men, which taught that the sonne and the holy ghost are distinguished both from the father; and also betwixt themselves onely as touching the names. But what order Paul hath put in the persons, we may easily see. For he saith, that the holy ghost is he which deliuereth: secondly, that that spirite is genen by Christ: lastly, that the sonne is sent of the father. And so he resolue the last effect of our saluation into the first cause.

Trinity.

This word
taketh not away the veritie of the flesh.

In the similitude of the flesh of sinne. ] Augustine admonisheth, that these things are to be read jointly together, so that this word similitude, is not referred vnto the flesh, but vnto sinne. For the humane nature which Christ took vpon him had the shew of forme of sinne: but yet in very dede it could not be polluted with sinne. Paul also vnto the Philippians writeth, that Christ was in the similitude of men: not that he was not a man in very dede: but that by cause he so abased himselfe, that he nothing departed from the common custome of men, neither confounded he the nature of man with the nature of the word of God: but left it so perfect, that even the forme and similitude of other men might be shewed in Christ. And therefore the Apostle bleth this word similitude, that we might vnderstand that the Lord was not a pure man only, as other men were: although he seemed such a one. For in him was the diuine nature hidde. Wherefore there is no cause, why the Marcionites, or other such like heretikes, should by these places deny that Christ had true flesh. For he took vpon him the nature of man (as the Greke Scholies haue noted) with the affections thereof: not vndoubtedly with those affections, which spring of malice: but with those, which spring of nature instituted of God. In summe, to haue taken the flesh of sinne, is nothing else then that Christ was so made man, that he was subiect vnto heate, cold, hunger, thirst, contumelies and death: for these are the effects of sinne. And therefore the flesh of Christ inought well be called the flesh of sinne. Augustine in his 14. booke agaynst Faustus, hath so written agaynst an heretike, which refused Moses: as though he were contumelious agaynst Christ, when he wrote, Cursed be every one that hangeth one a tree. Vnto whome Augustine answereth, If by this meanes thou condemnest Moses, thou shalt also reiect Paul. For he vnto the Galatians writeth, that Christ was made accursed for vs. And the same Paul in his latter epistle to the Corinthians saith, that he which knew not sinne, was for our sakes made sinne. Then he citeth this place whereof we now intreat, that God sent his sonne in the similitude of the flesh of sinne, and by sinne condemned sinne. He bringeth also a reason why the flesh of Christ is called sinne namely, by cause it was mortall, and cursed of death, which of necessity followeth sinne. And he affirmeth this to be a figurative kinde of speech, wherein by that which goeth before is exprest that which followeth. But besides this interpretation of Augustine, I remember another also, which the same Augustine treatinge vpon this place followeth, which also he seemeth to haue learned of Origen. And that interpretation is taken out of Leviticus: where when as there are diuerse kinds of sacrifices instituted mention is made of an oblation for sinne: which selfe same oblation is euery where called sinne. But vnto that word is oftentimes added a preposition, and in the Hebrew it is written Lechattoth and Lealchrah, that is, for sinne, and for trespass: so that hereby we may see, that the sacramentes (as we haue often sayd) haue the names of those things which they signifie. And other tonges also both the Latine and the Greke, seeme to haue imitated this forme of speaking. For the Latines call that piaculum, or piaculare hostiam, which is offered to turne away the wrath of God. The same thing the Grecians call καθάρμα of makinge cleane: and ἀνάθεμα. And this is it which Paul sometimes calleth sinne and accursed. This therefore is the meaning: that Christe condemned sinne which was in our flesh, by sinne, that is, by that oblation, which was for sinne, that is by his flesh which is here called, καὶ διὰ τῆς σαρκὸς: which is (after the Hebrue manner of speaking) the sacrifice for sinne. But to condempne, signifieth. in this place, to take away, and to discharge those things, which be to follow them that are condemned. And that we may the easelier vnderstand, how Christ by his death condemned sinne, we ought by sayth to be assured, that he hath obteyned for vs the holygost, whereby our sinnes are forgiven, whereby also lust, which is the roote of all sinnes, is repressed in vs. But there are others, which interpretate this place otherwise, as though Christ condemned sinne in his flesh, that is, he woulde haue himselfe to be punished and offered by for sinne, namely, for our sin. Which interpretation doth not so much differ from the first. But that interpretation which Chrysostome and Ambrose haue, is farre more strange: for they thinke that sinne it selfe was condemned of Christ for sinne, that is, for that cause, namely, because it had done vniustly and sinned greuously: for sinne of his owne right seemed to rage against me, which were euē from the beginning obnoxious vnto it: but in this it was so bold to lay hands vpon Christ being most innocent, it deserued condempnation. But Ambrose seemeth to signifie, that sin is here takē for the deuill, who in this he killed Christ, tempted him more than it was lawful for him to do: wherfore he thinketh he lost his power, which before he had ouer men. But this interpretation, althoughe it containe nothing that is vngodly, yet in no wise agreeth with the meaning of the Apostle. For Paul geueth a reason how we are deliuered by Christ from the lustes and motions, of which he complaineth towards the ende of the viij. chapter. And soasmuch as the death of Christ is put for the cause of this deliuey, that exposition which we brought of the sacrifice for sin, both is agreable with reason, and also is proued by other testimonies of the Scriptures. For Chrysostome in his 33. chapter writinge of Christ, sayth: If he shall put his soule (Ameth schaim asham nephesh) sinne, that is to say, for sinne: Paul also as we haue before cited him, sayth: That he which knew no sinne, was for vs made sinne. And in the first epistle to the Corinthians: Christ our paschall is offered vp. And in the epistle vnto the Hebrewes: Christ is set forth to be that sacrifice for sinne, whiche was sent to be offered without the holies. John also sayth: Beholde the lambe of God whiche taketh away the sinnes of the worlde, in which wordes he calleth him a lambe, for he should be a sacrifice for sinne. And that slaughter of sacrifices shadowed nothing els vnto the elders, but damnation and death. For there they which offered them, acknowledged, that the sinnes for which they ought to haue bene punished, should be transferred and layd vpon the offerer, that euē as the sacrifice was killed, so should Christ in tyme to come, dye for the sinnes of the people. Which thing peradventure they declared by an outward shewbole or signe: namely, by laying on of their handes. And many thinke that this signification of the offering vp of the offerer for sinne was of so great force, that for the figuracion therof, men were among certaine nations offered vp. For that which they had heard of the holy patriarches should one day come to passe, the same they sought to expresse by a sacrifice most myest (as they thought) vnto the truth. Which yet soasmuch as it wanted the word of God, and was by them only inuented, was nothing els then an vngodly cruelty. Of this thing Origene against Celsus maketh mencion. Neither can it be but wonderful, that at this day throughout the whole worlde, there are no immolations of sacrifices: which seme by the providence of god therfore to haue banished away, because that noble, and so long looked for sacrifice of the deith of Christ, which was by all those sacrifices after a sorte shadowed, is now performed. For God hath geuen one only oblation, whereby as we haue said sinne is condemned. By which so great liberality of God towarde vs, both feare and also faith ought to be stirred vp in vs. For if God to the ende he woulde abolishe sinne, spared not his owne proper sonne, what shall become of vs, if we despise so great a sacrifice, and tread vnder foote the blood of the sonne of God: On the other side who will not put his confidence in God, without he seeth for our sinnes to haue geuen his sonne vnto the deith? Wherfore we bught with a most strong faith to embrace this sacrifice. Neither ought we here to regard the sacrificing priestes, which boast that they can by their masses, and superstitions, and vngodly whisperinges apply this sacrifice vnto vs. In dede the holy scriptures teache, that one ought to pray for an other. But that communicating of one man is sufficient for an other, or that it applieth the death of Christ vnto an other, that thing the holy ghost neuer taught. And sithen the sacramentes are σφαιδισ, That is, scales of promises, they can profite them onely (if we speake of the which are of full age) which embrace the by sayth. Wherefore, eue as it is not conuenient, y one should be baptised for an other, so doth it nothing profite, if one man receiue the Eucharist or supper of the Lord for an other. For this were all one, as if a man should take scales, by which promises are confirmed and transerre the vnto a blanke paper, which hath neither promise, nor any thing written in it, we may in dede when we communicate geue thanks vnto God, for that he hath holpen our neighbours and brethren, and we may pray for them, that they may be confirmed. But to eate the sacrifice or Eucharist, or to offer by Christ for other men, it is utterly a fained inuention. And although we shoulde graunte the thys, yet should they not haue y which they so much sake for. For thys is not peculiar vnto priestes, but is com to vnto al the which celebrate y supper of y lord. Away therfore with these fained lies, & let euery mā labor by his own proper faith, to take hold for himselfe of this benefite of Christ, & to apply it vnto himselfe, Augustine in his exposition begon vpon the epistle vnto the Romanes, saith, that euery one of vs applieth vnto himselfe the sacrifice of the death of Christ: For he saith, Touching the sacrifice, of which the Apostle then spake, that is, of the burnt offering of the Lordes passion: that euery man offereth for hys owne sinnes, then when he is dedicated vnto the passion of Christ through faith, and when by baptisme he is noted by the name of faithfull Christians. Now let vs speake of the third thing, namely to sa what is the fruite of the death of Christ.

We shalbe iudged according to our workes. We shall not be iustified by them.

The dignite of causes either excellith or is equal with the effectes. How the preceptes of the law are fulfilled in vs by Christ.

How Christ is called the ende of the law.

That the righteousness of God might be fulfilled in vs, which walke not according to the fleshe, but according to the spirit. That which we haue turned, Righteousnes, and others, Iustification, in Greke it is δικαιωσις. which word signifieth that honesty and brightness which is commaunded in the law; which although it be so called, yet are we not thereby iustified: for the fulfilling thereof can be in no man, but only in him which is iustified. It is true in dede that we shalbe iudged accordinge vnto those workes: for God will render vnto euery manne accordinge to hys workes. For accordinge to the condition of the workes, the forme of the sentence shalbe pronounced. Yet are not good workes the causes of that felicity which we looke for. For if they were causes, then shoulde they either be equal with the reward, or els they should be greater then it. For this is the nature of causes, ether to excell the effectes, or at the least wayes to be equal with them: which thing that it can not be ascribed vnto workes, Paul sufficiently declareth, when he saith, that the afflictions of thys lyfe are not woorthye the glorie to come, which shalbe reuelled in vs. But howe the preceptes of the law are fulfilled in vs by the communion which we haue with Christ, which died for vs, thus may be declared: because vnto them which beleue in him is geuen the holy ghost, whereby their strengthes are renewed, that they may be able to performe the obedience of the lawe, not in dede a perfect and absolute obedience: for that is not had so long as we liue here. Wherefore the accomplishment of the lawe herein consisteth, that the sinnes which we haue committed be forgiven vs by Christ: and the righteousness which he hath performed be imputed vnto vs: for that he is our head, and we on the other side his members. Lastly this is to be looked for, that when we shall come vnto the long desired ende of chiefe felicity, there shall then be nothing in vs, which shall be repugnant vnto the lawe of God. After this maner Christ is called the ende of the lawe: as one that hath not broken it, but fulfilled it: not only in that by his doctrine he deliuered it from the corrupt interpretations of the Scribes and Phariseis, but also because he hath in such maner as we haue now declared, accomplished both it in himselfe & in vs. Wherefore

foze as many as are without Christ, and are not partakers of his death, and haue not forgiveness of their sinnes, and are boyde of the righteousness of Christ, and haue no desire to fulfill the lawe, all these I saye shall not attayne that felicity, wherein they shall haue nothing which is repugnant vnto the lawe of God. Wherefoze the iustification of the lawe can in them by no meanes be fulfilled. But who they be, in whome the righteousness of the lawe shall beginne to be accomplished, foze that it hath alreedy by the cause thereof bene declared, namely foze that the faithful are partakers of the death and spirite of Christ, now also the same declareth he by the fruite.

Which walke not according to the fleshe, but according to the spirit. This is a notable marke and condition, whiche followeth them. They walke according to the spirit, in whome the spirit governeth, raigeth and beareth dominion. And contrarywise, they walke according to the fleshe, in whome the fleshe beareth dominion. These thynges stricke one againste the other. But in this sighte the godlye onelpe are exercised by strivings. For they which are straungers from Christ do without any resistance or fighting followe the flesh: but they that are spirituall do geue chese place vnto the spirit. And hereby we see, that this is the nature of that sayth which iustifieth, to make a man in that plight, that his fleshe being after a sort put of, he liueth according vnto the spirit. But those which liue not so, the apostle proueth, neither to be deliuered from sin, nor to be partakers of the death of Christ, neither also to be obseruers of the lawes of God. For he sayth:

For they which are according to the flesh do minde those things which are of the flesh, but they which are according to the spirit, doo fauour those things which are of the spirit. They which liue according to the affection of the flesh do follow things hurtfull: and therefore they fall into death, and paradise enmities agaynst God. Whereby followeth, that they are neither partakers of the spirit of Christ, nor yet of his death. But if a man shoulde saye that by the sence of the flesh men desire meate, drinke, apparell, matrimony, & other things which pertaine vnto this life, and these thynges are not damnable, nor hurtful: I would answere, that these thynges in dese of theyr naturall nature are not euill, but the meanes, whereby the vngodly desire them, is both hurtfull and damnable. For they seeke them for theyr owne sake, and direct them not vnto the glory of God, neyther are they directed by vnto these desires by sayth, or by the worde of God or by the spirit. Wherefore vnto them they are sinnes. And so farre as all men before they are iustified, are moued by the affection of the flesh, it followeth, that whatsoeuer they do, is sinne, and highly displeaseth God. Wherefoze by those deedes, they can neither be iustified, nor prepare themselves vnto iustification. The wordes of the apostle teach, that two kindes of affections are contrary and opposite: whiche that we may the better vnderstand, let this be so certayne, that the affection of the flesh is nothinge els, then the vse of humane strengthes setting apart the grace and spirite of Christ. And the nature of man is to be taken, not as it was first created of God, but as it is now, viciate and corrupt. But the affection of the spirit is the impulsion of the inspiration of God, and vse of the grace of Christ. Some let vs see, what those thynges are wherevnto the affection of the flesh carrieth. Whownd of necessity be good things. For we desire nothing but that which is good, and that good is ether honest, profitable or pleasaunt. In these thynges the affection of the flesh is two maner of wayes deceaued. For sometimes it is caried vnto those thynges which seme honest, and are not, and which seme profitable and pleasaunt, but in very dede are vnprofitable & irksome. An other erroze is, when it desireth those thynges, which in very dede should be honest, profitable & pleasaunt, if they were desired with right reason as it was instituted of God: such as are these good workes which commonly are called ciuill or morall. Curiously the affection of the flesh erreth in one of these two wayes. Wherefoze all y<sup>e</sup> world therof, seing they faile fro right reason, are finnes. Wherefore hereby is concluded, that a Christian life herein consisteth, to haue a care vnto those thinges which are of the spirit, and to forsake those thinges which belong vnto the flesh: that both we may seeke for perfect good thinges, and also y<sup>e</sup> we faile not in the manner of desiring them. But what are the effectes both of the flesh and also of the spirit, Paul hath in manye places taught: and especially in his epistle vnto y<sup>e</sup> Galathians, wher he thus writeth: The workes of the flesh are, adulteries, fornications, uncleannes, wantonnes, idolatry, witchcrafts, enmitie, strifes, emulations, wranglings, contentions, enuies, murders, drunkennes, banquetting, and such other like: of which the Apostle saith, They which do these thinges shall not possesse the kingdome of God. But the fruites of the spirit (saith he) are, charity, ioye, peace, lenity, goodnes, gentlenesse, faith, mekenesse, and temperance. And Paul more playnely to declare the fight betwene these two affections, hath signified it, not only by the name of flesh and spirit, but also hath added other epithetes or proprieties: namely, that the affection of the flesh is death, and enmity against God: but the sence of the spirit is life and peace. Now there is none which knoweth not but that death is contrary vnto life, and enmitie, vnto peace. By life he understandeth the notion of the will of man, and of the whole man towards God. But peace is the tranquillity of conscience and reconciliation with God. Paul in that he so amplifieth these thinges, playnly declareth, how necessary a thing regeneration is for vs. And thereby also he exhorteth vs to follow the better affection, namely, the affection of the spirit and of grace: for that the affection of the flesh is called death. Which thing Ambrose saith cometh to passe by reason of sinne: for where sinne is, there death of necessity followeth. But he mayerly why this affection is after the latine translation called wisdom. And he answereth, that it is so called, because vnto such men it seemeth wisdom: for here vnto they apply all theyr industry, craft, and subtilty, namely, to sinne: and they are wise to doo euill. Many also herein thinke themselves learned and wise, because they will not beleue those thinges, which passe the capacity of reason: as for example, the creation of the world, the resurrection of the flesh, the conception of the virge, and such like. These two do declare that Ambrose understandeth the affection of the flesh, as it extendeth it selfe vnto infidelity or vnto the minde. And vndoubtedly Paul in this place vnder affection comprehendeth λογος & επιθυμια, the power of vnderstanding, & the power of desiring. With which sentence Augustine agreeth, when he saith, that wisdom chiefly consisteth in chusing and refusing. But it is manifest, that vnto election are adtoynd two powers, the power of knowledge, & y<sup>e</sup> power of will. He addeth moreover, y<sup>e</sup> this affection is enmity against God: for they which are so affected, do fight against him. An horrible sentence vndoubtedly. But it is most truly said, that the fight of the flesh against the spirit, is a fight against God. Enmity, saith he, but the latine text hath, enemy. But this seemeth to be but a small fault, forasmuch as εχθρα with an acute accent in the first syllable, signifieth enmity: but εχθρα with an accent in the last, signifieth, an enemy. And howsoever it be, it may be ascribed either vnto the writers, or to the variety of books: for the accent is easily transferred from one place to another. But we ought to consider, that if we rede εχθρα, that is, enemy, it is a noune adiectiue whose substantiue can be none other but this word, σοφισμα which is englished wisdom: which we see is of the neuter gender. And then should it not to be εχθρα, but εχθρον. We ought therefore of necessity to rede εχθρα, which signifieth, enmity: and that agreeth best with the scope of the Apostle. For he exaggerateth how great a destruction or hurt the affection of the flesh is. And this is a vehementer kind of speech to call a wicked man wickednes, then to call him wicked. But how the sence of the flesh is enmity against God, the Apostle thus promoueth. Because (saith he) it is not subiect vnto the lawe of God, yea neither indede can it. Whosoever resisteth the will of another man, and so worketh continually y<sup>e</sup> he can not disagree in any wise with him, is his enemy. Such is the affection of our flesh. Wherefore it is an enemy vnto God, or rather it is euery remitteth it selfe against God. That booke vpon Mathew (which is ascribed vnto Chrysostome and is called an imperfect worke) vpon these wordes of the Lord, He which seeth a woman to lust after her, hath already committed fornication in hys hart, that booke (I say) saith, That the Lord may seeme to some to haue taken occasion to condemne vs: for such affections haue we by nature, that euen at the first brunt we are in such manner moued to lust. And forasmuch as we are not able to prohibite these affections from rising up, therefore straight way will we or will we, we are made guilty of thys precept. But it maketh a distinction of lust: For there is one lust (saith it) of the mynde and an other of the fleshe: and there is also one anger of the mynde, and an other of the fleshe. Farther it addeth, that that sentence of Christ is to be vnderstand of the luste of the mynde, and not of the luste of the fleshe: and that thys place of Paul may haue the selfe same sence, namely, to vnderstand that the wisdom not of the mynde, but of the fleshe can not be subiect vnto the lawe of God. And so by this distinction taken out of the philosophers, they thinke that they haue very well knit vp the matter. But with Paul the affection of the fleshe is not the inferior part of the mynde, nether is the spirite the mynde which possideth the more nobler part of the soule: as we shall afterward more manifestly declare. But of how great credite that booke is, Erasmus hath most plainly declared, who doubtles in iudging the writings of the elders was a man of great diligence. And that that booke is none of Chrysostomes, he proueth by many argumentes. And Chrysostome himselfe, when he interpreteth this place, saith, that by the affection of the fleshe is vnderstand the interpretation of the mynde, but yet the more grosser part, so that it taketh hys name of the worser part. For so sometymes the whole man is called fleshe, although he want not a soule. So he extendeth the name of the fleshe euen vnto the mynde. But he obiection: If a man neither is, nor can be subiect vnto the lawe of God, what hope then shall there be of saluation? Much (saith he) for we see that the thiefe, Paul, the sinfull woman, Dauid, Manasses, and Peter repented. So long (saith he) as thys affection shall so remayne, it can not be subiect vnto the lawe of God: but forasmuch as it may be changed, all hope is not to be cast away. In writing this, he teacheth nothing but that which is sound. But this is to be noted, that this change consisteth not in our strengthes. For it is altogether of the spirite of Christ, and of grace. For as longe as we be as we were before, we our selues can neuer change our selues. But afterward Chrysostome addeth, that peradventure this affection of the fleshe signifieth a wicked action: and that Paul meant nothyng els, but that an euill worke can neuer be good. And in the same sence thinketh he is to be taken this sentence of the Gospell, where it is sayde, That an euill tree can not brynge forth good fruytes. This interpretation I can in no wise allow, so that I see that Paul here speaketh not of any action or worke, but speaketh of the affect, feeling, and corruption of nature. Neither can I be perswaded, that the Romanes were so blockish, that they needed to be taught that an euill action could not be good. But that Christ by the euill tree vnderstande not workes, but man, those thinges doo manifestly declare, which are in that place by Mathew reheresed: For he had warned them to beware of false prophetes, which come in shepes clothing, but within are rauening wolues. By their fruytes (saith he) ye shall knowe them. Doe men of thornes gather grapes, or of briers, figges? Either make the tree good, &c. And farther that we may be chaunged (which thing we deny not) he goeth about to proue by the parable of tares. Tares (saith he) are made wheate, and chaunged into it. And therefore the goodman of the house would not haue them weeded out. But we finde not in the Gospell, that tares are chaunged into wheate. Only y<sup>e</sup> lord would not haue y<sup>e</sup> tares plucked vp, lest perhaps y<sup>e</sup> wheate being mixed with the, bicause peradventure y<sup>e</sup> rootes of y<sup>e</sup> wheate and of y<sup>e</sup> tares being intricated together, should be together plucked vp. But herein as we haue said consisteth not the cotrouersy. For we know y<sup>e</sup> such affects may be changed and broken. But he after ward sayth: that that is done by the spirite and grace of God: which thing is both most true, & we also haue oftentimes affirmed y<sup>e</sup> same. Howbeit (as Chrysostome is alwaies to much prone to defende wyl, & humane strenght)

bers doth no more rebell against the law of the mynde, neither doth it leade vs captiue vnto the law of sinne. And that this is not so, I doubt not, but that euery man hath experience in himselfe. And we haue before by most manifest reasons declared, & those thinges which Paul writeth in the 7. chap. of this epistle, doo pertaine vnto men regenerate. Vnles peradventure this be Chrysostomes meaning, that these motions in the regenerate are daily made more remisse. But he vndoubtedly here-unto had not a regard, as those thinges which folloio do plainly declare. And it semeth that he spake generally of this our tyme, which is since Christ offered himself vnto the father, and suffered death. Augustine hath of this place a sound interpretation. One and the selfe same soule (saith he) may be subiecte both vnto the affecte of the fleshe, and also vnto the affecte of the spirite: as one and the selfe same water is both made warme, and is also by cold congeled, and made ice. So that then if thou wilt say, that ice is not whote, thou saist truly: and if thou wilt say moreover, that ice can not be whote, this also is true: for ice so long as it is ice can not be whote. But it is possible, that heat may be put to it, & the ice may be resolued & made whote. But that ice, should both keepe still his own nature, & yet in the mean tyme be whote, it is utterly vnpossible. After this maner the affect of the flesh may either be taken away, or be broken, and a spirituall affecte succede in his place. But that a carnall affect should be made spirituall, it is by no meanes possible. If thou demaund, whether spirituall obseruings of the commaundements of God are vnpossible or no? I answer, that in the oldenes of the flesh they are vn-possible: but if the spirite and regeneration be added, they are not utterly vnpossi-ble, although the law of God cannot in this life be performed, no not euē of y most holiest. For it pertaineth to the spirite of Christ, to tame the forwardnes of y flesh, and when we are once come to death, utterly to extinguishe it. Now y these thinges are thus expounded, there remaine two errors to confute: wherof one is of the Ma-niches, which therfore thought the flesh to be called enmity against God, because it was created of an euill God, which continually resisteth the true and good God.
But the matter is farre otherwise. For here is not entreated of the hypostasis or substance of the flesh, but of the fault or corruptio, which by reason of the fall of y first man is alwaies ioyned to it. An other error is of y Pelagiāns, which were not ashamed to say, y man by y strenghts of nature is able to keepe y commaundments of God.
From whome the scholemen at this day differ not much. For they affirme that a man without the grace of Christ is able to keepe the Law of God, as touching the substance of workes: although not according to the meaning of the Law: for they which are of that sort, what soener they worke, it ca not be done of charity. And so they are not afrayd to say, that a man ca loue God aboue all thinges though he want the grace of God. Nether in the meane time marke they, that the Apostle here sayth, that the wisdom of the flesh is enmity agaynst God. If an Etnike should at any time say that he loneth God aboue all thinges, when we haue diligently considered the matter we shall playnly finde, that vnder that dissembled lone lieth hidden in his hart a most greate hatred of God. And whereas the Apostle sayth, that the affecte of the flesh is not subiecte vnto the Law of God, he hath not a respect vnto workes moral or ciuill: but only (as I haue sayd) to our corrupt and vitiate nature. And herein chiefly is the first table to be considered, which requirith a perfect sayth, loue, wo:shipping, and feare of God: in which thinges consisteth the force, vigour, and as it were the soule of the obediēce of the rest of the commaundementes. Of those thinges which haue hitherto bene spoken, the Apostle inferreth this conclusion, that they which are in the flesh, ca

not please God: and therfore they are neither deliuered nor receiued vnto God: So that this is a certaine token whereby we may know by the effect, and a posteriori, as they call it, who they are that are deliuered from sinne, and made partakers of the benefite of the death of Christ. And if they which are in the flesh, can not please God, then it followeth that they are euill trees, which bringe not forth good fruite. There are then merites of congruity, and of works (as they call them) preparatory: For if the men themselues can not please God, undoubtedly they: works can not be acceptable vnto God. Wherefore miserable is the estate of the wicked, which in no wise can please God. But it is our partes continually to pray for a more abundant spirite of Christ, that we may more and more please him.

But ye are not in the flesh, but in the spirite: because the spirite of God dwelleth in you. But if any man haue not the spirit of Christ, the same is not his. And if Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sinne, but the Spirite is life because of righteousness. And if the Spirite of hym that rayled by Iesus from the dead, dwell in you, he that rayled by Christ from the dead, shall also quicken your mortal bodyes, because that his spirite dwelleth in you.

Ye are not in the flesh. ] That which he before spake generally, he now particularly applyeth vnto the Romanes, and after his accustomed maner descendeth from a generall theme to a particular. Here is agayne in this place a sentence which can not but figuratiuely be interpreted: for if we should vnderstand simply, that we are not in the flesh, the truth would shew the contrary. Wherefore Chrysostome vpon this place sayth, that it is a thing very dangerous alwayes to vnderstand the scriptures according to the proper significations of the words. I meruaile therefore, what our aduersaries meane so much to fangle and to make such an ado, when we say that these wordes of the Lord, This is my body, are spoken figuratiuely: and that we vnderstand them not, as though the body of Christ were carnally, really, and substantiually in the bread. But that which is shewed forth, we teach to be the sacrament of the body of Christ, whereby is signified, that his body was fastened vnto the Crosse, and his blood shed for vs. And this undoubtedly is done with greate vtility, if we both beleue those things which are set forth, and also receaue the sacrament with such a faith as becometh. But they say that Christ did not so speake. I graunt he did not. But if it be sufficient so to answer, why doo they not here also say, that Paul spake simply and appertly. Ye are not in the flesh, for other interpretations hath he added none: If they say that that may be gathered by those thinges, which he before spake, so also will we say that this may be gathered, as well by the nature of the sacraments (whose nature is, to signify the thinges, whereof they are signes) and also by that which is there written, namely, that these thinges ought to be done in remembrance of the Lord, and that they should shew forth his death: and also by many other thinges, which are written in the 6. chap of John. Farther Chrysostome vpon this place sayth, That Paul, who be thus writeth, doth in no wise deny the nature of the fleshe, but exalteth it to a more higher dignity, namely, that it should rather obey the impulsion of the spirite, then lust. So we say that when the fathers seme to deny that the nature of the bread abideth in the encharist, they deny not the nature of the bread, but declare that it is exalted to a higher dignity: namely to be a sacrament of the body of Christ, and now to serue to a spiritual purpose, and vse. But they yet doo a grent deale more, which thinke that this place maketh agaynst the matrimony of ministers of the Church. For if it were so, he should conclude vniuersally, that all Christians ought to liue without wyues. For there is no Christian, after that he hath beleued in Christ, is any more in the flesh. We haue in dede a body, fleshe, and members, meate, drinke, and matrimonies: all which thinges seeme to pertayne vnto h flesh: but we haue the in God, to vse the according to the spirite, & not according to h flesh. Neither doth Paul in this place meane any other thing, the did h Lord in h Gospell, whē he sayd vnto hys disciples: Ye are not of this world. Wherefore Ambrose saith, that we haue such a nature framed vnto vs, as we fele it to be: & he addeth mozeouer, That the wise men of the world are in the flesh, because they resist sayth, and wyll beleue those thynges only, which are agreeable to reason. This place againe teacheth vs, that Ambrose by the name of flesh vnderstode reason, and the higher partes of the soule. We say therefore, that to be in the flesh, according to the Apostles meaning, signifieth nothing els, then in all our actions to be ruled and gouerned by the sence and affecte of nature, not yet regenerate in Christ. Now by this it appeareth, that it is proper vnto a Christian to follow those thynges which are of the spirite, and to auoyde those thynges which are of the flesh. And this propriety of a Christian lyfe partly moueth vs, not to forsake it: and is partly a note by which we may be made moze certayne of our iustificatiō and deliuey from sinnes. And as it is the part of a man to be gouerned by the mynde and humane reason, and the part of a philosopher to be ordred by the preceptes of doctrine, and discipline of wysdome, and the part of a souldier to frame all hys doinges by the arte of warrefare, so is it the part of a Christian to be moued by the spirite and sence of Christ. And although euery man hath hys proper vocation, and ought to follow such offices and duties as are mete and conuenient for hym, yet as many of vs as are of Christ, ought to measure our selues by this propriety and certayne rule, continually to haue a regard how much we haue profited in the obedience of the spirite.

Ambrose by the name of flesh vnderstandeth reason also. What it is to be in the flesh.

By what note or marke we are assured of iustificatiō.

A propriety common to all Christians.

The spirite of God and the spirite of Christ is all one. By the spirite is not here vnderstand any part of our soule. A metaphoz of dwelling. An argument taken of contraries. The flesh & the spirite are not so repugnant the one against the other: but that they may be both together in one and the selfe same man.

Forasmuch as the spirite of Christ dwelleth in you. For he which hath not the spirite of God, the same is none of his. That which he befoze spake, he now proueth by a stronge reason, & that they are not in the flesh, hereby he gathereth, because the spirite of Christ dwelleth in them: whereas he saith, Forasmuch as the spirite of God dwelleth in you, he maketh no doubt (sayth Chrysostome) that the spirite of God dwelled in them: for this word, forasmuch as, in this place is all one, as if he had sayde, because, so that the Greeke word ὅτι, is a particle causall. Ambrose thinketh that Paul in this place speaketh somewhat flaggeringly: for that the Romanes seemed somewhat to haue erred, and to attribute moze vnto the lawe, then was mete. Here are two thynges to be diligently marked: first, that the spirite of God and the spirite of Christ is one and the selfe same spirite: whereby appeareth that Christ is God. Secondly, that Paul by the spirite vnderstode not the excellenter parte of our mynde, as many dreame he doth. For he sayth, that that spirite whereof he speaketh, is the spirite of God and of Christ: which spirite (he saith) dwelleth in the saythfull Romanes, and in those which are of Christ. The metaphoz of dwelling is hereof taken, for that they which dwell in a house, do not only possesse it, but also do commaunde in it, and at their pleasure gouern all thynges. So the spirite filleth the harts of the saints, & beareth rule in them. And the Apostle seemeth to take his argument of contraries: Therefore ye are not in the flesh, neither walke ye according to it, because the spirite of God dwelleth in you. Not that these two thynges are so repugnant one against the other, that they can not be both together in one and the selfe same man, but these being compared together, are as contrary qualities: which when they are in the vttermost degre, the one can not suffer the other. For it is not possible that with a most seruent colde, shoulde any heate be mingled. But if the cold be somewhat remisse, then may some of the contrary quality succede. Wherefore forasmuch as in this life we haue not the spirite in the highest degre, thereof it cometh, that there remaineth in vs somewhat (I wyll not say much) of the flesh, and of corruption, though the spirit in h meane time haue the vpper hand. For otherwise we shoulde be in the flesh, neither shoulde the spirite (as Paul saith) dwell in vs. For by this metaphoz (as we haue sayde) is signified, that the spirite possesseth our myndes, and beareth dominion in them. But if the nobler parts
